"Well, well, this is a matter of very little consequence—though I see my learned friend is making a copious note of it," said Mr. Balsis, gayly. "The main point is what, as you have told us, did occur—that you found out the secret somehow. When you got it, I suppose you opened the box?"

No answer, save from Mr. Smoothbore, who observed, tartly: "You have no right to assume that, Sergeant."

"Let the young woman have a glass of water," suggested the kindly judge.

"My lord, my lord!" cried Harry, with sudden passion, "he is not guilty. Richard did not mean to steal the money; indeed he did not. He only wished to get possession of it that my father might believe him to be a man of wealth. He did but—"

"Endeavor to compose yourself, young woman," interposed the judge. "The learned counsel will only ask what is necessary."

"Take your time, Miss Trevethick, take your time," pursued Mr. Balsis, in his blandest tones. "The question is, how the prisoner became possessed of this money. Now, tell us, did you not give it him with your own hands?"

The bell was still tolling in Richard's brain, and yet he could hear the buzzing of a fly against a window of the court-house, and the careless whistle of some lad in the street without. It was the same tune that the keeper at Crompton had been wont to whistle in his leisure moments at home; and his mind reverted with a flash to the glades of the stately park, the herds of deer, the high-mossed gate, which he had shut in the face of the hounds when they were chasing Carew's carriage. Was it the bang of the gate, or had Harry really answered in a firm voice, that resounded through the silent court-house, "No, Sir?"

"What!" said Mr. Balsis, raising his voice a little. "Do you mean to say, then—and recollect that the fate of the prisoner at the bar may depend upon your reply to this question—that Richard Yorke did not become possessed of these notes by your connivance, through your means, at all?"

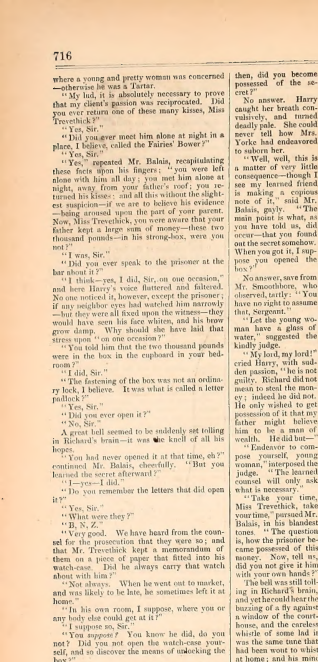
SUPERINTENDENT JAMES J. KELSO.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY SARONY & CO.—[SEE PAGE 711.]

"No, Sir, no," answered Harry, passionately; "I can't say that: indeed, Sir, I can not. But he is innocent—Richard is innocent—he never meant to steal them. O God, help me!" In her excitement, and not because she wished to do so, she had turned about, and once more caught sight of the prisoner at the bar. It was her turn now to shrink appalled and petrified. It was not reproach that she saw pictured in that well-loved face, but downright hate and loathing. "He will never, never forgive me!" cried she, with a piteous wail; and then scream followed scream, and she was borne out in haste, and a doctor sent for.

Cross-examination was, of course, quite out of the question; and, indeed, Mr. Smoothbore was much too sagacious a man to wish to exercise that privilege. The failure of the witness for the defense had proved the case of the prosecution.

It was Mr. Smoothbore who could now best afford to praise the innocence and candor of the unhappy Harry. Was it not evident that that tender creature had been tampered with, and almost persuaded to perjure herself, for the sake of the prisoner at the bar—almost, but happily for the ends of justice, not quite persuaded! Her natural love of right had conquered the ignoble passion with which she had been inspired by this unscrupulous man. What words could sufficiently paint the baseness of the conduct of the accused! Was it not clear that he had endeavored to escape scot-free, at the sacrifice of this poor girl's good name? She, forsooth, was to proclaim herself thief, to save his worthless self! It was not for Mr. Smoothbore—Heaven forbid!—to exaggerate such wickedness, but was it possible that the phrase, "Young in years, but old in vice," had ever had a more appropriate application than in the present case? For the credit of human nature, he trusted not. The point upon which his learned friend had mainly relied having been thus proved wholly untenable—the fact of Richard's taking the money having been incontestably brought home to him—it only remained for him (Mr. Smoothbore) to notice what had been said with respect to motive. If the prisoner at the bar had even had the intention, which had been so gratuitously imputed to him, of returning this money to the prosecutor, when once the object of his supposed scheme had been effected, he would be no less guilty of the crime that was laid to his charge. It was possible, indeed, in such a case, that there might be exhausting circumstances, but these would not affect the verdict of the jury, however they might influence his lordship's sentence after that verdict had been truly given. And this he would say, after what had just occurred in that court—after the painful scene they had just witnessed—the breaking down of that innocent girl in an act of self-sacrifice, culpable in itself, but infinitely more culpable in him who had incited her to do it—for he could not for an instant suppose that the prisoner's legal advisers could have suggested such a line of defense: taking all this into consideration, he, Mr. Smoothbore, would confidently ask the jury whether the prisoner at the bar was to be credited with merely a romantic stratagem, or with a crime the heinousness of which was only exceeded by the means by which he had striven to exculpate himself from it, and to evade the ends of justice.

When Mr. Smoothbore had thus concluded a lengthened and impassioned harangue, he sat down, wiping his hands upon his handkerchief, as though implying that he had washed them of the prisoner for good and all, and that a very dirty job it had been; while the judge rose and left the court, in the same hour appointed to his system, by nature, for the reception of lunch.



"COME, DID THE YOUNG GENTLEMAN EVER GIVE YOU A KISS?"

KARL WILHELM.

THE WATCH ON THE RHINE.

Words by MAX SCHNECKENBURGER: Music by KARL WILHELM.

A VOICE resounds like thunder-peal,
'Mid dashing waves and clang of steel,
"The Rhine! the Rhine! the German Rhine!
Who guards to-day my stream divine?"
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

They stand, a hundred thousand strong,
Quick to avenge their country's wrong:
With filial love their bosoms swell:
They'll guard the sacred landmark well.
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

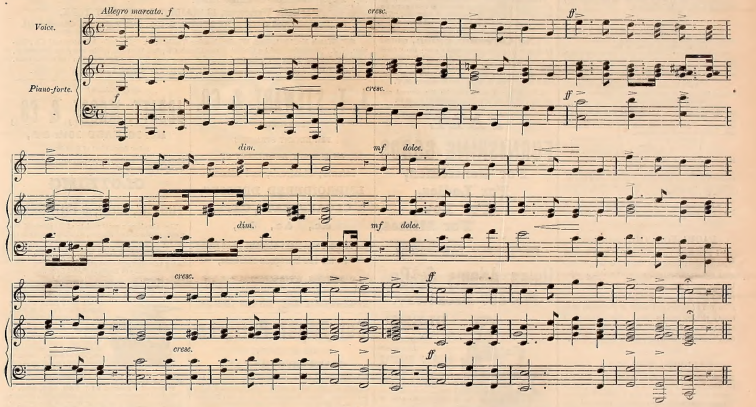
And though in death our hopes decay,
The Rhine will own no foreign sway:
For rich with water as its flood
Is Germany with hero blood.
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

From yon blue sky are bending now
The hero dead to hear our vow:
"As long as German hearts are free
The Rhine, the Rhine, shall German be."
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

"While flows one drop of German blood,
Or sword remains to guard thy flood,
While rifle rests in patriot hand,
No foe shall tread thy sacred strand."
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

Our oath resounds; the river flows;
In golden light our banner glows:
Our hearts will guard thy stream divine:
The Rhine! the Rhine! the German Rhine!
Dear Father-land! No danger thine:
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

MAX SCHNECKENBURGER.



PLAYING "THE WATCH ON THE RHINE" AT THE HEAD-QUARTERS OF "OUR FRITZ."—[SEE PAGE 714.]

THE BLUE GROTTO.

One of the most remarkable caves in the world is the Blue Grotto, in the island of Capri. The entrance from the sea is so narrow that the persons in the boat must lie down; but as soon as that is passed you enter into fairy-land. The water, clear to the bottom, is of an exquisite celestial blue, which is reflected from the calcareous rocks in their pure whiteness. It is a palace of turquoise built above a sapphire lake. The drops of water from the oars sparkle like pearls with a blue tinge. The effect on the body is most singular; the part under water of a swimmer is silvery white, with blue shadows round the muscles; while the hand and neck, which are out of the water, are of a bronze color, looking like an alabaster statue with a bronze head. It is certainly one the most beautiful natural curiosities in the world. A fisherman was the first to discover it, in 1822, though there are some indications that it was known to the ancients. Much has been written as to the cause of so singular a phenomenon: perhaps the most plausible theory is that, owing to the peculiar form of the entrance, the sea is saturated with light, which, shut up within, and thrown its rays to the farthest depths of the vault. In another part of the coast there is a grotto where the color is that of pale green. It is very similar to its neighbor, but not quite equal in beauty.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., May 8, 1870.

MESSRS. FREEMAN & BURR, Merchant Clothiers, 138 and 140 Fulton St., N. Y.:

Dear Sirs.—Received clothes per express yesterday, and am perfectly delighted with the fit; in fact, so are they. My friends are wishing they had their measure at your factory. Yours, etc., CHAS. DOW.

FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, May 2, 1870.

MESSRS. FREEMAN & BURR, Merchant Clothiers, 138 and 140 Fulton St., N. Y.:

Gentlemen,—I received last night the suit of clothing for Messrs. DUNN, BRADSHAW, MOORE, and myself. The suits and shirts are much better than I expected they would be, and give perfect satisfaction. Please accept my thanks.
Very truly yours, J. C. STODDARD.

VILLOSIA, IOWA, April 9, 1870.

MESSRS. FREEMAN & BURR, Merchant Clothiers, 138 and 140 Fulton St., N. Y.:

Gentlemen,—I bought a suit of you last winter which pleased me so well that I am disposed to try you for a spring and summer suit. Please forward samples at your earliest convenience. YOURS, T. F. WILLIS.

For ordering Clothing by letter, see FREEMAN & BURR'S advertisement on the last page.—[COM.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"I PURCHASED a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine eight years ago, and it has been, in constant use ever since, making the heaviest cloaks, besides doing my family sewing. I have never needed fifteen months without even removing it from the machine, and made in the mean time eighty cloaks, besides doing other sewing. I have used other machines, but consider yours the best."—MRS. P. GORDON, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

PURIFY THE SKIN

By removing all taint from the blood. This can be effected with absolute certainty by a short course of Ayer's Iron and Cod Liver Bitters. Whether the initiating principle in the circulation be that which causes scrofula, blotches, scald-head, white swelling, or any ordinary cutaneous eruptions, the beneficial effect will be the same. The subject converts the most pungent and unhealthy secretions of the body into a gaseous form, and they are thrown off from the surface by the increased vigor imparted to the circulation by the tonic action of the iron. The morbid matter which causes the cutaneous eruption is discharged through the skin, and the cuticle regains its natural color and smoothness.

Sold by druggists. 1 package, $1 00; 3 packages, $2 50. Mailed free. Registered letters or packages orders sent at our risk.—AYER & RUCKEL, Wholesale Druggists, 218 Greenwich Street, New York.

A HISTORY of Watch-Making, illustrated with fine engravings, and containing very valuable and useful information to all watch wearers and watch buyers, will be sent to any one, postpaid, by addressing HOWARD & CO., No. 785 Broadway, New York. (Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Weekly.)—[COM.]

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

"We have had a Grover & Baker Sewing Machine in use for twelve years, and it has never been to the office to have any repairs in that time. I consider it superior to any other make, as it has always given entire satisfaction."—MRS. S. PERRY, 1406 Master Street, Philadelphia.

PRANG'S CHROMOS.—"Their latest specimens, the 'Maiden's Prayer' and the world-famous 'Portraits of Beethoven,' are now ready, and should be purchased by all who have a taste for a beautiful picture."—Frank Leslie's Illustrated News.

LOW PRICES—NO RISK—FULL GUARANTEE.

The Price List of Genuine Wilcox & White Organs, which can be sent by Express to any part of the country, without Monopoly & Co., Selected Reeds or Co., Tremolos, or Co., stating you saw this in Harper's Weekly.—[COM.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE

PREVENTS POISONING from Lead, water, and costs but little more than Lead Pipe. It is stronger, more durable, in Reality, and as neatly ordered. All colors and sample of pipe sent by mail free. Address THE TIN WALL CO., 218 Centre St., N. Y.

1500 DESPERATE CASES OF CONSUMPTION

Cured without medicine. A grateful mother will cheerfully send the remedy free to any one afflicted. Address MRS. C., care of Gen. WILCOX, Cohoes, N. Y.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or (if in Bangor) send (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

$16 00 for $5 00.

The Phrenological Journal is a First-Class Family Magazine, devoted to Phrenology, Ethnology, Physiology, and Education.

TERMS—$3 00 a year; single numbers, 30 cents. To all who subscribe at once, sending 20 cents extra for mailing, one of PRANG'S celebrated Chromos, "The Doctor," published at $5 00, will be sent free.

The Christian Union, edited by HENRY WARD BEECHER, $3 00 a year; the "Agony Engraving of Washington," $5 00, will all be sent in new subscriptions for $5 00. 20 cents extra for mailing. Send at once to S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

N. B.—Either of Harper's, with the Journal and Chromo, for $6 00, or with all the above for $8 00.

FALL FURNISHING GOODS

For Gentlemen, For Ladies, For Boys, For Misses,

AT

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Union Adams & Co., No. 637 Broadway.

BLEES' Noiseless, Light-Motion, Lock-Stitch SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine, or send for agencies and terms, to

623 BROADWAY, New York.

RUPTURE

Cured by Dr. Sherman's Patent Appliance or Rupture Lozenges, without the slightest pain, from the use of trusses. Pamphlets illustrating bad cases of Rupture before and after cure, with other information of interest to the ruptured, mailed on receipt of ten cents. Address

Dr. J. A. SHERMAN, 291 Broadway, N. Y.

The following letter from the Rev. J. V. HINES, written to a gentleman in Philadelphia, speaks for itself:

BURNHAM, MICH., April 18, 1870.

Dear Sir,—I wear one of Dr. Sherman's Rental Instruments, and believe it to be the best in the world. I can now almost crawl.

Your best way will be to see the Doctor yourself, and let him adjust an instrument to you. You can speak of me if you like. Yours truly, J. V. HINES.

TRADE MARK

Use None but the BEST!!

OX AND SHEEP

SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION

Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in House-keeping!! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the sense that received the highest prizes at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signatures of Baron Liebig, the Inventor, and of Dr. MAX VON PETTENKOFER, Secretle, on every jar.

J. MILHAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For Sale every where.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.

CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics used for producing sleep. Price 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Sold by druggists generally. Manufactured by Jobbers. T. DE WITT KAVANA, Proprietor.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

DRUNKENNESS.—C. C. BYRNE, M.D., 1 Union Square, New York, Cures the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

253 Feet Front—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,

(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.,

Manufacturers of all the grades of AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders, BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS, WITH DAMASKEEN FINISH.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond-Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for timing Horses, Arithmeters, &c.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, including business card. For sale by the trade generally. Ask your Jeweler to see the MARION WATCHES.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK, And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

☞ Watch No. 1080, Stem Winder, bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton and Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me from December, 1868, to January 17th, 1870, its total variation being only TWO SECONDS in the entire time.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870. L. E. CHITTENDEN, Late Reg. U. S. Treas.

ESTABLISHED IN 1851.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have received

PER RECENT STEAMERS

AN ELEGANT ASSORTMENT OF

Infants', Children's, and Misses'

EMBROIDERED DRESSES, CLOAKS, HATS, CAPS, &c., &c., &c.,

the richest and most elegant to be found in all the European markets,

AT PRICES EXCEEDINGLY LOW.

Broadway, 4th Ave, 9th and 10th Sts.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns will be cut by MADAME DEMOREST, from 36 to 42 inches bust measure, and are designed to fit a figure of medium size. The NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING UP THE VARIOUS PIECES OF EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED BALL-DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PLAYANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 36
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 38
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 40
PANIANDE WALKING SUIT	" 42
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 44

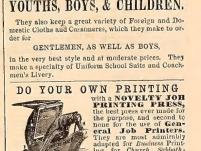
The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents at retail in Paris. The whole set of Nine Suits will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged. In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

To Consumptives.

The advertiser, having been permanently cured of that dread disease, Consumption, by a simple remedy, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
165 South Second Street, Williamsburgh, N. Y.



Pat. Repeating Toy Pistol.

Shoots Peas, Beads, and Marbles, very rapid fire at one motion. By mail, postpaid, for $1. The Trade supplied. Send for Circular.

COLBY BROTHERS & CO.,
508 Broadway, N. Y.

100,000 fat and curious. They please every body. 25 cents a pack or three packs, $1. W. T. WENTWORTH, 9 Astor Place, N. Y. The Library of Love, 90 cents.

253 Feet Front—Iron and Glass.

ABBATT, MOORE, & CO.,

No. 52 EAST 10th ST.,

a few doors West of Broadway,

Have manufactured for the present and coming season a very large stock of

CLOTHING

for

YOUTHS, BOYS, & CHILDREN.

They also keep a great variety of Foreign and Domestic Cloths and Cassimeres, which they make to order for GENTLEMEN, as WELL AS BOYS.

In the very best style and at moderate prices. They make a specialty of Uniform School Suits and Coachmen's Livery.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

with a NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS, the best press ever made for the purpose, and second to none for the general work required in Offices, Schools, &c. Specially adapted for Business Printing, for Church, Sabbath-School, and Society work, and also for Missionary and Ama- teurial purposes, or for a Village Newspaper and Job Office.

Price of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $50.

Send for Catalogues, with testimonials and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, to BENJ. O. WOODS, MR., 381 Federal St., Boston, MASS.; C. C. THOMPSON, 16 College Place, New York; KELLY, HOWELL, & LUDWIG, 917 Market St., Philadelphia; A. C. KELLOG, 65 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS,

F. E. SUIRE & CO.,

WHOLESALE DRUGGISTS,

N. W. Cor. FOURTH & VINE STS.,

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

DEPOT, 18 DEY ST., NEW YORK.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circular containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 80 Murray Street, New York.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for HARPER'S Weekly and Bazar.

To the Ladies of the United States.

Call for the WRIGHT MANUFACTURING CO.'S
ALPACA BRAIDS
in the following Celebrated Brands, and use no other.
Stearns' Gold Band—warranted full 6 yards.
Stearns' S.S.
Stearns' XXX—in Nos. 20, 40, 60, 65, 70, 75, 81, and 85.

The Finest and Best ever Made in this Country.

Wright Mfg. Co.'s Best Crown Alpaca—6 yards.
" " " Oriental Alpaca—
" " " Popular No. 6, 10, 19, 44, 55, 69, 73, 81, and 85.
" " " Mixed and Fancy Plaid Braids.

For Sale by all Dealers who keep the Best Quality.
A. W. STEARNS, Treasurer,
Lawrence, Mass.

It is handsomely Illustrated, and has for contributors some of the most eminent and attractive writers in the country. Among these are

PROF. JAMES DE MILLE,	MRS. LOUISE CHANDLER
MRS. HARRIET BEECHER	MOULTON,
STOWE,	LOUISA M. ALCOTT,
GRACE GREENWOOD,	REV. EDWARD E. HALE,
MRS. REBECCA HARDING	"SUSAN MAY,"
DAVIS,

In reading is adapted to the old and young, is very varied in its character, sprightly, and entertaining.

Subscription Price, $1 50.

Send for a Specimen Copy.

PERRY MASON & CO.,
151 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

YOU WANT IT!

THE TOLEDO BLADE is the best family newspaper published any where. Patron Nancy's great story, "Paul Denman: a Tale of the Great Rebellion," just commenced, and will be concluded this year. Terms—$2 00 a year; 5 copies $1 75 each; 10 copies, $3 50 each. Three months' trial (which will include all of NANCY'S story), 50 cents; five copies, $2 50; ten copies, $4 00, and an extra copy to getter up of club. Specimen copies sent free. Send for one, and give it to your neighbor. Send for one to your friends, at different Post-offices, to whom we will send free specimen copies. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

COMPANIONS OF MY SOLITUDE. By ARTHUR HELPS.

"Is a book that does not see its fellow once a blessing time. Let it be read, not only because it will be enjoyed, but because it will do good."—Ulton Morning Herald.

Price $1 60. Published by the author HELMAH (a Novel); CASSIMER MAKEMINA (a Novel). Price of each, $2 00. Mailed, postpaid, by the Publishers, ROBERTS BROS., Boston.

BOGUS MONEY, Brass Watches, Dollar Medicine Boxes, Jewelry, Pistols, Counterfeit Detectors, Burglar Alarms, Jack Knives, Pocket Books, and a hundred other articles, suitable for distributing or selling the "Rogue's Curse," in "THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," it "runs" to 50 cents per week. A live paper, 8 years established, 40 columns in every number, and sent to you $2 Bagraving free, and Paper till 1872, for only 75 cents. Specimen for a stamp. Address

"STAR-SPANGLED BANNER,"
Hinsdale, N. H.

WE want every young lady to read

MARION BERKLEY,

By LAURA CAXTON.

It is one of the most delightful books published. $1 50 buys it at the Bookstores, or by Mail.

LOTHROP PUBLISHING COMPANY, Boston.

"COMING TO THE PARSON,"

A Group of Statuary by John Rogers, now ready for delivery. Price $10.

This and other groups, suitable for Wedding Presents or Ornaments, will be delivered, with all expenses charges prepaid, at any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price. Circulars sent free by return mail. All of these by freight, and a discount allowed in correspondence. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price List.

JOHN ROGERS, 212 Fifth Ave., New York.

A MUSICAL BOX for $2.

THE French great exemption: novelty, cheapness, and durability: in highly-polished case, metallic tongues, brilliant in tone, of the best construction, with the most recent improvements, and perfect. Each select airs, eminently adapted for the drawing-room, parlor, church, and home. Sent anywhere by mail or express. Thousands sold annually. No. 1, 2 tunes; $2. No. 3, 14 tunes; $3. No. 4, 24 tunes; $5; sent free by mail on receipt of price. Send stamp for illustrated catalogue, with list of tunes. Try none other. Address WM. BROOKS & CO.,
Fulton St., Brooklyn, N.Y.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices for Cash, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

FOR FAMILY USE.—Apple Parer, Corer, and Slicer, $2. Made by D. H. WHITCOMB, Worcester, Mass.

HELMBOLD'S
FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU

Contains all the valuable properties of the plant in a highly-concentrated form, and is much prized by the medical profession as a positive remedial agent for diseases immediately connected with the bladder, kidneys, and urinary organs, as well as for organic weakness and extreme prostration.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE

CAPE of GOOD HOPE,

FOR

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist,
594 BROADWAY, New York.

Beware of Counterfeits.

H. T. Helmbold

STEEL PENS.

American Branch of House,
91 JOHN ST., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

LINDEN PARK, STATEN ISLAND.

BEST INVESTMENT IN THE WORLD.
CHARMING HOMES FOR THE PEOPLE.

Lots, $50 and upward—payable $10 monthly. 30 cents saved daily will pay for a $50 lot in 12 months. 500 ALREADY SOLD.

Free Excursions every Monday and Thursday.

Send for Free Tickets, Maps, &c., to Office of Linden Park Lot Association, 17 Park Row, World Building.
Orders by mail will be promptly attended to.

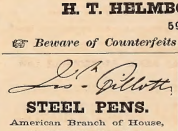
STEREOPTICONS and MAGIC LANTERNS, $25 to $200 each. A stock of over 10,000 pictures always on hand to select from. Made and for sale by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia: 8 Dey St., New York. Priced and illustrated Manual of 95 pages on application. 26 cents extra.

JUST OUT—GRAND PRUSSIAN VICTORY MARCH for Pianos; one of the most beautiful and brilliant Marches ever published. For sale at LOUIS BERGER'S PIANO-FORTE WAREROOMS, 97 Bleecker St., New York, or sent by mail for 50 cts.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SUGAR-DRIPPINGS, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address F. L. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Geneva, N. Y.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

$9000 of the PATRONS' FUND of Fourth Series now ready for Distribution. For a List of the Numbers drawn, address THE PATRONS' FUND, 11 College Place, N. Y.



The celebrated IMITATION-GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" Improved Gredels.—These patent-celebrated Watches have been so favorably tested during the last few years, in their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendation. Prices.—Full-sized Patent Levers, $15, equal to $100 watches, and for those to gold cases costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to the finest gold ones. We are also making a line of Ladies' Watches, for those jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. For those reasons these watches are fully guaranteed by manufacturers' watches are fully guaranteed by manufacturers' watches are fully guaranteed by manufacturers'

AN OLD FABLE.

Once upon a time a jeying Jackdaw saw a mighty Eagle pounce upon a stray lamb and carry it off to its nest in the high rocks. The silly bird thought it would be very fine for him to do a like deed; so he seized hold of an old Ram, but his claws got entangled in its thick wool, so that he could not get away. Presently the Owner of the sheep came along and captured the Jackdaw, and shut him up in a cage.

LIGHTING STREET LAMPS with Bartlett's Patent "Instantaneous" Gas Lighter Used in the city of New York over a year. Address J. W. BARTLETT, 589 Broadway, N. Y.

THE LIGHT IN OUR STORE is increased nearly twice what it now is by using Bartlett's Sun Burner. Lamps. Are simple, durable, and low cost. Address J. W. Bartlett, 589 Broadway, N.Y.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York. | FREEMAN & BURR'S | 138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.

Overcoats, $6. | CLOTHING | Winter Suits, $12.
Overcoats, $8. | WAREHOUSES. | Winter Suits, $15.
Overcoats, $10. | Winter Suits, $20.
Overcoats, $15. | FREEMAN & BURR'S stock is of unparalleled extent and variety. It embraces Sacks, Overcoats, and Clothing of every description, for all ages, and all classes and occasions. | Winter Suits, $30.
Overcoats, $20. | Winter Suits, $40.
Overcoats, $25. | ORDERS BY LETTER.—The easy and accurate system for Self-Measure introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables parties in any part of the country to order Clothing direct from them with the certainty of receiving the most perfect fit attainable. | Winter Suits, $50.
Overcoats, $30. | Boys' Suits, $6.
Overcoats, $35. | RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Samples of Goods, Price-List, and Fashion Sheet sent free on application. | Boys' Suits, $8.
Overcoats, $40. | Boys' Suits, $12.
Overcoats, $45. | Boys' Suits, $18.

Peterson's Magazine.

Get up your Clubs for 1871!

This popular LADY'S MAGAZINE stands now for the twenty-third year in the world. Its Stories and Novelettes are the best published any where. Its Mammoth Colored Steel FASHION PLATES are always the latest and prettiest. Yet it is only while other magazines, similar in merit, are three or four dollars.

TWO DOLLARS a Year,

TO CLUBS it is cheaper still, viz.: FOUR copies for SIX Dollars, with an original copyright Steel Engraving (size, 20 by 24 inches), "Washington at the Battle of Trenton," as a premium to the person getting up the club; or, EIGHT copies for Twelve Dollars, with both an Extra Copy of the Magazine and the Engraving as premiums.

Now is the Time to get up Clubs for 1871!

Subscribe to nothing till you have seen a copy of "Peterson."

Specimens of the Magazine sent gratis.

Address CHAS. J. PETERSON,
306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS. UNRIVALLED FOR BEAUTY, MELODY, AND SOLIDITY.
Thirty Styles. Prices: $100 to $1000.
Send for Illustrated Circulars, sent post paid, on application. Each thorough comparison is invited.
S. D. & H. W. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES
Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on short notice terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c.,
EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
704 Broadway, N. Y.

EVANS' STYLES OF FALL & WINTER CLOTHING
NOW READY, AT 66 and 68 Fulton Street,
IN GREAT VARIETY.
The "established reputation" for selling the Best-Made Clothing in New York will be strictly maintained. The selection of Styles was made and Goods bought before the late advance in prices, which enables us to offer as ASSORTED VARIETIES for any Store in New York, and make Prices that Beat the Market.
AT EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE,
66 and 68 Fulton Street, New York.

THE IMPROVED
WILSON
SHUTTLE
SEWING MACHINE
for simplicity, durability & beauty unequalled. For stitching, hemming, tucking, quilting, cording, binding, braiding, gathering, fancy sewing and sewing in gathers, it is unequalled.
AGENTS WANTED in every County in the United States where we have not one already employed. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., (Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

HAVE you any business in any part of the great State of Illinois? Do you want the name and post-office address of any one of the 3000 Lawyers now practicing in that State, or of any Judge, Clerk, Sheriff, Constable, or Notary? If you wish to know when or where any term of any court in that State, Circuit, Federal, Circuit, or County, will be held, full, full, and accurately stated, and a copy of the famous new Constitution, send $1 for the Illinois Official Directory. Address D. E. L. & W. L. Gross, Attorneys, Springfield, Ill.

POLLAK & SON,
Manufacturers of
Genuine MERSCHAUM GOODS.
Amber, Repairing and Boiling.
Broad Street, 27 John St., middle of the block.
Send for Circular.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel,
OFFER FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of
CORAL JEWELRY.

GLEASON'S Noiseless Argand Gas Burners; also, a Kerosene Argand Burner, giving the finest artificial light in the world. Still as daylight. Circulars free. Agents wanted. 135 Mercer St., New York.

THE GREAT WANT SUPPLIED.
A NEW WATER PIPE!
A cheap, healthful, durable, and flexible metal pipe for conducting water into dwellings, to be used for drinking and cooking. This pipe can be had at 20 per cent. less in cost than Lead Pipe of the same strength, and 10 per cent. less than Galvanized-Iron Pipe of the same bore, and transportation will cost but one-half. Satisfactory testimony can be given that water conducted by this pipe is much superior, by a great percentage, in purity to that carried by either lead or galvanized-iron pipe. This pipe can be worked and soldered by plumbers the same as lead pipe. For sale by the
NEW YORK LEAD CO.,
63 and 65 Centre St., New York.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

New Improvements. New Styles. Recent Prizes Received—at the best by seven. In CONTINUOUS PROMINENT MUSICIANS Awarded MEDAL at PARIS EXPOSITION, and SEVENTY-FIVE others. Illustrated Catalogues free.
☞ A new Illustrated Circular now ready, and sent free. Prices reduced, $95 to $1000.
Broadway, NEW YORK; 154 Tremont St., BOSTON

150,000 Acres of Land For Sale.
THE McGREGOR AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY offer 150,000 acres of land for sale at $5 to $10 per acre, in lots of forty acres and upward, situated in the counties of Howard, Lewis and Clark, Kossuth, Hancock, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, and Lyon, in Northern Iowa, on the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul, McGregor and Missouri River, and the Des Moines Valley Railroads. Good title. Such loan lands, high, rolling prairie, not subject to overflow. WATER abundant. TITLE from the U. S. Government. TERMS—1 per cent. per annum interest and 16 per cent. per annum of the principal, for five years; remainder in ten equal annual payments. No rents required except the loan. CLIMATE, the best in the world.
For Maps, Pamphlets, or other information, apply to
O. E. PALMER, Agent,
Algona, Kossuth County, Iowa.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S
CHALLENGE SAUCE

Pronounced by Connoisseurs
TO BE THE
BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,
AND
SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.
For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.
Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

PRICED AND ILLUSTRATED MANUALS on the following subjects sent free:
Part I.—Mechanical Instruments, 112 pages.
Part II.—Optical Instruments, 54 pages.
The following in preparation:
Part III.—Music Lanterns and Stereopticons, 88 pages.
Part IV.—Philosophical Instruments, 64 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia; 3 Dey St., New York. P. O. Box 4029.

DOOLEY'S THE YEAST BEST POWDER
TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

Farnham, Gilbert, & Co.
BANKERS,
No. 8 Wall Street, New York.

AGENTS AND CANVASSERS wanted. Address the Home Library Co., 33 Dey St., New York, for circulars, samples, and full particulars.

ARCHITECTURAL BOOKS.
A. J. BICKNELL & CO.,
TROY, N. Y., and SPRINGFIELD, Ill.,
Publish, and send, charges paid, on receipt of price:
BICKNELL'S VILLAGE BUILDER.....$10
CUMMINGS & MILLER'S ARCHITECTURE.....10
BICKNELL'S VICTORIA ARCHITECTURE.....15
LOTZ'S PRACTICAL STAIR BUILDER.....10
☞ Catalogues mailed free on application.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

ELGIN
(ILLINOIS)
Watches!
PERS. R. R. CO., GEN'L SUP'T'S OFFICE,
ALTOONA, January 19, 1870.
T. M. AVERY, ESQ.,
Agent National Watch Co., Chicago:
Dear Sir,—This Company has purchased and put in the hands of its engine-men, eighty "Raymond movements," which have given excellent satisfaction, and proved to be very reliable time-keepers. In addition to these, quite a number of Elgin Watches have been purchased by officers and employés of this Company, all of whom have been well pleased with the efficiency and regularity of the movements manufactured by the National Watch Company.
Respectfully,
EDWARD H. WILLIAMS,
Gen'l Superintendent.
☞ Call on your Jeweler and ask to see the Elgin Watch.
Business Office and Salesroom National Watch Company,
159 and 161 Lake Street, Chicago;
1 Maiden Lane, New York.

DRESS SHIRTS, TIES, SCARFS, and UNDERGARMENTS
The Oldest House in the Trade,
AND THE CHEAPEST
VAN DERLIP & TAYLOR,
No. 96 BOWERY.

$50 Reward is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents. 14 pamphlet on Catarrh free. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, No. 178 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

THE RECORDS OF LIVING OFFICERS of the UNITED STATES NAVY
and MARINE CORPS, with Memoirs of Deceased Heroes. By Lewis R. Hamersly (Late Lieutenant U. S. Marine Corps). Revised Edition. 1 Vol., 8vo., Cloth, $5.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
No. 23 Murray St. and No. 27 Warren St., New York.
Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

F. J. KALKENBURG, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Amber, &c., at Wholesale and Retail. Repairing done in all its branches. Circulars and Price-Lists sent. P. O. Box 6734. Store, No. 10 Maiden Lane, and 349 Broadway; 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Parlor Exposition Prize of 1867.

DOUBLE-THICK ROOFING.
This Roofing is made of the best all-wool felt, doubled, and is prepared by saturation with a preservative compound, and all ready to be put on flat or steep roofs and cover with our Quartz Cement, thus making a cheap and durable fire and water proof roof, at an expense of less than $3 80 per square. It can be put on by any one, with no special skill and no waste, except in cold weather. Full directions and samples of the Double-Thick Roofing, as well as samples of Patent Building Paper, sent free by mail, address,
ROCK RIVER PAPER CO., Chicago, or
B. E. HALE,
22 & 24 Frankfort Street, New York.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
160 Designs and Plans.
$1 50 Postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.
Woodward's Cottage and Farm Houses. Also, Woodward's Architects' and Builders' Pocket Companion and Price Book. 1 Vol., 12mo., Morocco, $2 00.
Woodward's Model Architect. 2 Vols., 4to., Cloth, $15 00.
Woodward's Rural Homes. 1 Vol., 12mo., Cloth, $1 50.
Woodward's Suburban and Country Houses. 1 Vol., 12mo., Cloth, $1 50.
Woodward's Graperies and Horticultural Buildings. 1 Vol., 12mo., Cloth, $1 50.
Woodward's Cottages and Farm Houses. 1 Vol., 12mo., Paper, 50 cents.
Woodward's Healthy, Warm, and Ventilated Houses. 1 Vol., 12mo., Paper, 50 cents.
Woodward's Country Homes. 1 Vol., 12mo., Paper, 50 cents.
Any of the above sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.
Address GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.
Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is send for Price-List, and a Club Circular accompany it, with full directions making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WE WILL SELL
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

EDWARD SEARS,
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
46 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "Lock-Stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine now in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 724.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

FRENCH REFUGEES IN LONDON.—[SEE PAGE 722.]

FRENCH REFUGEES IN LONDON.

THE city of London is full of fugitives from the war. There are a few Germans among them, who flee to avoid military duty; but the great majority are French, for the most part women and children and elderly men. The more opulent among them, driving in open carriages through the parks and gardens, or lounging in the fashionable promenades, give an unusual air of vivacity to the British capital. Ever since the gates of Paris were closed, say the London papers, we may hear almost as much French as English spoken in the streets and restaurants; and Regent Street appears to be as entirely occupied by the French as Boulogne is by the English. The illustration on our first page will give our readers a graphic idea of the character of this social "invasion" of England.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1870.

THE PROVISION FOR HONEST ELECTIONS.

IT is not the magistrate who calls the military force to support the laws—it is those who force him to that action who are responsible for the consequences. This is precisely the situation of the Administration in regard to the election in this city. The immense corruption of the polls here is notorious. Every man familiar with the details of politics knows of it. Certain politicians openly boast of it. We are largely quite by the city government for certain nominal official duties, with the understanding that their real duty is repeating and fraud, and that they shall not bullying honest voters. At the election of 1868 the naturalization frauds were universal and shameless. They were carried in detail to every active politician. But Mr. TWEED'S Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, who was then Mayor of the city, issued a proclamation on the eve or two before the election declaring the charges of fraud "gross and unfounded," stating that they were made by dangerous men—meaning Republicans—"to cover their own schemes of fraud, which they hope to consummate by the aid of unarmed or unpolicied criminals," and that they were intended to produce acts of resistance and violence.

This excellent performance of Mr. TWEED'S official agent was part of the system of fraud which was intended to secure that agent's appointment as Governor. And the complete success of the declarations of the Mayor was established by the statement of Mr. TWEED'S present newspaper organ, the Mail, that the letter of which asserted in his paper that he was "the shameless and cunning frauds" of Mr. TWEED and A. OAKEY HALL, was written by the present Mayor. The subsequent investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives of the United States established that the naturalization frauds in detail beyond any question; and in pursuance of its highest duty to protect the purity of the government at its own sources, Congress passed a law to defend, so far as possible, the honesty of the polls, which was approved by the President on the 31st of May, 1870.

As the election of this year approached, the opposition to this law upon the part of the Democratic party, which is as much identified now with electoral dishonesty as it was formerly with slavery, became bitter and violent. The organs denounced the law as unconstitutional, as if each House of Congress, which is made by the Constitution "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," which is authorized to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution all powers vested in it, and which is even empowered to change the times, places, and manner prescribed by the States for choosing representatives, had no constitutional authority to provide that the election of its members should be honest! Perceiving the hopeless folly of this idea, and of assault upon a law which could have no other purpose than the protection of the rightful voter, the organs of the Democratic party, and especially Mr. TWEED'S present organ, the World, declared that the law was an "unabashed attempt" to provoke popular "to go to the polls with arms in their hands."

This was, of course, intended both as a threat and a suggestion. It was an open and flagrant incitement to forcible resistance. And to whom was it addressed? To the July rioters of 1863, the men who burned orphan asylums, and massacred the most helpless and innocent poor people in the city; the "friends" of ex-Governor HORATIO SEYMOUR, who first threatened the riots by his speech in the Academy of Music on the Fourth of July; and then, when his words sprang up armed men, sent a message to ask the National Government to yield to the demand of the mob. It was addressed to the most ignorant and lawless class of the population in a city where they knew that their political party was in a great majority, and where the judges were elected by themselves; a city of which the chief magistrate was publicly denounced as a shameless corruptionist by his own party associates; in a State of which Mr. TWEED'S agent has been elected Governor by the very frauds which he officially denied. The managers of these frauds, having elected their agent Governor of the State, had openly declared at Tammany Hall that he was their candidate for President in 1872. But to that result it was more than ever necessary that he should seem to carry the State now. That any fraud necessary to this result would be perpetrated no intelligent person doubts. The law of Congress was, therefore, not passed a moment too soon. Its probable efficiency is seen in the rancorous opposition of the party of fraud.

But under the circumstances of which we have reminded our readers, and of which it is unfair to every citizen of New York, in the face of angry threats of resistance, it would have been inexcusable in the National Government if it had not taken the measures essential to secure the protection of honest voters by the prompt enforcement of the law. The present object is exactly that of Mr. HOFFMAN'S proclamation protecting the frauds in 1868, of which we have constantly reminded our readers, and every one of the most alarming documents ever issued under official sanction in this country. Proposing a painful regard for the forms of law, it struck at liberty itself. "It is the first time in the history of the country," said the Democratic Mayor's proclamation in 1868, "that a Democratic organs say in 1870, "that United States Government officials have attempted to interfere with free elections in the State of New York and the act is attended with danger." By free elections Mr. TWEED'S Mr. HOFFMAN meant stuffing, repeating, and ballot-box frauds. He meant what the editor of the World called the "shameless and cunning frauds" of Mr. TWEED and Mr. HALL. It was these that Democratic managers might prevent a free election that he denounced the National Government as interfering with.

It is an old confidence game, and is thoroughly understood. The honest voters in New York, who have been systematically shut out of the polls by ruffians, know whether, if the power of the United States is at hand, it is for the purpose of "coercing" or "protecting" them. Every intelligent man in the country understands that nothing would so surely lead to civil commotion as the electoral count announced by the Democratic party. A Presidential election, decided by the electoral votes of New York, which had been carried by the means that made Mr. TWEED'S agent Governor of the State, would not be accepted by the country with equanimity. It is not a mere party question. It is a question of the peaceful possibility of popular government. If the system by which the elections in the city of New York are decided by the Democratic party is not checked, it will as surely produce a civil commotion as the system of slavery which the same party so long and strenuously supported. And among the many claims which this Administration has to the gratitude, which the acutest election shows that it still enjoys, there is none more positive than its determination to protect the honest voter at the polls.

GERMAN TERMS OF PEACE.

THERE have been renewed efforts at peace between Germany and France. Count BISMARCK is stated to have remarked that there could be no peace until there was a recognized Government in France with which to treat, and many could not hope for full security against her dangerous neighbor without the possession of the provinces that have been wrenched from her by France. Assuming the report to be true, the situation becomes clearer. Germany is anxious for peace, but not from fear. If an armistice be granted for the purpose of the French elections, it will only be upon conditions favorable to Germany. If the French elections are not favorable to France, nor is there any evidence that they are likely to become so. The suffering of the country must be indescribable. The Rev. Dr. BELLOWS, President of the American Branch of the International Relief Society, has published a letter of Count ARCONATI, now at Brussels, stating that in the region along the Belgian frontier there are 200,000 persons in peril of starvation, and Count ARCONATI says that twice as many—nearly half a million—in the whole district over which the armies have swept are starving.

Moreover, there come from Marseilles and Lyons accounts of political differences and disturbances, and it is impossible not to feel that the whole nation is disintegrating. Meanwhile the movements of other powers toward intervention are limited by public opinion. No Government proposes to lend actual assistance to France, or to command Germany to desist.

The single situation, that while France savs that twice as many—nearly half a million—in the whole district over which the armies have swept are starving.

Moreover, there come from Marseilles and Lyons accounts of political differences and disturbances, and it is impossible not to feel that the whole nation is disintegrating. Meanwhile the movements of other powers toward intervention are limited by public opinion. No Government proposes to lend actual assistance to France, or to command Germany to desist.

The single situation, that while France many has conquered France, and is overrunning the country in every direction. Her military skill is immeasurably superior, and her military force resistless. France is crumbling under her trend, and Germany dictates terms as a conqueror. Those terms are the cession of Alsace and Lorraine. France replies, "Never!" and can do nothing. The other powers protest that they cannot, or will not, they will do nothing because the terms of Germany are not unusual, and are justified by the precedents of every country in Europe, including France herself. Indeed, not only did France undertake the war for the purpose of taking more German territory, but the very provinces in dispute were "wrenched from Germany" by France more than two centuries ago. Germany, also, is in full possession of them to-day, and France is utterly unable to dislodge her. Nothing but a hostile European alliance against Germany could dispossess her of the new territory. But which of the European monarchies shows any disposition to ally itself with the phantom of a Republic; and which of them, with their hands full of conquered provinces, will command Germany to renounce her conquests?

This, indeed, is not the settlement we had hoped from Germany, because the German official acts and words during the war have indicated a very high regard for the good opinion of civilization. The demolition of the fortresses under the guns of Europe would be all the security which Germany naturally and justly desires. To end so great a war, in which the triumph has been so prodigious, by destroying the obvious means of future offense, and by disdaining the vulgar spoils of conquest, is all that is necessary to crown the work of Germany, and to give her a greater glory than any nation warring with another has ever reached. But to the argument that the demolition of the fortresses is a sufficient guarantee, Count BISMARCK virtually replies that it is sentimental, not substantial. "Whatever the settlement may be," he virtually says, "France will hate us more than ever. Her total prostration, the suppression of her armies, the ruin of her military prestige, our successive and incessant victories upon her soil, make her a more deadly foe than before. When the war leaves France utterly exhausted, we may demolish the fortresses; but we can not demolish the hostility that will build others, and make France a camp ready for the day of reckoning. Another war must come, and we have fairly won the offensive advantages which France now enjoys. We must guard against us, and we can not reasonably decline to use them. This alone will give us full security."

Germany is the judge of the situation, and this is her judgment. We see no present reason to doubt that Europe will acquiesce. To say that the terms are hard is to say what is always said of the victor, and to complain that it is a monarchy oppressing a republic is to forget that thus far the republic is a mere coup d'état.

A FEW REMINISCENCES.

MR. AUGUST BELMONT was president of the Tammany Democratic meeting in New York, and in his opening address announced that the country was tired of radical misrule, and wanted a Democratic Administration; and presently the banner appeared, "JOHN T. HOFFMAN for Governor, 1870; for President, 1872."

Mr. AUGUST BELMONT was chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 1864, and fully represented the spirit of his party. In his house, it was publicly announced at the time, an English nobleman wore a secession badge unrebuked by the host, who was very angry with a young officer who resented the insult to his country. While he was still the official leader of the Democratic party, Lord LYONS, the English minister, wrote to his Government: "Several of the leaders of the Democratic party sought interviews with me.... The tone of opposition in their minds, while they were speaking to me, was naturally that of foreign mediation between the North and the South. The Democratic party were in power, or virtually controlled the Administration, they would rather, if possible, obtain an armistice without the aid of foreign Governments, and they would be disposed to accept an offer of mediation if it appeared to be the only means of putting an end to hostilities."

The Democrats say that they prefer not to talk about the past. Of course not. The last thing that a Democrat should wish to tell or to hear is the story of his party. But it is not so very long past; and the moral of political reminiscence is, that the Democratic party is led by the same chiefs, and is inspired by the same spirit, as during the war, while it refuses to accept the reconstruction, or to acknowledge the validity of the amendments. Mr. BELMONT says now that the country is tired of radical misrule. The Chicago Convention, which, as national chairman, he called to order, said the same thing in 1864. It said that it was the sense of the American people that the war was a failure, that the Constitution had been disregarded in every part, that public liberty and private right had alike been trodden down, and that justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demanded a cessation of the war.

Mr. BELMONT and his party had no comprehension whatever of the loyal spirit and purpose of the American people then, because they were merely a political organization to secure the ascendency of the slavery aristocracy. They had no more appreciation of the spirit and purpose of the same people now. They do not understand that the autumn elections, upon which Mr. BELMONT congratulates his friends, show that the Republican party will still control the Government, and that the country is not yet ready to trust those who would have betrayed it only six years ago.

Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR wisely confined his efforts to a genuine upon the Erie Canal, while Mr. S. S. COX, whom the Evening Post recommends as a candidate for Congress, did not remind his audience that he said in Chicago, in 1864, according to a report in his speech, which we have not known him to question, "LINCOLN and DAVIS ought to be brought to the same bloody level."

The people, as appears from the elections thus far, do not think that the height of practical wisdom in politics is to shut your eyes and to refuse to remember.

SOCIAL SCIENCE.

THE American Social Science Association, which a year ago held a meeting in New York, met this year in Philadelphia, and several valuable papers were laid before it. Electoral Reform, the Civil Service Reform, Minority Representation in Europe, the Annexation of Canada, the Relations of Business Men to National Legislation, were the titles of some of the papers; and the subjects, with the writers, show that the attention of the association is earnestly directed, among its other objects, to practical measures and political progress in the improvement of political methods. The objection that is an association of theorists and speculators, who consider every thing but human nature and the facts of the case, is one of those easy, flippant objections always ready to be thoughtless against the thoughtful, and is an especially easy general infidelity in regard to the great laws which govern political action and development. Indeed, one of the chief purposes of the association for some time must be to show that there is such a thing as social science, as a possibility of knowing the laws which regulate human society.

This happy-go-lucky view of society, which laughs at political economy, and sneers at intelligence and thought and common-sense as what it pleasantly calls impracticable, is also a popular view. But it is none the less absurd. It is the source of the opinion that any body is good enough for a legislator who is a social spy, and that to try to manage the ordinary business of the country as ordinary successful business is managed elsewhere is to be pedantic and dreamy. But intelligent thought upon any subject is never a disadvantage. To collect facts, to compare results, to draw conclusions, by analysis, as practical a method of treating important questions as to empty the mind and guess. Yet upon the great subjects of political science we are in this country chiefly students of foreigners, when we are students at all. Political science, since the earliest days of our history as a nation, has been scarcely studied. We have had a theory that popular government is a very simple affair, which needs "no study," and we have cultivated a horror or contempt of political thinkers, as if they were necessarily visionary. It is, indeed, why a education itself is not regarded as "aristocratic."

Now one of the very first services of the Social Science Association is to show that ignorance and prejudice and routine are not the necessary conditions of public improvement, and that thought helps invention, machinery, and trade, so it helps political progress. The association enables men who have made special studies of particular subjects to present the results of the inquiries which few of the rest of us have the time or the habit to pursue. For instance, it occurs to a thoughtful man that the rule of the majority may often be very unjust, and hostile to the real popular will. But the usual answer to that is that the majority must govern, however coarse a method it may be, and sometimes palpably unjust. Our best thinker admits that the majority must govern, but he asks whether it follows that the minority must be silenced. From this question arises a flow in the most practical and most practical manner how the minority may be represented while the majority governs. The subject has been the vital requirements of good government is satisfied, and the "theorist," the "speculator," the "visionary," has done what no statesman was wise enough to do.

Indeed, if the Social Science Association should do nothing more than awaken thought upon similar political problems, it would be a unique and most serviceable society. As it is, its volumes of transactions are quite indispensable to those who would know the best American thought upon several most pressing topics of public concern.

INTERNATIONAL RIGHT AND LOCAL LAW.

THE latest contributions to the literature of the Alabama question are the letter of Mr. JOHN A. PARKER, the President of the Great Western Insurance Company, addressed to ex-Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, and an article by President WOOLSEY, of Yale College, in the North American Review for October, of which Mr. MONTAGUE BERNARD's book upon the neutrality of Great Britain is the text. Mr. PARKER's letter states that the British Government is ready to pay all American citizens who suffered loss by the Alabama, but that Lord CLARENDON, who was consulted, said that perhaps this very payment might be considered by our Government another British offense; and the letter accuses the United States Government of neglect and diplomatic error in the conduct of the negotiation. But Mr. PARKER himself falls into an extraordinary error when he supposes that a private citizen can complain of a sovereign power for a violation of international law. The offense of Great Britain was against the United States by a breach of the law of nations. Great Britain is, therefore, responsible to the United States, which seeks not only reparation for the particular offense, but a guarantee against its repetition. The Reverend JOHNSON treaty was repudiated by public opinion in this country because it regarded the Alabama question as one of damages merely, while it was even more conspicuously a question of guarantees. The vital point of the controversy would be left untouched if the United States should consent to the private settlement of claims.

Great Britain pleads that we can not go behind local state law to enforce international obligation. We claim that international duty is independent of state law. This is the substance of the controversy: and the question of special damages is quite subordinate. If Great Britain should pay all the damages claimed, nothing would be settled except those claims. Or if Great Britain should insist that she is absolved strictly her own law, and declined to pay, and we admitted that she had observed it, the inquiry would still remain whether one state can evade international law are subject to the local legislation of any country. How if there were no law at all? Are international obligations thereby suspended? The action of Great Britain in modifying the local law of neutrality at the instance of Prussia, to secure international rights more fully, is a confession that the local law should be adequate to that protection, and that during the war it was not adequate. Long before this, in 1868, as President WOOLSEY reminds us, a Parliamentary Commission reported that the inadequacy of the British law should be increased. These are facts that point to a possible good understanding upon the essential point, and the satisfactory settlement of claims will, of course, follow.

When Mr. PARKER recasts the Government of delaying the settlement for political reasons, and indicates very distinctly his own political sympathies by saying, "It is known that the Government is holding these claims for advance for purposes of its own—to accomplish objects of personal and political ambition and popularity," he also reveals a single explanation of the essence of the controversy. Mr. Reverend JOHNSON's opinion, which he mentions, that England would probably pay the amount of the claims if properly represented, is an opinion which needs the corroboration of any direct or indirect approval of any member of the British Government, or of any informed Englishman; while the remark of Lord CLARENDON to "our friend" was merely a question which could not be answered except by the Government of the United States, and was, if it could be considered any thing more than a polite diplomatic evasion, a reference of the whole matter to what Lord CLARENDON knew, whatever "our friend" might have known, to be the only principal in the case.

The wisdom of a certain delay in pressing the negotiation has certainly been vindicated by the event. There is much greater general knowledge of the facts; there is consequently a much more reasonable feeling upon both sides; and the probability of a peaceful solution of the difficulty, both by payment of damages and ample security against similar occurrences, is greater than it could possibly have been had we peremptorily demanded a settlement in the height of exasperation which followed the war and the Reverdy Johnson treaty.

"STATE'S EVIDENCE" AGAINST TAMMANY.

In the last session of the New York Legislature Mr. CHARLES H. CREAMER was released from the city of New York. He was then very strongly opposed to the government of the city by the Tammany Ring, and in a speech in the Senate Mr. CREAMER, according to a careful report in the New York World, made the following remarks:

"I trust that all other legislation will in a manner cease until laws are passed that will protect the purity of the ballot-box, and secure to the people of this city a fair what they have now only in name—a republican form of government. Sir, what a farce it is for me to sit here creating corporations and charters, and passing bills day after day to perfect the various departments of our government, when the very foundation-stone of a republican government is rotten to the core! What a farce it is for us to sit here and legislate, as representatives in a republican government, when the election system upon which such a government rests has been undermined, and is as corrupt as hell!"

This is testimony which, like that of the editor of the New York World to the same effect, will not be suspected of Republican origin. The fact that since his speech in the Senate Mr. CREAMER has been taken into favor by Tammany Hall, and is silent, does not affect the truth of his statement. The announcement of the "Young Democracy" but spring had this public advantage at least, that it produced an immense amount of "state's evidence" of the utter corruption of Tammany Hall.

NOTES.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, who went over from the Republican to the Democratic party in company with Mr. Andrew Johnson and Mr. Montgomery Blair, seeking, with those worthy men, political security and peace, has recently made a speech about his old friends and party. In the fury of his onslaught he even surpasses Mr. Phillips. To use a phrase irresistibly suggested by the amusing recklessness of his speech, he "outdoes found goodness," and his hearers must have suspected that they beheld the original "old Joe Hacking up alive and afore." There are few follies, treasons, and crimes of which, in his opinion, the infamous Republican party is not guilty. Mr. John Quincy Adams, for his part, has come out of Sodom. Flying from what he calls "the great, original, and unpardonable sin of secession," and seeking a government which will not "dam all her people, and all their land," he joins himself to Mr. Tweed. Sighing for an honest regard for the right of the people to manage their own investments, he is the friend of Mr. Tweed's Mr. Hoffman. Looking for honor in public service he is the Honorable Francis Wood and Mr. James Fisk, jun. Pining for official dignity and self-respect, he embraces Mr. A. Oakey Hall. In grave offense, loathing corruption, by which he says the Republican party lives, moves, and has its being, he turns with satisfaction to Tammany Hall. Indeed, it is an immense relief to the disgusted soul of Mr. John Quincy Adams to find that, close by this rocking, bottomless pit of Republicanism and Secession, he has providentially contrived to know that the other name of purity, principle, progress, intelligence, and honesty is the Democratic party. Mr. Tweed pulling at the sheet which Talleyrand expressed, "surtout, vous ami, point de zèle!"

The "Capital Convention" has not made a profound impression upon the public mind, and interest seem to have been a letter of Mr. Greeley's, which was read, and one of Mr. Forney's, which was not read. The most business of the Convention was the debate upon the rending of the rules. It adjourned upon the first day before it reached a decision. The next day it resolved to read it, and then the letter could not be read. Mr. Greeley advised the removal of the capital to New York, so Mr. Forney probably recommended Philadelphia as a proper spot. It certainly would have had a stadium in his favor. The Convention wisely did no more than to appoint a committee "to take charge of the whole subject," and then adjourned sine die. It has had, however, the good sense of showing that there is really very little feeling upon the subject in the country. Nor is any good reason to be considered, at a time when the facilities of travel so rapidly increase, for the enormous waste of the public money to which attend the migration of the present government buildings and the erection of new. The present capital in the mind of the country is so properly bent, demands at least the delay of such expenses until their occasion is plainly urgent.

The little telegram that on the 26th of October General Von Moltke celebrated his seventieth birthday at Versailles recalls the fact that few great men have lived to that age and so advanced an age as he. It is only within a very few years that he has been recognized as the greatest of living soldiers. Since Napoleon Alexander the Great had conquered the world which he knew, and Hannibal Barca Hannibal was commander-in-chief of the Carthaginian armies. At thirty-three Turenne was Marshal of France, and at thirty-four Farnese was triumphant in Italy. At thirty-three Frederick the Great was already considered the first soldier of his time. Gustavus Adolphus defeated Tilly, his greatest opponent, at thirty-seven. Before he was twenty-five Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, was a famous soldier. At twenty-one Don John of Austria was commander-in-chief. At forty-five Wellington had conquered Bonaparte. In our own day and country, on his fifty-first year, Sherman was marching to the sea; and before he was forty-four Grant had won Donelson and all that line to victory. At the same age Washington was commander-in-chief. But Von Moltke is not only the greatest soldier, perhaps the most imposing and effective series of military operations at so late an age, but he stands as a student, and what Napoleon would have contemptuously called a pedant. He must unquestionably rank among the generals of the very greatest military genius.

We recently mentioned with regret the arrest and imprisonment of Dr. Jacoby, the German republican leader. It was a stupid blunder, because it could not fail to alienate the very sentiment which Germany has so freely and steadily propitiated. We are therefore very glad to know that the German Government has not only ordered the release of Dr. Jacoby, but has also censured General Von Falkenstein for his repression of free speech at public meetings. It is certainly powerful enough to tolerate any expression of opposition, and any criticism of its policy. The German Government is rigorously monarchical; but unlike the old despotism of Russia, that it was a despotism tempered by assassination, Prussia is a despotism tempered by intelligence and sagacity. The monarchy will undoubtedly be stronger for the truly wonderful triumphs of Germany in the war; but also the national feeling and the confidence in German unity will be confirmed. With immense sagacity the German monarchy conforms to the spirit of the age, and it is in this that the supreme genius of Bismarck is apparent. Under the Hohenzollern and the soldier Moltke Germany reaches a greater glory than ever before.

The war in France has so entirely occupied public attention that the nomination of the Duke of Aosta to the Spanish crown, and his acceptance, have been hardly observed. The Duke is the second son of the King of Italy. He is twenty-five years old, and is Vice-Admiral of the Italian navy. The fact that his elevation to the throne is agreeable to the Prussian Government shows can be little question, and it cements the good understanding of the Italian and Prussian crowns. But that, which was formerly the chief consideration, is now quite subordinate to that of the satisfaction of the people. Probably the Germans have no other interest than that upon such a point as the succession should be satisfied. And if, as seems to be likely, the Spaniards prefer a monarchical system, they probably expect to look out of the crowned heads in the Italian political group may be as agreeable as any other. But the whole affair is of secondary interest at the present time, and nothing but convenience now hedges a king.

There must be great comfort to many readers in prodigious head-lines in newspapers, or they would not be used. Thus in the American advocate of Louis Napoleon's empire we read one day in the tallest capitals "France Finished," and in the same place and type, we have "The Fall of Metz." Or we read with interest, "Bismarck saves Amiens;" and hastening through the columns to find the details, we discover that it is announced from Tours—Gambetta's place of advocate—that a detailed story of the triumphant escape of Bazaine from Metz—that is, the Government here considers that his [Bazaine's] return to the sustenance of Amiens saved that city from attack and bombardment. The fact could be more vividly known than the publication of such stuff, except the emphatic head-lining of it as important news. Indeed, the reader must soon be entertained whether there are any French people or Government, when he finds that the suffering of the country is appalling, and its future so gloomy as to be incalculable.

The Pope has formally suspended the session of the Œcumenical Council, alleging that there has been a sacrilegious invasion of the territory of the Church, which might prevent its freedom of action. The Italian Government promptly replied that there was no reason whatever for such a suspicion, and that there is no obstacle to the meeting of a free action of the Council. The profane might suggest that, as Papa Pio has declared the infallibility, he has convoked the assembly—namely, the declaration of infallibility—has a perfectly willing to make capital by prohibiting it. But other considerations under the pretense of apprehended interference from the new Government.

The publication of Secretary Cox's letter of resignation excites attention that he retires because of the reasons which we have already stated. "I find myself embarrassed and interfered so grossly with the efficiency of the department that they or the Secretary must withdraw; and comprehending that under the circumstances, arising from a vicious system, for the present injustice to myself, neither honor nor more immediately important purposes might be promoted by his resignation, he resigned. Secretary Cox left to the decision of General President the question whether the Administration could safely provoke the hostility of its active political managers," and the President decided that it could not. Probably the decision was correct. Under the practice of every party, the executive patronage, or portions of nearly half a century, the attempt to free the public service from the incubus of patronage would have left the Administration powerless. But the fact should only the more plainly show us that the present system is one which costs us the services of the best men, and sinks us deeper and deeper in corruption.

Senator Conkling has written to Mr. John Quincy Adams a letter in the offensive remarks upon the Constitution which Mr. Adams attributed to a distinguished "radical Senator," and which were published in the New York World as Mr. Conkling's. The Senator states that he never made the remarks, nor said any thing like them, which was, of course, understood by every body but the most vehement partisan opponents. The grave exposition of the story, which Mr. Adams had probably casually seen in a newspaper, without the least evidence of its authenticity, is another illustration of the utter recklessness with which that gentleman conducts his campaign. But Mr. Adams ought to expect that, as no possible caricature or misrepresentation of his opponents can procure his election, temperate truth-telling would be of much greater service to him hereafter.

Messrs. J. B. Ford & Co. publish "A Library of Poetical Gems, containing choice selections from the best Poets: with an Introduction by William Cullen Bryant." It is a large and well-printed book of double columns, illustrated with an admirable portrait of Mr. Bryant, with three or four wood-engravings, and fac-similes of the writing of many noted poets. It contains more than fifteen hundred selections from more than four hundred authors, and has one fifth more matter, the publishers say, than any similar collection. Mr. Bryant is not the compiler of the work, but every poem has been subjected to his revision, and he has added or excluded at his pleasure. His introduction is a brief and pleasant sketch of the progress of English poetry, and his judgments will be accepted as admirable. In its general character and arrangement the "Library" is like Mr. Dana's "Household Book of Poetry," and is one of the best selections ever made. This traverses substantially the same field and gathers very many of the same flowers, as it unconsciously does. Besides, it is a delightful companion, or a storehouse of sweets.

Mr. Thomas Nast, who is undeniably the foremost caricaturist of the day, has lately employed his talents in illustrating a humorous almanac for 1871. He has wisely avoided the use of politics in these illustrations, and aimed only to amuse. Among the best of the cuts are "The Landing of Columbus," "The Death of Queen Elizabeth," and "The Landing of the Pilgrims." The latter will be best amused to those in the face of the latter the well-known lineaments of some of the living statesmen of Massachusetts.

Number 47 of Harper's Bazar, for November 19, will be issued with a very pretty cracker and ultramarine Supplement, containing twenty-five full-sized patterns of winter wrappings and dress trimmings, fully illustrated and carefully described, besides a very choice variety of literary matter and fine-art illustrations.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE MILITARY SITUATION IN FRANCE.

On the 26th October the grand army of Marshal Bazaine, at Metz, consisting of 173,000 men, surrendered to the Prussians, and 6000 more troops, capitulated to the Prussian forces on the 27th. Thus ended the memorable siege of Metz, which, as Sedan, had restricted the utmost concentration throughout France, and thereby materially assisted the progress of the German treachery. According to the statement of the Prussian General Von Stiehle, who had the words of Count von Moltke in the morning of August 19 after the battle of Gravelotte, Bazaine could have avoided being shut up in Metz. After he was thus inclosed he could have, and did, make a sortie of Metz, made a show of attack, and finally made easily by far than M'Mahon could reach the Belgian frontier. Bazaine's cavalry and artillery were in excellent condition, and this proceeding was, of course, more difficult after the capitulation of Metz, than before the commencement, and by this time he ought to have been even friendless. This is charged to a plot in behalf of the Emperor, by which time was to be gained to remain in statu quo until the conclusion of the war by Victor Emmanuel, and then was to make an attack, with Prussian consent, for Bonapartist purposes. Besides Bazaine could have escaped from the grave of the Prince Imperial, and the virtual regent.

The surrender of the siege, Bazaine and his staff were allowed to keep their swords, and were then marched in like men now for fear of assassination, and were then marched in like men now for fear of assassination, the better to protect them from the fury of the people, who were on hand. On the morning a sortie rations for a day were issued to the troops, Bazaine and his staff then marched out of the city, and the Marshal himself was detained until indulged in luxurious meals. Four days' rations were issued to the troops on the 27th, sufficient, but for two days previous they had received none. Not food nor drink had been obtainable in the town for a week; but on that morning, before any thing had been issued, the wine and spirit depot was opened, which goes to prove the charges current in the town that Bazaine's object was to starve out the garrison of food, and that a rational system of apportionment, which would have prevented the loss of life, was deliberately withheld. Had the provisions been issued with regularity, they would have prevented much suffering and would have enabled the siege to last a month longer.

On the 30th ult. the Government Council at Tours issued a proclamation to the army, charging Bazaine with treachery, and calling upon them to "raise their spirits and courage to the level of the height of the perils that have fallen upon the country."

The surrender of Metz seems to have produced a stand-still in French military circles, though Garibaldi is operating on the Loire and is said to be in command of French volunteers, calling themselves the "Wild-Beasts of Auvergne." In the meantime, the siege of Paris proceeds interminably with the Prussians and Parisians. They have thrown off the track the two communications by railway which remained. Many of the men were killed or wounded.

A Berlin dispatch of October 30 says: The King telegraphs as follows to the Queen:

"VERSAILLES, October 29, 1870.

"The defeat of the two hostile armies which recently marched against us has given me in command of our two commanders, Pritz and Frederick Charles, the decisive of Marshal Bazaine, the first instance which appointments in our family history. WILLIAM."

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Italian Foreign Office has issued a circular to the foreign representatives of Italy, saying the assumption that Italy is to be represented by Rome to the Œcumenical Council, and declaring that the government has no intimation of its intention to the independence of the Church.

The Pope has been asserted to the candidature of the Duke of Aosta for the throne of Spain.

The official account of Queen Victoria has been given to the British that the marriage of one of her daughters with the Marquis of Lorne.

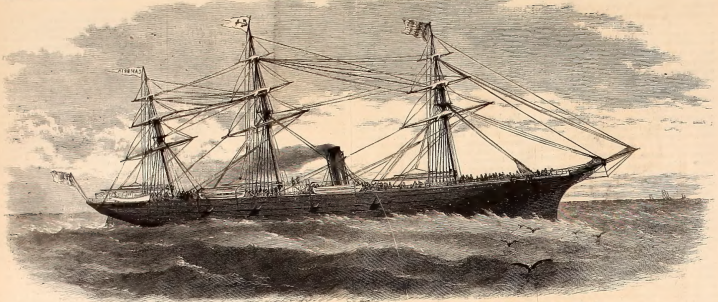
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Senator Morton has formally declined the mission to England, and has declared that the Democratic failure, being Democratic now, would elect a Democrat to succeed him in the Senate. Governor Baker, the present which would be an impropriety on his part in connection with the duties of the administration.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, the Postmaster-General says that the number of letters sent by mail was 1,249,065,554, or 39 letters to each person.

The United States steamers Vigant, Frolic, and Guard have returned from the Canadian fishing-grounds, the fishing season having closed. The senior officer of the squadron reports that five American vessels were seized for fishing within the prohibited limits. At one time there were eleven British war vessels in the vicinity of the grounds, some to refit and receive supplies. Notwithstanding of an unusually successful season, the catch was less favorable than in former seasons.

The Worcester Bank, of Worcester, Massachusetts, has entered voluntarily liquidation. October 28, by bargain, sales, after guarding the interests of depositors, the bank will be closed with $500,000 and $100,000 in treasure and valuables, $100,000 of which was in government bonds.

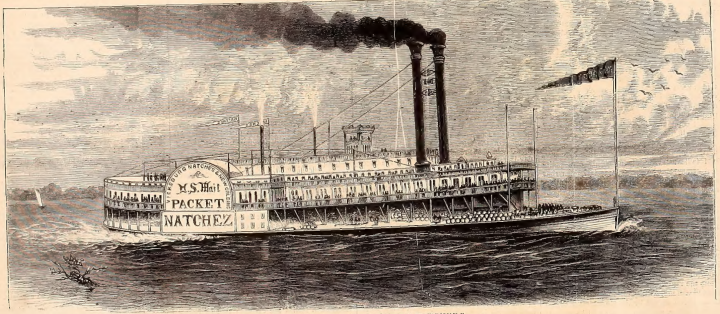


THE STEAMSHIP "CAMBRIA," WRECKED OFF THE COAST OF IRELAND OCTOBER 19.—[SEE PAGE 730.]

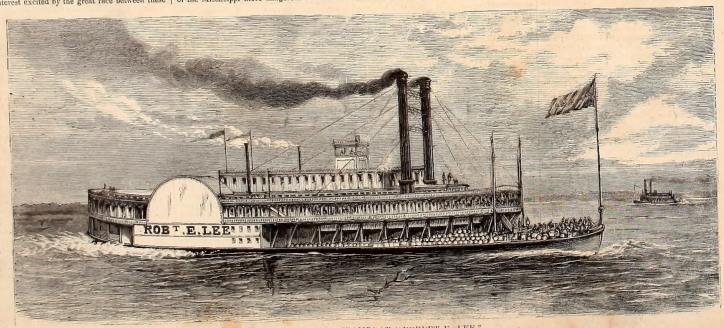
THE "NATCHEZ" AND "ROBERT E. LEE."

On this page we give our readers accurate pictures of the champion steamboats of the Mississippi, the Natchez and the Robert E. Lee, engraved from photographs kindly furnished us by Mr. GEORGE ELLIS, of New Orleans. The interest excited by the great race between these boats, some months ago, has not yet died out, and even at New Orleans crowds of people are attracted to witness their departure and arrival, while the local papers give daily bulletins of the time they make from landing to landing. Their rivalry seems to have revived the old enthusiasm for racing, which years ago made the navigation of the Mississippi more dangerous than that of any other river in the world. A trip without an accident of some kind was considered a very tame affair; and a boat whose captain was so ment-spirited as to care more for the safety of his passengers and cargo than for winning a race, stood no chance in the competition for patronage.

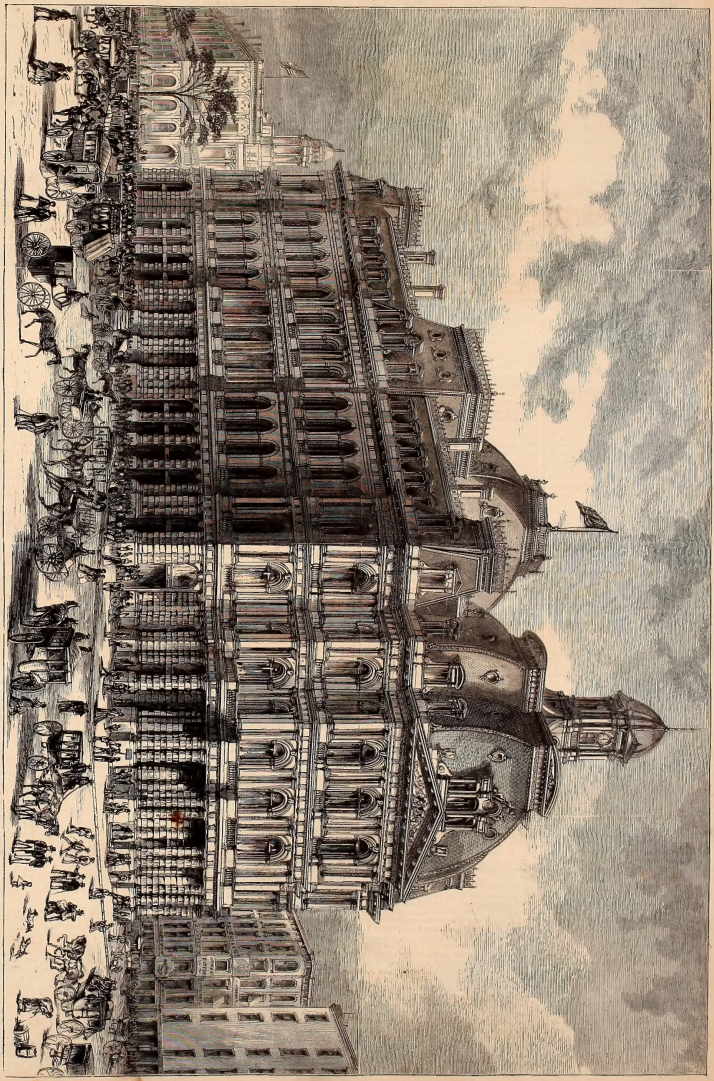
Between the chimneys of the Natchez hangs the miniature representative of a cotton bale. The chimney-tops of the Robert E. Lee represent oak leaves. In finish, as well as strength of construction, these champion boats surpass all their rivals on the Mississippi. Thus far their competition has been pursued without accident; but no one would be surprised to hear any day that one or both of them had been blown to fragments.



THE MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOAT "NATCHEZ."



THE MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOAT "ROBERT E. LEE."



VIEW OF THE NEW YORK POST-OFFICE, NOW ERECTING IN THE CITY HALL PARK.—[See Page 727.]

THE FIELDS ARE GRAY WITH IMMORTELLES.

The sheep are sheltered in the fold,
The mists are marshaled on the hill,
The squirrel watches from his hole,
And every living thing is still:
The fields are gray with Immortelles!

The river, like a sluggish snake,
Creeps o'er the brown and bristly sedge;
I hear the swinging of the pine
Betwixt the pauses of the rain
Down-dripping on the Hummock!

And think of faces, slimy cold,
That flinch not under falling tears;
Meek-mouthed and hewy-lidded, and
With white bone just behind the ears,
And crowned with scentless Immortelles!

The partridge hath forgot her nest
Among the stubble by the rill;
The rain the leaves of the fruit
Seek for some tender thing to kill:
They can not hurt the Immortelles!

Sad empress of the stony fell!
Gray stole of the blasted heath!
Dullest of flowers that ever bloomed,
And yet triumphant over death,
Oh, weird and winged Immortelle!

Lie lightly upon Nature's breast,
And cover up her altered face,
Lest we should shiver when we see
The brightness of its vernal grace
Grow grayer than the Immortelles!

The wind cries in the reedy marsh,
And wanders, sobbing, through the dell;
Poor, broken-hearted lover, lie
For votive to the Immortelle!
The Immortelle! The Immortelle

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE SENTENCE.

RICHARD remained in the dock. The warder who had charge of him gave him the option of retiring, but he preferred to stay where he was till all was over. He had set his teeth tight, out of his mother, straining her loving eyes toward him—with the hope in them of a smile—and his hant corner of the gallery; and he kept his gaze fixed upon that spot. They had all the world against them now, these two, so clever, and so wholly unable to combat with inexorable fate. Harry's evidence, and especially the manner of it, had not seeded Mr. Smoothbore's fiery scorn to turn all hearts against the accused. To the great mass of spectators it seemed as though Richard would have made the girl change places with himself, and become a vicarious sacrifice for his worthless self.

The majesty of the law having withdrawn itself, a hum of angry voices filled the court, heard a munching of biscuits, a sipping of flasks. The silence of suspense no longer reigned. The struggle was virtually over, and the victim was only waiting his doom. It was hoped it would be a severe one. The spectators were pitiless, and had turned their thumbs toward their breasts. As to the verdict there was no doubt. Those who knew the character of the judge opined that this young gentleman would "get it hot," notwithstanding that there was a first offense. Odds were taken that he would have fourteen years. "At all events," said one of the small officials, in answer to eager inquiries, "more than he could do on his head." With this enigmatical reply of the one most astonished questioners were compelled to be content.

"Silence in the court—I desire." The judge had returned. It was thought by many that it was in the prisoner's favor that the judge had hunched. Certain mistakes, or perhaps a fatal economy had provided African sherry. His charge was scarcely less dead against the prisoner than that of Mr. Smoothbore's opening speech. As for the motive, upon which such stress had been laid by the counsel for the defense, that might be a plea for a recommendation to mercy, if the jury believed it, but it could not affect the question of the prisoner's guilt. That the stolen property had been found in the possession of the accused there was no room to doubt. If the prisoner at the bar had not himself taken it out of the prosecutor's strong-box, who had?

Such was the form in which the case was left for the jury.

"It's UP," whispered Mr. Wensel behind his hand to Mr. Bolus. Mr. Bolus nodded indifferently: the case was over so far as he was concerned, and he was not going to employ significant under-promptings. That would have been waste of power indeed at his age. The jury did not leave the box; they laid their heads together, like a bishop, and "deliberated" for a few minutes; that is to say, the foreman whispered, "We can't return but one verdict, I should say, gentlemen;" and the eleven answered, "But one."

"We find the prisoner guilty, your lordship."

His lordship nodded approval. "In my opinion, gentlemen, you could not have done otherwise. Hem!" Then that common phrase, "Your could have heard a pin drop," might have been used with respect to that vast assemblage. That "hem!" was a very fatal sign with Mr. Justice Bantam, as the bar well knew.

"I'll take you a bit to five in sovs he gives him seven years," whispered one learned gentleman to another, without moving his lips.

"It seems to me you are rather fond of a good thing," returned the other, scornfully, but with a like precaution.

"Hem!" said the judge again. "Is there any one in court able to give any information concerning the antecedents of the prisoner?"

"We have no witnesses to character, my lord," said Mr. Balais, gravely; "we had hoped it would not have been necessary."

"There is a witness in court, please your lordship, a detective of the A division of metropolitan police, my lord," observed Mr. Smoothbore, "who knows something of the prisoner."

"Let him stand up," said the judge.

Here was an extra excitement—an additional attraction, which had not been advertised in the bills—and the crowd was divided and subdivided accordingly by craning and crowding. Richard turned his heated eyes in the direction of this new enemy. He had no hope of seeing a friend. The individual in question was unknown to him. He was a tall, gaunt-looking man, whose face might have been carved out of box-wood, it was so hard and serious, but for its keen eyes, which seemed to emit his coat with a kind of phosphorescence.

"I know the prisoner at the bar; that is to say, I have seen him on a previous occasion, when he passed under the name of Chandos, and on other occasions, as I believe, under other names. From information received I attended a competitive examination, under the authority of government."

"Do you mean that you were employed by the government to set the examination-work a government one ?" interrupted the judge.

"You'll hear something now," whispered Mr. Wensel to Mr. Balais, "by Jove!"

"Both, my lord," explained the witness. "It was then the witness's knowledge of government that there had been several cases of personation in the competitive examinations recently instituted for the military and civil services. Not only were young gentlemen, who had acquired credit, found to be under the assignment of the subjects which they had previously been examined upon, but their physical appearance was altered—such as would be necessarily the case—to disqualify them: it appeared incredible that they should have passed the preliminary medical examination. One was bumpbacked; another almost blind. It was understood that some international scheme of personation, of misrepresentation, was at work to produce these results, and I was instructed to watch the men who came up to the examination that only one person was concerned in the matter—the principal—as he was the most unsuspicious of him for some time. I had seen him on three separate occasions as a candidate at public examinations. He appeared to me extremely sensitive, but (as I have since discovered) it had much result in his case. He was not disconcerted in every instance in obtaining the appointments in question for his employers, who received them in the name of Chandos. I have, I believe, been cancelled. In the case of Chandos, a letter was written to the supposed medical candidate, to the authorities of the government branch—the India Board—under which he was to serve, to gentlemen named that I had seen as at once suspected. In this instance the plan was frustrated by the prisoner's own confession of the young man Chandos himself, who had over to him a considerable sum of money for the same purpose. I have, my lord, now in a position to prove that on several other occasions the prisoner impersonated other persons; and, in short, if he may be said to have a calling, it is that of personating, at competitive examinations, other candidates, principally those who are thus enabled to secure situations and appointments which they could otherwise never obtain."

Mr. Justice Bantam had his prejudices, but he had a fair amount of justice.

"This is a most unlooked-for communication, Brother Balais," said he, doubtfully; "and it is not precisely evidence to be received upon the point of character."

"I am aware, my lord," returned Mr. Balais, after a hurried conversation with the little attorney, "that my client is not in a position to dispute the evidence of the witness; but I am sure to throw himself upon the mercy of the court, on the ground of his having no charge to think—of his youth and," he was going to add "inexperience," but, under the circumstances, he thought it better to—"of the influence exercised by his," anybody else's barely eighteen years of age.

"Very good," said Mr. Justice Bantam, looking as if it could not be worse. "Hem! Prisoner at the bar: after a verdict of this nature, in which you have had the benefit of the best legal aid, you have been found guilty on the charge of which you are accused. In that verdict I cordially concur. The offense was a very serious one: but the endeavor to which you have made to screen yourself, at the expense of that beautiful and innocent young girl, is, in my opinion, still more serious and contemptible than the crime itself. Having made yourself master of her affections, you used your influence with her to the injury, moral and social hurt. You have added loud her perjure herself, and proclaim herself guilty of a crime she did not commit, in order that you might yourself escape justice. Nobody who heard her evidence—who saw her in yonder box—can doubt it. Still, as your counsel has just remarked, you are but a youth in years, and I looked about me in hopes to find some extenuating circumstances in your past career—some record of good—which might have assisted me in inflicting on you a more lenient sentence than your offense had earned. I had no other purpose in asking whether any thing was known of your previous career. The reply to that question has astonished and shocked me, as it has shocked and astonished every right-thinking person in this court who heard it. We know to what base purpose you had used the comeliness and youth and good address with which nature had endowed you; and now we have learned how evilly you have misused your talents—with what perverted ingenuity you have striven, at so early an age, to set at nought those precautions by which your country has lately endeavored to secure for itself efficient public servants."

"That's neat," whispered a learned friend to Mr. Balais, without moving his eyes, as though in rapt admiration.

"Very," returned that gentleman. "He's bidding for the Lord Chief Justiceship."

"In the whole course of my legal experience, young man," continued the judge, "I have never seen a case which seems to me to call for more exemplary punishment than yours. The punishment which I am about to award—bad for yourself, and bad for that society which, though so fitted to adorn and benefit it, you have chosen to outrage. I will not, however, reproach you further; I will rather express a hope that when you return to the world after your long probation —and it will be so long as I am able to make it—you may be a wiser and better, as well as a much older man. The sentence of the court is, that you be kept in penal servitude for the space of twenty years."

CHAPTER XXXII.

BROODING.

Nor a syllable of the judge's exhortation was lost upon the prisoner at the bar. He listened to it as attentively as if he were waiting for the thunder-clap before the muffled menace that precedes it, and the full of each big drop of rain. When the words fell it does seem more than six or seven hundred times; and then one glorious, agonized shriek, and a dull fall in the gallery below.

"This way," said a warder, sharply; and Richard was aware of the arm, and hurried through the trap-door, and down the stairs, by the way he had come.

Imprisonment for life! Twenty years' penal servitude! It was almost an eternity to him. It was time itself, and yet not so. He already beheld himself, at the end of his term of punishment, setting about to begin life afresh alone was left him on the earth—the accomplishment of his revenge. He had recognized his mother's face in the agonized wail, and knew that her iron will had given way; that the weight of this unexpected misery had overwhelmed her, her elastic and vigorous mind of consciousness—had crushed out of her, perhaps, even the power to sorrow—so, perhaps he, in his bitterness, if it had; there would then be not a single human creature left to love him. Twenty years! Why, he would make his fellows—none to counsel moderation, mercy, prudence.

That view taken by the judge had even been a correct one, as to "motive," Richard had been hardly dealt with—he had not asserted himself, as his own eyes he was an almost innocent man —the victim of an infamous conspiracy, in which he who was the most to blame had deserted him most grossly foiled. After flattering him with false hopes, he had left him to bear the whole burden alone, and in a manner even more atrocious than the desertion itself. He knew, of course, that he was making up to her evidence, to which he had looked for his preservation, that his ruin had been so complete and overwhelming: but what he hated her worst for was for their smile she had bestowed upon him as she entered the witness-box, and for the sad babe him hope where no hope was. He could not be mistaken as to that. She had known that she was about to perjure her last silence to years of misery, and yet she had had the devilish severity to smile upon him, as she had often smiled, when they had sat, cheek to cheek, together! Since they had done so, he could never lift his hand against her. He felt that now—now—for the first time day her, now even possess her; but he would have her always dead for all that. He would smite her, as she had smitten him, no matter how long the blow might be in falling: if her affections should be centered in any human creatures, against them should his rage be directed: but against her, never. Never, as long as he ordered him: he would turn their love for her to hate, if it were possible, and, if not, he would destroy them. He—for his father—for this stone devil Trevethick—it choked him to think that notion had ever really preserve him from his wrath, that the old man might die before his hour of expiation could arrive. But Solomon Gow would live: he—his vengeance. His hatred was at white heat now; what would it be after seven years of imprisonment? Richard's thinking that this terrible punishment had befallen him through such contemptible agencies—through such base and vulgar hands—was maddening; and yet he must needs feed upon that thought for twenty years, more than twenty-one, that at the end they might work out his purpose to the uttermost. There was plenty of time to ripen revenge and plot before him, and henceforth that should be his occupation. Revenge should be his latest thought and his earliest, and he might long he would dream of nothing else. His wrath against judge and jury, and the rest of them—though it only had to slain them all with a word he would have uttered it—was slight compared with the vehemence of his fury against those three at Gothin. Rage possessed him wholly, and, though without numbing the keen sense of misery of his miserable doom, rendered him almost unconscious of what was going on about him.

When he found himself in his cell again he had no recollection of how he had got there; and the warder had to repeat his sharp command, "Put on those clothes," before he could get him to understand that he was to exchange his garments for the prison suit that lay before him. It was a small matter, but it brought home to him the reality of his situation more than any thing that had yet occurred. With the deprivation of his clothes he seemed to be deprived of his individuality, and, in adopting that shameful dress, to become an atom in a congeries of outcasts. From henceforth he was not even to bear a name, but must become a number—a unit of that great sum of scoundrels which the world was so willing to forget. That he was to suffer under a system which had authored and right for its basis made his case no less intolerable to him; he felt like one suddenly seized and sold into slavery. That his master was the state was called the Law was no mitigation of his calamity; nay, it was an aggravation, since he could not cut its throat.

"It is no use, young fellow," said the warder, gruffly, as Richard looked at him like some hunted beast at bay. "If you was to kill me and a dozen more it would do you not a morsel of good; the law has got you tight, and it's better to be quiet."

Richard uttered a low moan, more woeful than any cry of physical anguish. It touched his jailer, used as he was to the contemplation of human misery. "Look here," said he; "you keep up a good heart, and get as many V G's as you can. Then you'll get out about half-a-dozen fifteen years: it ain't as if you were a lifer."

He meant it for consolation; but this unwarranted imputation of the very best that under the possibility befall poor Richard, seemed only to heighten his despondency.

"Why, when you've done it," pursued the warder, "you'll be quite a young man still—not much over forty. There's Bulkley—he's got some call to be down in the mouth, for he got it as hot as you, and he's old on, yet he's cheery enough up yonder"—and he jerked his head in the direction of the court-house—"you make your time easy, he is. You get V G's."

"What are those?" said Richard, wearily.

"Why, the best marks that can be got; and remember that every one of 'em goes to shorten your time. You must be handier with your hands, to begin with. You might be employed by some officers for the way in which that hammock is folded, and then we go your rounds in a cart, and you mean learn to sweep your room out cleaner. We couldn't stand that in one of our regulars, you know," said he pointing to some specks of dust upon the shining floor. "As for the oakum picking which will be set you to-morrow, I'll show you the great secret of that art. Your fingers will suffer a bit at first, no doubt, but you'll be a clever one at it before long. Only buckle to, and keep a civil tongue in your head, young fellow, and you'll do."

"Thank you," said Richard, mechanically.

"If you'll take my advice, you'll see about something of your own—sweepin', or polishin', or rendin' your Bible. Don't brood. But you will do as you like for this afternoon, since you won't begin regular business till to-morrow."

The warder looked keenly round the cell, probably to make sure that it offended no facilities for suicide; but the gas was not yet turned on, and it it had been, his prisoner was unaware that he looked out, and pinching light in his mouth, more than one in a similar strait to his own has found escape from his prison woes forever.

"I'll bring you some supper presently," he added; and with a familiar nod, good-naturedly intended for encouragement, he slammed the iron door behind him.

Thus he should have become an object of pity and patronage to a man like this would in itself have exasperated Richard to the point he had not been devoured by far more biting cares, and even now it galled him. His twenty years might possibly, then, by the extremity of good fare, be curtailed by five. By diligent execution of menial drudgery in his cell, by some considerable selfsatisfaction his daily toil; by careful obedience and subservience to these dacks in office, themselves but servants, and yet wielding power of life and death, he might be reported him for the most trifling faults, or for none at all, and thereby destroy even this hope—he might be a free man in fifteen years! He would, even then, be quite still, as a very young man. And that he would never be young again Richard was well aware. Whether there were three years more than that lost hour, he had already lived a life, and one that had aged him beyond the power of years. His youthful ardors, passions, hopes, loves, and all the attributes of youth, were dead with him for evermore. For the future he was old, and strong and vigorous as it will that could not have its way for fifteen years at ensilage.

Through the grating of his barrow window a few rays of the setting sun were streaming in, and they reminded him that he had supped him. What a flood of glory they were pouring on the woods of Cwmdonkin, now in their autumn splendor—on the cliffs at Gothin—on the copse that hid the Wishing Well—on the tower where he had left his mother to pray in his stead! He saw them all, and the sunset hues upon them became suddenly blood-red. He was now more at Gothin, and in imagination taking his revenge upon old Trevethick, and for the moment he was almost happy. "Pity on his grey hairs!" No, not he—though the gallows loomed before him, though hell yawned for him, he would shake his thirst in the life-blood of that perjured villain; and as for her, he would drag her by the hair to look upon her father's corpse. Where was she? Ah, with Solomon upon the castled rock, and—as he had pushed him from the edge, and there he hung exactly as he himself lead bang when Harry had preserved him! How long would a man hold on like that, even a strong man like Coe, on such a narrow ledge, with the gulls screaming about him? Not twenty years—no, nor fifteen!

The clatter of the trap in the door of his cell, as it fell in and formed a table, awoke him from this gloating dream. "Supper," said the warder, looking in at him through this orifice. "What! you're still brooding, are you?—that's no use! Throw yourself on to the port."

Some gruel and bread stood upon this little improvised side-board. If they had been the greatest delicacies imaginable, he could not have swallowed a morsel. The sunlight had faded away; his means of retribution was over: he seemed to be touching the utmost verge of his man wretchedness. Was it possible to kill himself? He wrenched had been taken away: but he had his braces. The gas-pipe was the only thing to which he could attach them, and it would never bear his weight. He was but somewhere of some poor wretch who had suffocated himself by turning his mouth downward. Had he determination enough for such a device as that? Plenty. His will was iron: he felt that: but was set on something of a different stride—that afterward, or death or life of any kind, he cared not what; but in the first place, and above all things, Vengeance! In the meantime, there were twenty years in which to think upon it! Twenty years!

The bar dined with the judge that night at Cross Key, and talked, among other things, "shop."

"A curious case that of that young fellow, Yorke," said one. "I wonder what can be his been playing his game long with these competitive examinations? That Chancellor's niece, the queer one, too—son of Lord Fitzbacon's, is he not?"

"I dare say," answered another, carelessly. "It is only vicariously that the juvenile aristocracy ever get an appointment in these days, having no title of their own. This conviction will be a great blow to them."

"Very, Josephine! but you'd better not let old Bantam hear you, for he dearly loves the Swells. By-the-by, what a pretty girl that witness is for the defense, eh, she ought to be for the prosecution, eh?"

"Yes, she is, and her lover's conch for him nicely. Is it true, I wonder, that the little trustress is going to marry that dull, heavy fellow whom nobody had much word for to-day? Gad! if I had been she, I'd have stuck to the other."

"Yes; but kissing goes by favor. She must ries him next week, I hear. Is there any thing of interest in Richard?"

"Nothing of interest to us, at all events. Smoothbore and Rubis get all there is to get out of them, confound them! I say, just pass that claret."

Not another word about Richard. The judge himself had forgotten him except as a case in his notes. The jury forgot him in a week. A murder of a shipwrecked sailor-boy was soon afterward on that coast, and became the talk of the country side in his place. The sun rose on its way, and never missed him; the rain closed up where he had used to march, and left no gap.

Richard Yorke was out of the world.

THE NEW CITY POST-OFFICE.

THE new City Post-Office, of which we give an illustration on page 725, engraved from drawings furnished by the courtesy of Superintendent DELAFIELD, will be a large, substantial, and imposing edifice. It will occupy the south end of the City Hall Park, and will have equal and similar fronts on Broadway and Park Row, with its principal façade opposite the Park. The style is classical Italian Renaissance, with some modifications in harmonize it with the surroundings. the roofs, which is French, as best suited to street architecture on a large scale. The exterior is of three Doric orders superposed, designed with increasing richness from the lower story to the main cornice. The building is substantially in form a trapezoid, its longer base crossing from Broadway to Park Row, and is planned with an open triangular court in the centre, along the main story. It includes a subbasement, basement, three stories in the walls, and a roof story.

A wide drive-way, or street, reserved by the government on the Park side of the City Hall, as an approach to that front, and secures the perfect isolation of the building, with perpetual access of light and air from that side as well as from the others, whatever changes may hereafter be made in the disposition of the adjoining property. The principal entrances are at the southwest front, under the portico which gives access to the Post-office corridor, and by a broad double staircase to the upper stories, and at the northerly corner pavilions on Broadway and Park Row, where two great elliptical stairways lead again to the higher stories, but do not communicate with the ground-floor, being reserved for the use of the courts and their dependencies above.

Beside access to the lateral entrances to the Post-office corridor on Broadway and Park Row, and to the Post-office proper on those two sides and on the Park front.

The sub-basement, or cellar, and basement cover the whole area of the lot, being extended under the sidewalks, the central court, and the drive-way. The cellar will be used for the boilers, engines, and heating apparatus, and for the storage of coal and other bulky material. It receives light and air through large areas reserved from the inclined space beneath the sidewalk. The basement and principal story are set apart for the use of the Post-office.

The principal story occupies the entire space of the building, including the interior court, which here is roofed with glass, and the walls of which, with all the interior partitions of the stories above, are in this story and the basement constructed of columns, having the whole area of the Post-office room open to light, and free for use and communication. The corridor for the use of the public occupies the entire back half of the ground-floor on the southwest front, and on Broadway and Park Row enough to include the central pavilions, and is separated from the Post-office room by a box and delivery screen. The corridor is lighted by the front and first story, and the space above it is occupied by a second, or half story, which, having no windows on the inside, forms a gallery encompassing the Post-office room on three sides. The high windows of the corridor are protected by strong bolt corridor and mezzanine, give an uninterrupted communication of light and air to the interior, and secure the supply of daylight to all the whole breadth of the glass roof over the court.

The floor of the court is also of glass, giving light to the basement, which is also lighted by means of illuminating tile in the sidewalk and openings covered by gratings under the pavilions.

In the upper stories corridors fourteen feet wide make the circuit of the whole building from these corridors rooms open on either hand toward the streets and the court-yard. The rooms over the principal entrances, and looking down Broadway, are reserved for the postmaster, and those of the deputy-postmaster and cashier are close at hand. The whole of the fifth story is given to the United States Courts. There are three court-rooms, of which the two largest are connected with two attorney rooms by bridges; adjoining them are special rooms for the judges, near which private stairs furnish the only access to the jury-rooms on the sixth floor. The remainder of the second story is occupied by rooms for marshals, United States commissioners, clerks of the courts, record-rooms, and others for uses incident to the courts. Other United States offices are in the basement, together with some of the upper stories.

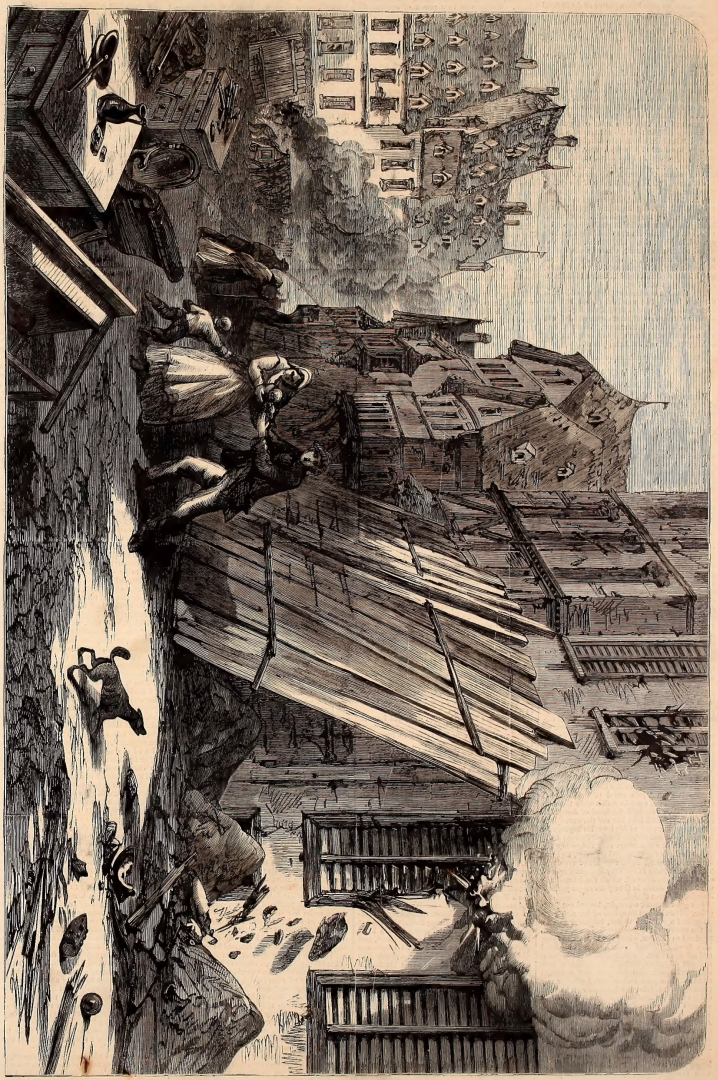
Owing to the ill-will of the city authorities, who have thrown every possible obstruction in the way of the general government, work has been prevented from commencing on the building, although permission to use that portion of the park required for the accommodation of work-shops and the temporary buildings has been granted, and the work-shops cleared away. So far only the foundations have been completed. These are of a work of great difficulty. The bed, which was to be excavated to a depth of more than thirty feet, was of loose sand, and the piles for the foundation streets were enormous. The trenches in which the walls were to be built were excavated, were to be laid were completely incased in sheetpiling, shored across with timber from side to side, and pumped constantly, which the water was carried out, and the masonry laid. The excavating was carried to the right, 10 feet below the hydrographic light. The outer walls and those of the court, and the foundations of the ranges of columns supporting the roof, rest on concrete arches beds of concrete. One hundred and fifty-nine iron columns in the basement, and 117 in the first story support the walls and floors. The piers of the cellar are of granite or arcaded brick; the walls of granite and brick; the floors of brick and iron; the stairs of stone and iron; the chimneys of stone; the roof and its ornaments of iron, covered with slate and copper.

Four large low-pressure boilers will supply the steam for heating the building, ample arrangements having been made for heat and ventilation. The roots of the corner pavilions rise 167 feet above the sidewalk. The foundation of concrete is built 35 feet below the sidewalk: the cellar is 14 feet more than ever before in the city; the basement 16 feet, the public corridor 14 feet, and the mezzanine, or gallery above, nearly the same. The cubic content of the building will be over one-fifth of a mile.

THE ART OF POMPEII.

HERCULANEUM and Pompeii, although they have furnished many exquisite statues, can not be said to have supplied our knowledge of the character and excellence of ancient sculpture. Also being the art which exists chiefly by the material in which it works, war, nor time, nor natural convulsion, can not so thoroughly destroy its evidences as the fine arts. Stone not receive a tolerable legacy. These cities rather illustrate for us the richness of their age in noble works. They have given us the exquisite Narcissus, the dancing Faun, the Apollo, the portrait statues of the Balbi, the Arrotino, the Sallustius, and a host of minor works, all of which belong to schools and are known to us by the material in which it works, war, nor time, nor natural convulsion, can not so thoroughly destroy its evidences as the fine arts. Stone does

WAR
MILITARY GLORY.



A STREET IN STRASBOURG DURING THE BOMBARDMENT.—SEE PAGE 731.

THE "CAMBRIA."

WE give, on page 724, a picture of the ill-fated steamship Cambria, which was lost, with all but one of those on board, off the coast of Ireland on the 19th ult. The only survivor of the disaster, a sailor named MCGARTLAND, states that notwithstanding the heavy weather encountered on the voyage, every thing went well until the very moment of the wreck, which occurred about ten o'clock at night. The Cambria was under full sail and steaming rapidly, when she suddenly struck on Innistrahan Island, a small rocky islet and ten miles west of Donegal, and thirty miles west of Londonderry. The vessel instantly began to fill rapidly, the large holes stove in the bottom, and the fires were soon extinguished. It became evident that the steamer was doomed. Instantly the boats were therefore directed to save the lives of the passengers, who were massed upon deck. Four boats, crowded with passengers, were launched, and put off from the sinking steamer. MR. MCGARTLAND rested one of these, and he was more of the ship or the other boats. Almost instantly upon getting into the boat it capsized, and he lost consciousness. Upon reviving he found himself in the sea, but grasping the gunwale of the boat, which had righted, he succeeded in getting on it a second time, and found therein the dead body of a lady dressed in black silk. Mr. MCGARTLAND was tossed about many hours, when he was picked up. Later accounts, by telegraph, give details of the finding of fragments of the other boats, which leave no doubt that all the rest of the crew and passengers were lost.

The Cambria was built at Glasgow, of iron, in the year 1869. She was bark-rigged, had two decks and a tonnage of 3284 feet B.M. She was 30 breadth of beam, and 22 feet depth of hold, and registered, British measurement, 1740 tons. She was a screw boat, propelled by two engines built at Glasgow, each of 750 horse-power.

LOVE WINS.

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

PAUL and Virginia, in their palm groves and glades of tropic Arcadia, were not happier, simpler, more truthful and tender lovers than Josephine Ashford and Walter Hexton. It is a certain hour when Josephine met with a piece of unexpected good fortune. Josephine was an extremely pretty girl, tall, slender, and fair. Walter was a robust, rather angular and awkward young man, with a big broad brow, and heavy jaws, and gray eyes. They were near neighbors, and had been in small town in the west of England. Walter Hexton was the son of a decent tradesman, and was studying chemistry, without any higher view, as yet, than that of opening a chemist's shop, and making a respectable living. Josephine Avent was a young lady of a class in an attorney's office. But Josephine's mother had some rich relations, who, although they had never thought her worth taking any thing for while she was yet unmarried, thought her quite worth denouncing and repudiating when she made her mésalliance. Mrs. Ascot, a weak woman with a love of gentility, venerated her relatives all the more because they had cast her off, and could never bear to hear a word said against them. In her mind, to be rich was to be endowed with celestial grace, and almost to be armed with celestial authority. She was not sorry—at least not always or pretty often sorry—that she had married an attorney's clerk, but she quite recognized the fact that, in doing so, she had committed a crime of lèse-majesté against her genteel relations, and she did not ask, did not hope, to be forgiven.

She had only one daughter, the pretty Josephine, and she was rather glad than otherwise that Josephine fell in love with a worthy and promising a young man as Walter Hexton. For Walter was a steadfast, high-principled young fellow, with strong aspirations of his own, and no taste whatever for dissipation, idleness, or frivolity. Josephine and he walked together one fine evening—took long walks on quiet roads and over breezy downs, returning often in the clear light of the moon, dear and sacred to all lovers, though Virgil may call its light malign, and Danish Ossian no longer allow his Malvina to announce it as a "pale angel of destruction." Happy, exquisite, ecstatic walks were those for poor Walter, as he held the hand of Josephine in his, and poured into her ear the unvarying, never-wearying story of his love, his hopes, his hasparations and projects for their future. Poor lovers have one advantage over lovers who are under far less of conventional restraint, and can have more frequent walks together of evenings. The lover of Julia in our alley had to use various privileges, after all, which the favored admirer of Lucy Neal in the square might perhaps occasionally have envied.

But good fortune, unsought, hunted out Josephine. Mrs. Selby Clare, one of Mrs. Ascot's relations, and a childless widow, happened to stay in the town for a day or two, in returning from Scotland to London, where she lived; and mock Mrs. Ascot felt bound to call humbly at her hotel and ask to see Mrs. Selby Clare. Mrs. Selby Clare had sort of person, and she consented to look upon and speak with her poor and humble relative. The poor and degraded relative was politic enough to bring her daughter with her, and old Mrs. Selby Clare's somewhat withered heart warmed to the graceful, pretty, lady-like girl. The visit ended in a ten-pound note to Mrs. Ascot, and a peremptory command that Josephine should, the very next week, go up to London, and there spend a fortnight in the house of her newly found relative.

"You don't think, Josephine, you will stay longer than a fortnight away from me?" These were Walter's words, spoken somewhat plaintively, the night before Josephine's departure for London, as they walked together in the moonlight. Walter was very proud of Josephine's being admired by the great relative and carried off to London, but his mind had some ominous misgivings confusedly struggling with the pride.

"No, Walter dear, I don't think so. I don't mean to, indeed, of course, Mrs. Selby Clare should insist on it. She may, you know."

"She may, indeed; I should think so. Of course she'll want you to be kept in the glasscase at the girl with the look of one who held it to be an obvious and perfect fact that all lucky relations or other person who once had Josephine near her must wish to keep her there.

"Well, if she does, Walter, then, you know, I can not venture to refuse Mrs. Selby Clare."

"No, dear, I suppose not. But you know, Josephine, I almost wish sometimes Mrs. Selby Clare had never found you out."

"Oh, Walter!" said the pretty girl. My mother's next relative. And so good a woman! And so rich! I quite expect that in a fortnight's time you'll ought to be very glad—only you men are all so selfish."

"I suppose we are," said poor Walter, with a sigh; and he urged the matter no further.

Next morning early Josephine was off to London. Her father, her mother, and Walter accompanied her to the railway station. Walter had the privilege of handing her into the train, swept out of the station he caught a final fading glimpse of Josephine's fair, pale, pretty face, and then turned away in complacent smile on it. She had left him with a complacent smile! His heart was burning.

But he was not a jealous creature. It was no wonder, he told himself, that Josephine should be a little dazzled at the bright prospects now evidently opening for her, and if for her, of course for him, if Josephine she were his wife. She need be selfish creatures, indeed, as she had said; otherwise he would at once have understood why he showed on her face a hopeful gratitude for their first parting.

Life for the next few months was all pleasure and brightness to Josephine, all hard work and dullness to poor Walter. Josephine was plunged at once into a new, brilliant, fascinating kind of existence, which, entirely novel as it was, seemed quite natural and welcome to her. She breathed in it with delicious freedom. Mrs. Selby Clare had money enough, and some good taste, and moved in a good circle. She had a house in the Park Lane region, and gave pleasant dinnerparties; and Josephine proved quite an attraction at such assemblies, and went through all the enjoyments of a London season—the ball, the opera, the concert, the fête champêtre, the fête champêtre, the straw-berry breakfast, and the rest, with a fresh zest upon acknowledgment of the fact that she was prettier doubly attractive. Then, it was well known that Mrs. Selby Clare had no children, or relations and connections near the relations of any kind; and the natural presumption was that this pretty, graceful, fascinating young girl would be the very whom as "almost" my niece, indeed almost my adopted daughter," would accompany her to Paris, and which invitation added not a little to the lustre of Josephine's triumph. Josephine was not at all insensible to these charms, and formed, indeed, ideas of splendid future which surrounded them and set them off.

Toward the close of the season, for the visit of a fortnight had, of course, swelled itself into weeks and months, Josephine was startled, and slightly alarmed, to receive a letter announcing a conflicting in a moment—by receiving a card with the name of "Mr. Walter Hexton" engraved on it, and being told that the owner of the card was below, and wished to see her. Whereupon she turned very deeply red, and the following thoughts and wishes passed successively through her mind, in the instant necessary for her to hold the card in her hand and hesitated as to what she should say:

"Walter here! Why! How delighted I am to see him!

"How did he contrive to get to town just now?

"How glad I am that he had a card!

"I wonder what he took to think of me?"—and she glanced at the looking-glass.

"I wonder what he took Mrs. Selby Clare will think!

"How unlucky that he should have come just now, when we're herself that Walter's here!

"I don't know, perhaps it is rather lucky, on the whole.

"I wonder how long he is going to stay in town!

"I hope not long—oh no, I don't hope any thing of the kind!

And then, to strife all further doubts and hopes, she ran down stairs, and presently received Walter. Well, she was compelled to acknowledge to herself that Walter looked very handsome in a West End youth. His dress seemed rural and provincial; so did his hands; and there was a certain awkwardness in his manner, a hesitation on his face, which young Belgravia does not quite itself to see. But he looked very well indeed. Her heart quite warmed to him, however, and she ran up and caught him by both hands, and he wondered why he did not kiss her, and why she did not. Then he did kiss her, and he blushed so much in the act that she blushed too.

They sat and talked, and he grew less constrained. He had come to town because of a chemical discovery, apparently of some importance, which he believed he had made, and about which he had written—not knowing any thing better to do—to a famous London savant, whom even Mayfair and Tyburnia admired. The famous savant had actually replied in friendly, kindly style, and had declared that he thought there was something in Walter's idea, that he would look into it, and that meantime he should be glad to see Walter and talk with him. So Walter came up to town, and was going to the house of the great man of science that very morning, but first, of course, he must come and see Josephine. Then he said, very awkwardly, that he hoped she was happy, that she looked splendid and quite like a great lady, and that he supposed she was never coming back to the old town any more. She scented him all over as was returning homeward—as soon as the season closed; and she began to give him a little outline of the kind of life she had been leading for the past few months, and as she thought of the flight of time, and looked at her watch, was quite beginning to tell him that she was going out, when Mrs. Selby Clare entered from the morning room, opening into the room and asking her whether she was not yet ready. Then Josephine presented Walter to Mrs. Selby Clare, who made but a few gracious and distant and Walter knew that he must go. He was agitated, and beginning to go, and longed beyond measure for one other moment of Josephine alone. That joy, however, he was not destined to have; and he left the room without a chance of exchanging a syllable with Josephine, except by pressing her hand. Mrs. Selby Clare that he would be welcome if he were to call again.

He was received with great kindness and consideration by the scientific man, who talked a long time with him, and urged him to study in London, and, with Germany, offering him letters to many great professors in those places. Then he said Walter Hexton—one and so him as often as he pleased, and allowed quite an interest in him. A year's study in London, he said, would be a while Walter wild with hope and joy; but, now, somehow, it did not seem to all to him. He did not appear to him that a proficiency in chemistry would be quite enough to make him rich, or to make of money and social position in the circles wherein Josephine had so suddenly found admission, and wherein even already she seemed to be so much at home.

The two who had been lovers met no more that time. Josephine returned to Mrs. Ascot's house during the winter, but Walter did not even then see much of her. He was, indeed, a good deal in London, working hard at science. Nothing was said of their old engagement. It had apparently passed so entirely out of the world of real life that Walter thought it would be a piece of presumption on his part if he were even to offer to remind Josephine of it. Was it "This long time," he thought to himself, bitterly, "it has been practically at an end. . . . Josephine has forgotten it, and I have no right to remind her in any way that it ever had an existence. She only wished to forget it."

Mrs. Selby Clare had evidently taken quite a fancy to Josephine. She sent for her in the winter, and made a visit to Nice. Josephine's father and mother had not the spirit to refuse. They could not imagine that it would only be a visit in the way of their child's advancement. They were very good people, in the negative, harmless sense of the very strictly failed to understand that their child might lose higher interests to advance than any which could belong to the scor of a rich old woman could make or mar.

Josephine had many admirers, but as yet not many offers. Admirers, indeed, something too uncertain about the basis of her future fortune to satisfy the prudent young men of the day. Then, there came to consider the matter seriously and closely. But she met at Nice with a very rich and influential man—a leading partner in a banking-house, and member of Parliament, who could probably be in high office in a few years, if he had lately been made a baronet. This gentleman fell in love with her; kept up his love for her when he went back again to London, and early in the season proposed to her, telling her frankly that her personal fortune was not a matter of any importance or consideration whatever to him. Now Josephine was not, by any means, in love with Sir John Ridell—not the least in the world in society, now that the startling novelty and dazzling gloss of the thing were wearing off, and more she began to years after some sensation deeper and more real than that of variety and gratified vanity and ambition. But she liked Sir John Ridell sometimes—often—better than she cared to—and she sometimes doubted whether she could bring herself to say no. But she had lost him; she did not know now even where he was; and there was no use in thinking about a man who was not any more. She might as well marry Sir John Ridell; there was no help for it; and compared to him; the man whom would make her rich; she could do any thing she pleased for her family; she could, perhaps, through her influence, do something one day for poor Walter. She would be Lady Ridell; and what a delightful position it would be to drive in her carriage through the streets of the old town of her birth, and be known there as Lady Ridell! And after all, there was no sin in the thing, and she and be proud of, even though one might not feel one's heart quite satisfied. She thought she had better accept Sir John Ridell.

Mrs. Selby Clare thought so too, and with a charming frankness reminded Josephine that she had not a penny of her own, and only depended for a fortune on the generosity of her, Mrs. Selby Clare. "I am very fond of you, my dear," said she old lady; "but then, you know, we may quarrel some day, although it does not look likely just now. I am capricious, and I am a woman; so are you, and we may fight at any moment; and I really think you had better secure yourself at once against all chances."

So Josephine Ascot accepted the proposal of Sir John Ridell, and was to become Lady Ridell in a few months. And she received many congratulations, and congratulated herself a great deal, telling herself, over and again, that it was like a dream, and pitying to herself the poor girl whose face had prepared for magnificent future a kind of face and exultant all day and in society. But at night, in her room alone, and in her dreams, perhaps bad, her thoughts even way, her hopes seemed into sad ghosts, crowding around her—and she shed a great many tears, and then tugged for the day, and the light, and the society, and the animal spirits again.

The weeks and months went by, and it was once drew drawing toward the close of the season. One night there was a brilliant reception, or conversazione, in the rooms of one of the great scientific societies, and Sir John Ridell, who took some interest in science, was invited and so were Mrs. Selby Clare and Josephine Ascot. The rooms were crowded, and all the celebrities of science, letters, art, politics, and travel were gathered together. Even Josephine, with all her present weariness of mind, felt soon interest in looking around her, and exchanging a word or two with this or that famous person—a great and world-wide something more than mere admiration of science in the emotion she felt, and the color which came into her cheeks, when Sir John Ridell brought up and introduced to her the distinguished man who had been poor Walter Hexton's sole friend in science, who longed to ask for Walter, but she could hardly bring herself to make the venture. She feared that the blood would rush into her cheeks, that her voice would tremble, and that some curious eyes and ears would possibly observe in her unpleasant significance to such symptoms of feeling.

A moment or two after she heard the savant say to her affianced husband:

"Sir John, I want to introduce to you a young scientific man, in whom I see a great deal of promise. He has just come back from a mission into Central Australia, to which he requested, at one of our best scientific societies. Here he is. Glad to see you, Hexton; and come here, I wish to introduce you to my friend Sir John Riddell."

And Josephine, looking up, saw Walter Hexton, her old lover, introduced to her betrothed husband. He was the old Walter still. More manly, more self-possessed, self-sustained, more perhaps, and with a darker tint on his face; but with the broad forehead, the gray eyes, the massive jaws, the same look and the same, simple, honest look and bearing. As she gazed at him the old, long-forgotten emotions came back upon her, all the interval since first she left her father's house seemed to have dropped completely out of her life and out of her memory; the pleasure, the frivolity, the mean hopes, the ignoble ambitions, the vanity and pride, disloyalty and treachery—all sank away, and she felt as if nothing remained in her heart but the true love which, from her childhood up to her early womanhood, had filled it.

The crowd separated her—and she allowed herself to be separated—from Walter and Sir John Selby Clare and from Sir John Riddell. The crowd, too, brought her quite near Walter. Walter was alone for a brief space, and quietly Josephine laid her hand gently on Hexton's arm, and he looked round and saw her.

"Walter," she said, in a low and tremulous tone, "you have not forgotten me?"

"Forgotten you, Josephine? No, I have not forgotten. I have tried to forget, but I could not." He spoke in voice so low, and with so much self-control and suppressed emotion, that she could barely catch his words.

"And I, too, Walter; I have tried to forget; but I could not, and I shall try no more."

He turned his eyes, which he had previously kept on the ground, upon her face, and read her meaning in the look which her eyes gave him back. He took her hand—it was not withheld—it Then they were separated, or allowed themselves to be separated, again. Their converse had lasted but lasted a minute, but, in that short enough, Walter Hexton went home with a heart swelling with unexpected joy, and Josephine and the soldier resolved to be true to her love which he long been endeavoring to crush.

Josephine Ascot went home with a mind more troubled, certainly, than his, for she had a perplexing, painful knot to untie, and the most honorable intention to displease and offend at the very least; and she looked upon much of her recent conduct with self-reproach and shame. But she felt so much of relief and happiness that at last she saw her way to duty and truth, and had recovered to her true allegiance. Come what might, she would never marry Sir John Riddell.

She kept her purpose to herself as Mrs. Selby Clare and she drove home together in the carriage. Mrs. Selby Clare then reached the house and were alone she broke out at once with her confession, and told her passionate she never could love Sir John Riddell, and she told her the reason why. "Because I love Walter Hexton! I did not know it fully until to-night—at least I thought I had perhaps stifled it and killed it, to the meaning—but I do know I was deceiving myself that I loved him still; and I never will be weak and wicked enough to marry another man!"

"This is delightful, I do declare, Miss Clare, dryly, "and quite affecting, no doubt, at least to romantic persons—a class to which I don't belong. May I ask what you propose to do with Sir John Riddell?"

"I will tell him all—the whole plain truth. He will then know I can not marry him, and he will forgive me."

"I wish you had thought of this sooner, Josephine. It is very unpleasant; it puts me in quite a false position, and I'm hardly grateful, I think, pray he good enough to explain to Sir John that it is no doing of mine—that I have no hand in the business.

"I will make that plain to him, Mrs. Selby Clare, for I will go back at once to my father's house. Oh, don't think I am ungrateful, or that I can ever forget all your kindness and generosity—but after this—after I have done what I know you wish me not to do—I feel I have no right to remain under your roof any longer."

Mrs. Selby Clare only bowed, and said nothing. Perhaps she was beginning to wish for some novelty, and the excitement of a great scandal about Josephine would have been a fresh and pleasing sensation. That hope frustrated, she was not sorry to be rid of Josephine, and to be spared the talk of the ingratitude of girls.

Next day Josephine told Sir John Riddell all. It was a heavy blow, but he bore it bravely, like a gentleman, and was generous and forgiving. And Josephine seemed to feel that she was not richer by a coin than when she left it, but proud and happy.

Walter soon found her. He was yet but a struggling man, able to welcome his young wife to nothing better than a modest income and a humble home. But she was glad and happy to be thus welcomed; and she has faith in him, and believes him destined to rise in the world. It is her wish that, she has love for him, and were he never to rise at all he will be happy, and look brightly on life together.

EGYPTIAN ARCHITECTURE.

In the first historical reign—the reign of Menes—there was a little dabbling in waterworks, but scarcely this, that the whole valley of the Nile, or of one of its main branches, was diverted from its course to favor the planting of the city of Memphis. The engineer who undertook the job—and tradition credits the monarch himself with the occupation—must have possessed the soul of Mrs. Partington, with something more than that lady's scientific acquirements. Mrs. Partington accurately understood the power which he resolved to oppose, and constructed a dyke "whose height exceeded that of embankments," says Wilkinson, "turned the water to the eastward, and effectually confined the river to its new bed." The dyke has also likewise shown to Abraham, in whose day the diversion of the river was, as did a single at the account of Joan of Arc or Jack Cade is to us. This is taking the very mildest calculation of the antiquity of Memphis. And in the days of Moeris, farther on, was formed an artificial lake, measuring, according to Herodotus, four hundred and fifty miles in circumference, and three hundred feet in depth. This huge lake was fed by the Nile through artificial channels, it received and stored a portion of the annual overflow, and, when that subsided, reregurgited upon the river by the same channels, and, at the times of refreshing, and extending the fertilizing influence to the land, which, but for the art, would be absolutely barren, and, no doubt, was barren before the days of Moeris. Herodotus, and those exactly following him, were wrong, it is now thought, in supposing that this immense lake was wholly a work of art. There was probably a natural basin to suggest the scheme, but this was greatly increased: and all the feeding canals, the arteries and veins of the system, were undoubtedly artificial. These last had their flood-gates, dams, and locks, and were managed with the greatest skill.

The mass of masonry in the Great Pyramid, according to Bunsen, measures 5,985,000 cubic feet, and would weigh 6,316,000 tons. The dimensions of the separate stones are not very great, but the quality raised above vile the excellence these old workmen did their quarrying. And they not only got this stone out of the rock and laid it with some skill. Mr. Kenrick, speaking of the casing of the Great Pyramid, says: "The joints are scarcely perceptible, and not wider than the thickness of silver-paper; and the cement so tenacious that fragments of the casing-stones still remain in their original position, notwithstanding the lapse of so many centuries, and the violence by which they must be attached. All the fine work of the interior passages, where granite is not employed, consists of the same stone"—to wit, the limestone of the Mokattam quarries—"and finished with the same beautiful exactness." But the skill in quarrying was displayed more in the extracting of the huge blocks out of which obelisks and colossal statues were hewn. Obelisks ninety and statues forty feet high, each fashioned out of one stone, were not uncommon things; and the blocks selected for these monuments were not chance splinters from barbarous efforts of splitting and quarrying, but clean blocks—quadratim secundum artem, from the native rock, after being selected and accurately defined. And how was this done? By driving in huge iron wedges? No, indeed; that would probably have split the stone. By infinite labor, then, in chipping and sawing? Pooh! the old Egyptians knew a trick somewhat cleverer than that: they cut a small groove along the whole length of, say, one hundred feet, and in the inserted a number of dry wooden wedges: they poured water upon them in the groove, and the wedges, expanding simultaneously and with great force, split the huge fragment as neatly as a strip of glass is taken off by a diamond. They had a way, too, of moving about these vast monoliths which we, with all appliances and means to boot, would find it hard to imitate.

Now such work would have been very astonishing, even if it had ended in Cyclopean sovereignty, like Stonehenge; but we know very well that it ended in nothing of the kind. The separation from the native rock was but the beginning of artistic treatment. Every fragment, great or small, had its billet, and was taken off to undergo a series of transformations; the least that could happen to any one being to be plain smoothed, and then left with consummate skill in a building. Twenty years ago it would have been wise to say little or nothing of the Karnak, notwithstanding that Herodotus considered it to be a wonder next second to even the Pyramids. For such have been the destructions and inhumations of this splendid work that nobody believed it to be anything more than ruins, even its site, and not a few were inclined to look upon the whole account as an invention. The truth, however, at the end of last century, affirmed that they had found the ruins, and every year that passed added to them and verified the French work. Gradually it came to be acknowledged that the foundations at least of the Labyrinth might be real, and the labors of the Prussian Commission effected a considerable clearance in the chambers of that building. But there is still much dispute about the purpose and the form of it; and what has been realized of it has been chiefly brought out to confirm the account given by Herodotus. He tells us that it had three thousand rooms, half of them above the ground and half below, and he goes on to say: "The upper chambers I myself passed through, and what I say concerning them is from my own observation. Of the underground chambers I can only speak from report; for the keepers of the building could not be got to show them, since they contained (as they said) the sepulchres of the kings who built the Labyrinth, and also those of the sacred crocodiles. This it is from hearsay only that I can speak of the lower chambers. The upper chambers, however, I saw with my own eyes, and found them to be the most far-fetched productions; for the passages through the houses, and the varied windings of the paths across the courts, excited in me infinite admiration as I passed from the courts into chambers, and from the chambers into colonnades, and from the colonnades into fresh houses, and again from these into courts unseen before. The roof was throughout of stone, like the walls; and the walls were carved all over with figures. Every court was surrounded with a colonnade, which was built of white stones, exquisitely fitted together. At the corner of the Labyrinth stands a pyramid forty fathoms high, with large figures engraved on it, which is erected by a subterranean passage." It is, perhaps, needless to say there exists nothing at present of which there is so little now to be seen; but there is nothing more certain than that there was, or both, at Karnac—a part of what was once Thebes—the grandeur of which a visitor may yet, for himself, form a conception from the mass of buildings in nearly square, and the side measures about 1,800 English feet. Travelers, one and all, appear to have been unable to find words to express the feelings with which these ruins inspired them. Diodorus, Strabo, and others astounded and overcome by the magnificence and the vastness of the remains appear to be admired. Courts, halls, gateways, pillars, obelisks, monolithic figures, sculptures, rows of sphinxes, are mentioned by the historians of the past; but even they reasonably believe that no description can possibly convey the full impression which the spectator will find this section of the country, and that self-possession will enable to meet the slight shocks that may come from time to time.

The same laws of this State positively prohibit hunting, shooting, or trapping on Sunday, under the penalty of a heavy fine, and in default of payment, imprisonment. Half the fine goes to the informer. Quail-shooting is prohibited in Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond counties at any time for the next two years.

The highest military decoration of Russia is the Order of St. George. It has been conferred by the Czar upon Baron Von Moltke.

It has been suggested that in the event of the siege of Paris being prolonged until provisions grow scarce, it may be worth while for the friends of the besieged to consider whether food could not be dropped from balloons into the city as effectually as bombs. Large quantities of Liebig's extract of best might thereof in this manner, and would be very acceptable when every thing else is eaten up.

A good deal has been said recently about the so-called "Seeping Beauty"—a case which has been brought before the public at several different times. The details are familiar to most of our readers. A young woman, residing in Lewis co., retiring in Tennessee, is said to have slept most of the time for the last twenty-one years, swaking to consciousness for but intervals enough to take nourishment during the day and night. She appears in good health, though certain paroxysms measure for certain periods, and is now under the care of St. Louis, and a committee of physicians were appointed to investigate the case. Inquiry declared that she had taken no medicine, nor adopted any measures for exciting her system, and somewhat which were suggested were declined. It was proposed to watch the case for forty-eight consecutive hours, which was also declined. Dr. Hammond, however, by which the case could be observed in the night by a proper secretary of the committee, and their report concludes as follows: "Having given the case considerable study and attention, we consider it important to accept the forger, as he supposed, and the culprit was confronted with a partner. The clerk explained the circumstances. "Well," replied the offender, to the clerk's astonishment, "I am Lord Cockburn." The partner, who knew the family and the peculiar circumstances of the case well, looked steadily at the young man for a minute, and then said to the clerk, "Yes, it is quite right; pay the check." Lord Cockburn, at the time of his death, was engaged to a young girl of highly respectable antecedents, in humble life, whose parents were reluctant to be but ignorant of the real position of the suitor.

WOUNDED SOLDIERS AT VERSAILLES.

The magnificent palace of Versailles, once the residence of the Bourbon kings of France, and dedicated to the glory of all the exhibition of historical and national glories, is now converted into a German military hospital under the redcross flag. Its picture-galleries, as may be seen by the illustration on page 732, are filled with the low iron bedsteads of the wounded soldiers, placed on the floor beneath the long array of portraits and battle-paintings which adorn the walls; and the magnificent saloons, once full of gayety, and servants of the hospital pass to and fro, attending to those in need. Convalescent patients, some of them cripples, others with bandaged heads, lounge in the gardens, upon the ornamental terrace or the lawns, to enjoy the fresh air and sunshine.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The Cincinnati Industrial Exposition of 1870 has been a great success. Even its most sanguine friends were astonished at the intense interest which was awakened in the entire community in it, and which was kept up, unblemished, to the very last moment when the great display was open to the public. For twenty-eight days the curious from distant and adjoining States, and not a few from distant sections of the country, wandered through the crowded halls of the Exposition, not merely as superficial observers, but intent on understanding the why and the how of the many and beautiful things on exhibition. About 48,000 visitors were admitted during the four weeks, and the receipts amounted to about $50,000. A noticeable feature was the immense number of children who thronged the halls of the Exposition. In the midst of learning and reviving wheels, and the working of poisonous machinery, an accident occurred to mar the day so far as known. Cincinnati may well congratulate herself on the results of this Exposition.

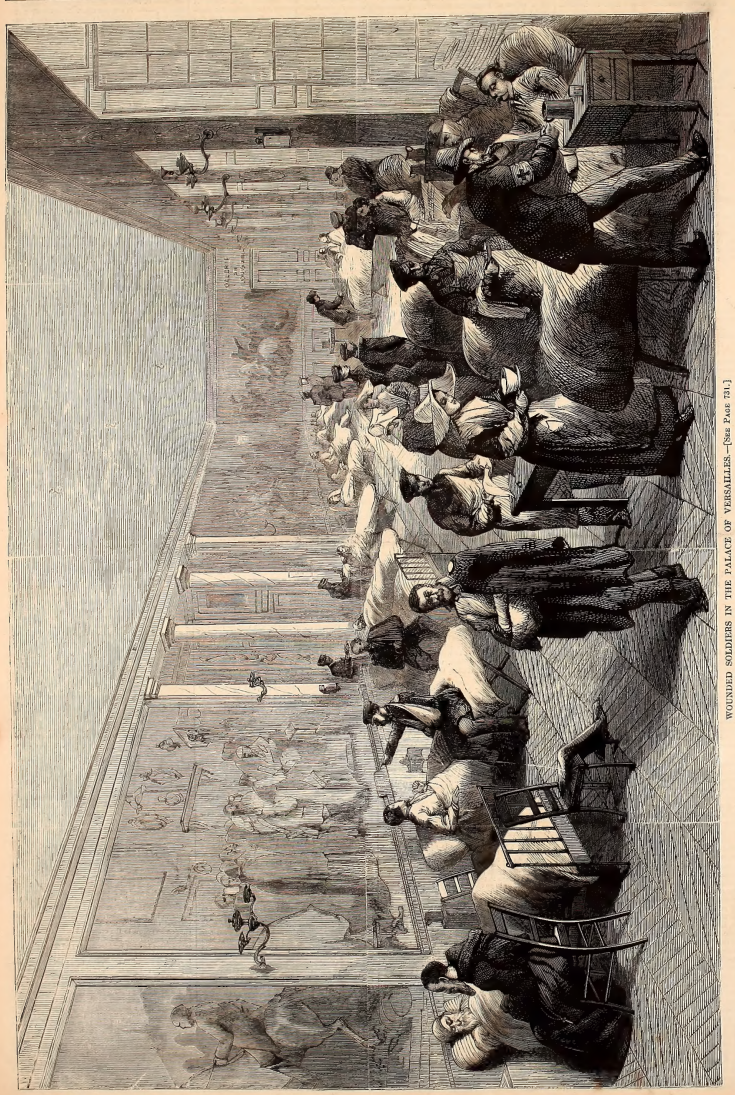
During the recent earthquake, which shook with more or less power various sections of our country, a Boston school-teacher reasoned her pupils by remarking, calmly, that it was "a providential wisdom—it's only an earthquake." Whether shutting doors and windows is a wise thing for us to do in case of an earthquake, may be a question. Nor are we, in this latitude, likely to have many earthquakes; and scions of this nature as to make it necessary for us to devote much time to the consideration of the question. Suggestion it may be accepted that it be a good plan to jump out of a fourth-story window, and screaming as loudest, in the case of fire. Even when an earthquake is felt, people fall on their faces, and pray to God to deliver them from danger. It is to be hoped that we shall not be obliged to test the advantages of any other method of avoiding earthquakes. We may reasonably believe that no very disastrous earthquakes will rend this section of the country, and that self-possession will enable us to meet the slight shocks that may come from time to time.

The game laws of this State positively prohibit hunting, shooting, or trapping on Sunday, under the penalty of a heavy fine, and in default of payment, imprisonment. Half the fine goes to the informer. Quail-shooting is prohibited in Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond counties at any time for the next two years.

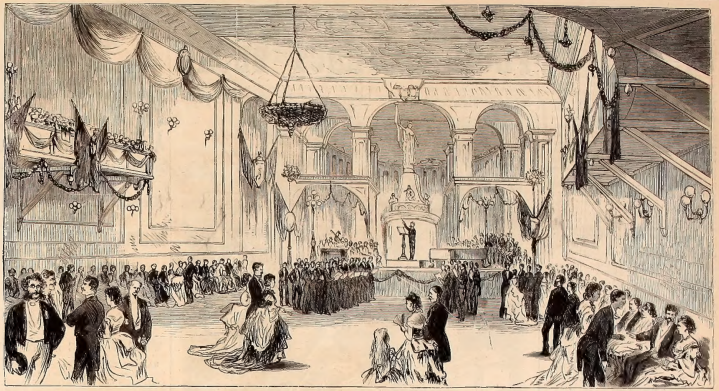
The highest military decoration of Russia is the Order of St. George. It has been conferred by the Czar upon Baron Von Moltke.

It has been suggested that in the event of the siege of Paris being prolonged until provisions grow scarce, it may be worth while for the friends of the besieged to consider whether food could not be dropped from balloons into the city as effectually as bombs. Large quantities of Liebig's extract of best might thereof in this manner, and would be very acceptable when every thing else is eaten up.

A good deal has been said recently about the so-called "Seeping Beauty"—a case which has been brought before the public at several different times. The details are familiar to most of our readers. A young woman, residing in Lewis co., retiring in Tennessee, is said to have slept most of the time for the last twenty-one years, swaking to consciousness for but intervals enough to take nourishment during the day and night. She appears in good health, though certain paroxysms measure for certain periods, and is now under the care of St. Louis, and a committee of physicians were appointed to investigate the case. Inquiry declared that she had taken no medicine, nor adopted any measures for exciting her system, and somewhat which were suggested were declined. It was proposed to watch the case for forty-eight consecutive hours, which was also declined. Dr. Hammond, however, by which the case could be observed in the night by a proper secretary of the committee, and their report concludes as follows: "Having given the case considerable study and attention, we consider it important to accept the forger, as he supposed, and the culprit was confronted with a partner. The clerk explained the circumstances. "Well," replied the offender, to the clerk's astonishment, "I am Lord Cockburn." The partner, who knew the family and the peculiar circumstances of the case well, looked steadily at the young man for a minute, and then said to the clerk, "Yes, it is quite right; pay the check." Lord Cockburn, at the time of his death, was engaged to a young girl of highly respectable antecedents, in humble life, whose parents were reluctant to be but ignorant of the real position of the suitor.



WOUNDED SOLDIERS IN THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES.—[See Page 731.]



ITALIAN JUBILEE IN NEW YORK—CELEBRATING THE LIBERATION OF ROME.

ITALIAN UNITY.

THE Italians residing in New York held a festival in Apollo Hall on the evening of October 28, to celebrate the liberation of Rome and the consequent unification of Italy under one government. The hall was tastefully decorated with flags and flowers, and a colossal pictorial representation of free Italy towered over the platform where the speakers of the evening were assembled. The speeches were all in the same spirit of enthusiastic congratulation; and though an unfortunate and ill-timed attack upon the personal character and national policy of VICTOR EMANUEL by one of the speakers threatened for a moment to disturb its harmony, the festival passed in the most agreeable manner. Among the attractions of the evening was the singing of a fine martial chorus, composed expressly for the occasion by Signor BARILI. Our artist has chosen this as the subject of his illustration.

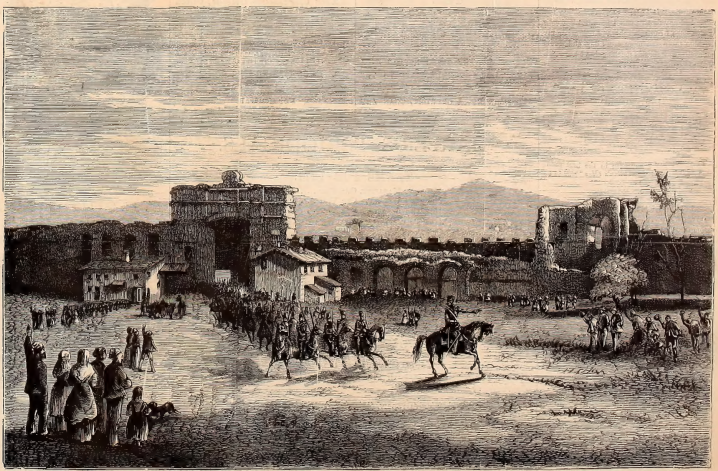
THE LIBERATION OF ROME.

THE entry of the main body of the Italian troops into the city of Rome, which forms the subject of an illustration on this page, took place at the Porta San Giovanni, where the attack was directed by General ANGIOLETTI. At the same time General BIXIO attacked the western gate, called Porta San Pancrazio, by which the French took the city in 1849, while the rest of the army attacked Porta San Lorenzo, Porta Pia, and a part of the city wall between Porta Pia and Porta Salara, close to the Villa Bonaparte, where the Papal Zouaves had taken up their position. The garrison, not including some of the Pope's Italian troops who refused to fight, numbered above 9000 men—the Zouaves, the carabineers, the Antibes legion, the dragoons, the squadrigieri (said to be recruited from the inmates of prisons), and the gens d'armes; but it is probable that not more than half of these were actually engaged. They were Frenchmen, Bavarians, Swiss, and Belgians.

The gates of the city were barricaded and fortified by ramparts of earth, as in 1867, when GARIBALDI was expected to attack them.

The defense was commanded by the General Baron KANZLER, a German officer holding the post of pro-Minister of War. The garrison had sixty pieces of artillery; and the walls, forming a complete circuit of thirteen miles about the city, are of great height and thickness, and of solid brick masonry, having been erected, for the most part, in the times of the ancient Roman empire, chiefly in the reign of AURELIAN. Nevertheless, they could not long withstand the attack of a modern army bringing up all its batteries within eighty yards of the city walls and gates. The artillery fire of the besiegers, which began at five o'clock in the morning, was accompanied by a sharp interchange of musket bullets, with loss of life on both sides, between the Papal Zouaves and the Italian bersaglieri and troops of the line. This went on till about ten o'clock in the forenoon, by which time each division of the Italian forces had succeeded in destroying a gate or opening a breach, and was enabled thereby to force its way into the city, without much resistance of hand-to-hand fighting.

By orders of the Pope, expressly given to General KANZLER, the Papal troops capitulated as soon as the Italians entered the city. They gave up their arms, and were sent away from Rome, next day, to the port of Civita Vecchia, whence they were conveyed by sea to Marseilles. The castle of St. Angelo was consigned to Italian troops. One division of the Italian army remained to occupy Rome; the rest were conducted to other parts of the country. The Romans have voted in favor of their union with the kingdom of Italy. The Pope still remains at the Vatican, having published, through Cardinal ANTONELLI, his protest against these proceedings. The Roman nobles, with Prince BONCOMPAGNI at their head, seem to acquiesce in the change of government.



ENTRY OF THE ITALIAN TROOPS INTO ROME.

WEDDING-RING RHYMES.

"THE merit of having writ a posy of a ring." It appears that Mr. Richard Steele uses this expression in irony, and as if Mr. Spectator thought there was little merit in having writ a posy of a ring. There is, however, a charm about some of these posies that is engendered of their quaintness and their Pith. It is with pleasure that we see them revived on many of the wedding-rings exposed in the windows of the jewelers at this present time. The immediate derivation of posy is very clearly from poesie or posey, the r having been cut out. But posy is commonly applied by the country people to a large or small bunch of flowers their gardens afford in plenty in the gay seasons of spring and summer. Bouquet is another word applied to a homely bouquet, or bunch of rustic garden flowers. The analogy to the French bouquet is close, and it has been suggested that bean-pot is, perhaps, a more correct orthography than bowpot. However, in whichever way the word is spelled, it is at this day in very common use in certain districts of England. To revert, however, to posy, in its application to a short sentence of verse inscribed on a ring, and generally the wedding or a keepsake ring, we may quote a few of those inscriptions from old rings, dating from the year 1566 downward.

"Death never parts
Such loving hearts."

There is another, equally old:

"Love and respect
I do expect."

This also is from a very old ring:

"In God and thee Shall my joy be."

Later we have:

"Dryfesdy knitt by Grace are wee, Lately two, now one, the pledg here see."
R. and A., 1657.

"Love and live happy."—1660.

"Happy in thee Hath God made me."

"God did decree
One unlike."

Of a still later date is a punning one:

"Endles as this Shall be our bliss."
THOMAS BUNE, 1719.

Most of these couplets are strongly imbued with the spirit of loyalty—to wit, under date 1646:

"I love the rod,
And thee, and God."

Which shows a spirit of feminine subjection now rather uncommon. But all the devotion was not on one side, for we find on another old ring:

"I doe rejoice
In thee, my choice."

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"I HAVE used one of Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines (No. 2762) nearly fourteen years, making cloaks for the last eleven years, and doing all other kinds of sewing, down to book muslin. It is now in perfect order, has never had any repairs, and I have not broken a needle since I can remember. I appreciate my machine more and more every day, and would not exchange it for any machine that I know."—M. BUDLONG, Utica, N. Y.

VAST QUANTITIES OF IVORY DESTROYED.

THOUSANDS of teeth that might last a lifetime are lost every year, simply because the parties concerned either forget or do not appreciate the fact that Sozodont, duly applied, renders the dental substance proof against decay.

Accidents will occur even in the best regulated families, and "Spalding's Glue" should be kept handy.—[Com.]

BEETHOVEN.

"MESSRS. PRANG & CO. have published a chromo portrait of BEETHOVEN, in two sizes, which is meeting with favor among musical and music-loving people."—N. Y. Tribune.

A YOUTH'S PUBLICATION.—For nearly half a century the Youth's Companion, of Boston, has been published. It was started in 1827, and is to-day one of the brightest and most vigorous papers with which we are acquainted.—[Com.]

LOW PRICES—NO RISK—FULL GUARANTEE. FOR PRICE-LIST of Genuine WALTHAM WATCHES, which can be sent by Express to any part of the country, write to HOWARD & CO., 710 Broadway, New York, stating you saw this in Harper's Weekly.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TIN-LINED PIPE. PREVENTS POISONING from Lead water, and costs but little more than Lead Pipe. It is stronger, more durable, and flexible, and is easily soldered. Circulars and sample of Pipe sent by mail free. WILLIAMS, HAVILAND & CO., 161 Water St., N. Y. WILLIARD MFG. CO., 319 Centre St., N. Y.

1500 DISTRESSING CASES OF CONSUMPTION Cured without medicine. A grateful mother will cheerfully send the remedy free to any one afflicted. Address MRS. C., care of Gen. WILCOX, Cohoes, N. Y.

HELMBOLD'S
FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU

Contains all the valuable properties of the plant in a highly-concentrated form, and is much prized by the medical profession as a positive remedial agent for diseases immediately connected with the bladder, kidneys, and urinary organs, as well as for organic weakness and extreme prostration.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE,
FOR
H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist,
594 BROADWAY, New York.

☞ Beware of Counterfeits.

$10 made from 50c.! Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars. R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

$16 00 for $5 00. The Phrenological Journal is a First-Class Family Magazine, devoted to Phrenology, Ethnology, Physiology, and Education. $3 00.

The Christian Union, edited by HENRY WARD BEECHER, $2 00 a year: the "Journal," $3 00; "The Doctor," $5 00, and "Marshall's Engraving of Washington," $5 00, will all be sent to new subscribers for $9 00. 20 cents extra for mailing. Send at once to S. R. WELLS, 389 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE FLORENCE
WILL SEW EVERY THING NEEDED IN A FAMILY, FROM THE HEAVIEST TO THE LIGHTEST FABRIC. IT DOES MORE WORK, AND MORE KINDS OF WORK, THAN ANY OTHER MACHINE.

N. B.—Either of Harper's, with the Journal and Chromo, for $6 00, or with all the above for $8 00.

ESTD. 1839. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' SAPOLIO, For General Household purposes IS BETTER AND CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

[For particulars for Remitting Moneys, Postage, &c., see next page.]

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER'S MAGAZINE, besides being profusely illustrated, contains nearly DOUBLE THE AMOUNT OF MATTER furnished in either The Galaxy, The Atlantic, Lippincott, or Scribner. It exceeds in about the same ratio any English Magazine of the same general class, such as Blackwood, Fraser, Macmillan, Temple Bar, Belgravia, or The Cornhill.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their Names as early as convenient before the Expiration of their present Subscriptions. . . . "it obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1871, for Four Dollars.

NEW YORK, Oct. 22, 1870.

BARGAINS
FROM AUCTION,
AND
FROM EVERY SOURCE WHERE ENERGY AND MONEY CAN SECURE THE SAME, ARE OFFERED BY
A. T. Stewart & Co.
Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th and 10th Sts.
FOR
Cloaks and Bonnets,
SEE
Mammoth Supplement
TO
HARPER'S BAZAR.
Only Ten Cents for Twenty-five Full-Sized Patterns
of
WINTER WRAPPINGS AND BONNETS.

HARPER'S BAZAR, No. 47, for Nov. 19, 1870, contains Eighteen full-sized Patterns of LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S WINTER WRAPPINGS; Seven Patterns of WINTER BONNETS; Patterns of MOURNING BONNETS, COLLARS, and CUFFS; TRIMMINGS for Winter Wrappings; FANCY ARTICLES, &c.; all richly illustrated and carefully described.

The same Number of HARPER'S BAZAR contains a beautiful Illustration of a Scene in Brittany, entitled

BEFORE LEAVING FOR THE WAR;

a page of capital Humorous Illustrations; Prof. DE MILLE'S thrilling Illustrated Story, "THE CRYPTOGRAM," and a great variety of brilliant SHORT STORIES, POEMS, EDITORIALS, PERSONALS, MISCELLANY, &c.

Price TEN CENTS. Sold every where.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS.
F. E. SUIRE & CO.
Wholesale Druggists,
N. W. COR. FOURTH & VINE STREETS,
CINCINNATI, OHIO.
New York Depot, . . 18 Dey St.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.
PRONOUNCED AS CONNOISSEURS
TO BE THE ONLY
GOOD Sauce,
and applicable to
EVERY VARIETY
OF
DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Noticed Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

To the Ladies of the United States.

Call for the WRIGHT MANUFACTURING CO.'S in the following Celebrated Brands, and wax no other. Stearns' Gold Braid—warranted full 6 yards.

ALPACA BRAIDS

Stearns' XXX—
Stearns' XXX—in Nos. 29, 40, 55, 65, 69, 71, 81, and 85.

The Finest and Best ever Made in this Country.

Wright Mfg. Co.'s Best Crown Alpaca—6 yards.
" " " Celestial Alpaca—
" " " Popular Nos. 29, 40, 55, 65, 69, 71, 81, and 85.
" " " Mixed and Fancy Plaid Braids.

For Sale by all Dealers who keep the Best Quality.

A. W. STEARNS, Treasurer,
Lowell, Mass.

YOU WANT IT!

THE TOLEDO BLADE is the best family newspaper published anywhere. Parson Nasby's great story, "Ford Lands—a Tale of Love and Dissolution," just commenced, and will be concluded this week. Terms—$3 00 a year; $2 00 for six months; $1 25 for 10 copies; $1 50 each. Three months' trials will include all of Nasby's story, 50 cents; two months, $2 50; ten copies, $4 00, and an extra copy to getter up of club. Specimen copies sent free. Send for one, and give us the addresses of a dozen or so of your friends, at different Post-Offices, and we will send free specimen copies. Address

MILLER, LOCKE & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

To Consumptives.

The advertiser, having been permanently cured of that disease in its worst forms, after many years' severe suffering, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure CURE for CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, BRONCHITIS, &c.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
163 South Second Street, Williamsburgh, N. Y.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.

CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics used for producing sleep. Price 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Send for Circular containing medical indorsements. For DE WITT RANDALL, Proprietor,
91 Barclay St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. For the non-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 19 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Nassau Street, New York.

100,000 SOLD.—Magic Photographs. Wonderful Transformations. Three photographic pictures, 10 cents a package; 5 packages $1. W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, N. Y. The Liberal Agency.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 321 Pearl St., N. Y., Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

50,000 Boys and Girls

WANTED, one in every neighborhood, to act as agent for our Bridal Gift, Juvenile Books, Albums, Games, Fine Cards, Pocket and useful articles. Good pay in cash, and permanent employment for leisure hours.

JOHN B. ALDEN & CO., Chicago, Ill.

$500 PER WEEK

Can be made by parties who are wide-awake, without interfering with other business. Apply to JAMES ROOD & CO., 636 Broadway, N.Y.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per Week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

MEN and WOMEN wanted to sell our New 16 Books—Dr. Hall's "Guide to Health." Women can Make Money," and other Illustrated Works. Send stamp, mailing circulars, &c. H. E. PIER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; McKINNEY & MARTIN, 1204 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED AGENTS, at $75 per month, to sell the celebrated Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine. Address nearest office. It costs only a postal card to send a letter which in thirty minutes will result in a simple, particulars and to insure employment. Address G. GEDDIS, Shermansdale, Pa.

ANDREW M. BLAKE, Canton, Ohio, wants AGENTS to sell his $1 Patent Chair Springs and Chimney Caps. Send for Circular.

$30 PER WEEK.—Agents wanted in every town. Samples free. C. W. DENNIS, Rochester, N. Y.

"One seldom finds a more entertaining book."—Tribune.

MACGREGOR'S
Rob Roy on the Jordan.

The Rob Roy on the Jordan, Nile, Red Sea, and Gennesareth, &c. A Canoe Cruise in Palestine and Egypt, and the Waters of Damascus. By J. MACGREGOR, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

The "Rob Roy" is a canoe in which Mr. Macgregor and paddled his way over the lakes and rivers of many lands, and in which, a few months ago, he journeyed through the Suez Canal and followed the course of the Jordan to the Dead Sea. The object of this little vessel—penetrating by again barricaded ways visited by Europeans. Mr. Macgregor whirls the pen or lightly as the paddle, and narrates his adventures in a style that does not often weary.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Exceedingly entertaining.—N. Y. Times.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 50.

WASHINGTON MEDALLION PEN

$50000 of the PATRONS' Success is with Series now ready for Distribution. For a List of the Numbers drawn, address THE WASHINGTON MEDALLION PEN CO., 11 College Place, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF SUITS IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which, in the double-sheet Supplement, appear in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY SIZE FIGURE, and will be found PERFECTLY ACCURATE, and so fitted with the greatest accuracy, the SEAMS AND SHOULDERS FOR PERFECTION. DIRECTIONS PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

WATTEAU CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ..... No. 1
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT ..... " 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 28
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 29
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS ..... " 30
POINTED-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS ..... " 35
TRAINED STREET SUIT ..... " 36
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT ..... " 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT ..... " 45
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT ..... " 46

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in Paris. Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York. Box 5,643, P. O.

In ordering, please specify the Number of the Pattern, giving Bust Measure. Patterns will be forwarded at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"COMING TO THE PARSON,"

A Group of Scenery by John Rogers, is now ready for delivery. Price $18.

Also, Talk in other groups, suitable for Wedding Presents. Ornamnet, will be delivered free by express charges prepaid. Send for Circular. Mention this paper in the receipt of the price; or send money by draft, payable there by freight, and no charge for boxing or transportation. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to JOHN ROGERS, 19 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

A MUSICAL BOX for $2.

THE French great sensation; novelty, cheapness, and durability; in highly-polished case, metallic tongue, tuned in tune. A the most competition, with the most recent improvements, new pattern. Eight sets of tunes, each containing the following tunes (each). Guaranteed perfect in every respect. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. No. 1 tunes, $2; No. 2, $3; No. 3, $4; No. 4, $5. Tunes, $2, sent free by mail on receipt of price. Send stamp for illustrated catalogue with list of tunes. Try some other. Address WM. BROOKS & CO.,
Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

STEEL PENS.

American Branch of House,
91 and 93 Nassau St., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

"HA! HA!! HA!!!" shouts our jolly friend, on the buttons by from reading "THE STAR OF THE UNION." Only 50 cents "no" is a 40-column, 8-page, Labor-star paper, covering the whole field of Labor Reform, with correspondents of Swinging, &c., 6 years established. Try it 3 months on trial. Address STAR OF THE UNION, The Pioneer of Labor Reform Press, Boston, Mass. Vol. III. 1870, for only 75 cents. Specimens for stamp. Address "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER,"
Hinsdale, N. H.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE for 1871. Only $1 50 a year. Specimen copy free. Agents wanted in every town. Liberal terms. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, NEW, Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, or will take from $ to $20 monthly until paid.

DRUNKENNESS — C. C. BURNS, M.D.,

Office, 19 Dey Street, New York. Book of particulars, and the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

VINEGAR — HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address F. I. SAGE, Worcester, Massachusetts.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is now prepared to offer such inducements to active men as will secure for the self canvass for the sale of books by subscription as will make it profitable employment. Those desiring permanent employment will find it to their interest to address the undersigned, who is now selling through Agents five of the richest order of merit. Ministers, students, teachers, and every one may feel that they are spreading truth while engaged in their circulation. Let all who are desirous of such employment apply soon, as territory is being rapidly taken. For particulars, address

AVERY BILL,
Cure of HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 Pearl St., New York.

$60 A WEEK paid Agents in a new business. Address SAXO NOVELTY CO., Saxo, Me.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR NOVEMBER, 1870.

CONTENTS:

THE HUGUENOTS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bernard Palissy.—Massacre of the Inhabitants of Vassy.—Portrait.—Catherine de Medicis.—Duke Henry de Guise.—The Cardinal of Lorraine.—Admiral Coligny.—Admiral Coligny.—Charles IX.—Assassination of Coligny.—Street Fight at Paris on St. Bartholomew's Day.

MY BABES IN THE WOOD.

THE CAVE OF BELLAMAR.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Ascent to the Cave.—The Guardian of the Temple.—Subaqueous.—Caprices Forms of Crystals.—The Embodiment Perfect.—Mouth of the Hidden Gallery.—The Cosmo's Lamp.—Avenue of the Lake.—The Confessional.

PHANTOM DAYS.

DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Pilot.—The Parting Song.—A Cotton on the Mississippi.—Bride and Bridegroom.—Playing Poker.—A Night Lavalloy.

THE NEGATIVE IN PHOTOGRAPHY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Light and Dark Spots of the Object.—Gradual Change reversed in Position.—Negative.—Positive.—Transparent Positive.—Instrument at Berlin in Honor of Frederick.

DAVY AND HIS LIFE-BOAT.

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Verner's Pride," &c.

THE SACRED FLORA.—(Part I.)

A SONG.

ANTEROS. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," &c.

AN OCTOBER IDYL.

THE ROCK OF THE LEGION OF HONOR. By Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie. "Do not Hisses."—(Part I.)

LITERARY FORGERIES.—(Concluded.)

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, Twenty cents a year; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with twenty cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volume of the MAGAZINE commences with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber desires to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number of the current year.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given. It is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to bank notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $160. Special Notices, 50 cents per Agate Line; or, for a less space, $3 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $2 per Agate Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$240 PER MONTH to Agents. 15 entirely new articles; staple as flour. Samples free. W. M. LINDSLEY, 88 South Hallsted St., Chicago.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Sample sent free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit free. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address J. C. BAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 14, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Official Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DEMING. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

LITERARY SELECTIONS for the Students of the Normal Class of Young Ladies in the City of New York. Printed by Authority of the Board of Education. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

WILLSON'S INTERMEDIATE FIFTH READER: with the Original Plan of the School and Family Series: embracing, in brief, the Principles of Rhetoric, Criticism, Elocution, and Gymnastics; and Lessons in Prose and Poetry. The whole adapted to Elocutionary Illustration. By MARCIUS WILLSON. 12mo, $1 40.

FRENCH'S MENTAL ARITHMETIC: embodying a Complete System of Rapid Computations, with a Large Collection of the Solutions of Problems and the Answers of Practical Use. By DANIEL FRENCH, LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. From the Discovery of America to the Year 1870. By JOHN S. SCOTT. Maps and Engravings. 12mo, $1 50.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON GRAMMAR. A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language, in which its Forms are Illustrated by those of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Old Saxon, Old Frisic, Old Norse, and Old High-German. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Pa., and Author of "A Method of Study for the English Language," "A Parser and Analyzer for Beginners," "An Anglo-Saxon Reader," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON READER; with Philological Notes, a Brief Grammar, and a Vocabulary. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, and Author of "A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

CHARLES DICKENS: The Story of his Life. By the Author of "The Life of Thackeray." Profusely taken at various times, and Views of his Residences. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

DICKENS'S SPEECHES, LETTERS, and SAYINGS. Speeches, Letters, and Sayings of Charles Dickens. To which is added a Sketch of the Author by George Augustus Sala, and Dean Stanley's Sermon. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ The two above works, bound in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE GENIAL SHOWMAN. Being Reminiscences of the Life of Antrome Ward, and Pictures of a Showman's Life in the North-western World. By EDWARD P. HINGSTON. Two Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Curtailment, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume, 740 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, M.A. Second Series. With Portrait on Steel Engraving. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume, 616 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA CLIFF. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE FAMILY ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A DANGEROUS GUEST. By the Author of "Gilbert Rugge," "A Fiery Friendship," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. By WM. M. BAKER, Author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS, COMPLETE. Harper's Library Edition, with Illustrations by the Author. Complete in 8 Vols. 8vo, Green Morocco Cloth, $6 50 per set.

Vanity Fair.—Pendennis.—The Virginians.—The Newcomes.—The Adventures of Philip.—Henry Esmond.—and The Widower.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ETON. By an Etonian. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VERONICA. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "Mabel's Progress," &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

MELANCHOLY REDUCTION OF THE PARISIANS.

CUSTOMER (to his Tailor). "Monsieur, you will have the kindness to alter those Pantaloons to my present size. Six weeks ago they were too tight for me. Vive la République!"

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S

PURE CALIFORNIA BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations and substitutions of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

Engines, Tools, Machinery, &c.,

FOR SALE,

AT

THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,

Foot of East 12th St., N. Y.

Embracing

ENGINES, PLANERS, LATHES,

SMITHS' AND BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS,

And Machinery and Patterns of the most approved kinds, &c., &c. Also,

6 HIGH-PRESSURE ENGINES, partly finished;

2 STEVENSON'S PATENT TURBINE WATER-WHEELS, 60-inch diameter; and

1 MARINE BEAM ENGINE, 66-in. by 10-ft. stroke.

JNO S. SCHULTZE,

Receiver of the Novelty Iron Works.

☞ Send for Catalogue.

New York, Oct. 19, 1870.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Possess a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to

EMPIRE S. M. CO.,

394 Broadway, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form. All economy in it, with full directions, making a big saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643 NEW YORK.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

YOU WANT A COPY OF

NAST'S

COMIC ALMANAC for 1871.

16 ILLUSTRATIONS by THOMAS NAST.

Can, 75 cents. Send 25 cents for it to

H. K. VAN SICLEN, Bibliopole, 130 Nassau St., N.Y.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

New Improvements, Important. Reduced Prices. Recommended as the best by nearly 1000 THOUSAND PROMINENT MUSICIANS. Awarded MEDAL at PARIS EXPOSITION, and highest prizes at other Prizes, $80 to $1000. Illustrated Catalogue and Circular now ready, and sent free. Warerooms, 274 Broadway, NEW YORK; 154 Tremont St., BOSTON.

LIVE SONGS.

EACH SONG HAS A PIANO ACCOMPANIMENT. Price FIVE CENTS each. The whole will be mailed to any address upon receipt of One Dollar.

Please order by the Numbers.

No. 159. Good-by, John.
177. Joe Along, Mary.
196. Laugh while You Can.
200. Ida Lewis, the Brave Young.
201. Ain't We Glad.
209. I Saw Esau Kissing Kate.
89. Nothing Else to Do.
84. Bell goes Ringing for Sarah.
194. The Cruiskeen Lawn.
132. Hamlet, Prince of Denmark.
106. Never Mind the Rest.
87. Paddle Your Own Canoe.
20. Up in a Balloon.
39. The Flying Trapeze.
61. The Lancashire Lass.
74. Little Maggie May.
9. Lilly Dale—Darbi and Joan.
11. Darling Nelly Gray.
1. Captain Jinks.
105. Tommy Dodd.

Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,

Publisher of HAND-BOOK MUSIC,

24 Beekman St., New York.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

THE BEST.

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

Wanted—Agents

$75 to $250 per month, every where, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month, and expenses, or a commission from first sale. For circulars and terms, address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

Farnham, Gilbert, & Co.,

BANKERS,

No. 8 Wall Street, New York.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5075, N. Y.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

NEW YORK.

GLEASON'S Noiseless Argand Gas Burners; also, a Kerosene Argand Burner, giving the finest artificial light in the world. Still as daylight. Circulars free. Agents wanted. 193 Mercer St., New York.

CARTWRIGHT & WARNER'S

PATENT MERINO

UNDER-VESTS,

DRAWERS,

AND

HOSIERY.

A LARGE VARIETY OF NEW GOODS,

AT

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Union Adams & Co.,

No. 637 Broadway.

PICKETT'S MEN.

A Fragment of War History.

By COL. WALTER HARRISON. Illustrated with a Portrait of General PICKETT. 1 Vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1.

"Col. Harrison's book is interesting as coming from a Southern hand. We are curious to learn the experience of those who fought against us, and to note the tone and spirit in which Southern writers will deal with war topics. The author is, we must say, very fair."—The Nation.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray St. and 27 Warren St.

☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S

CHALLENGE SAUCE

Pronounced by Connoisseurs

TO BE THE

BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,

AND

SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.

For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.

Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

150,000 Acres of Land For Sale.

THE McGREGOR AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY offer 150,000 acres of land for sale, at $5 to $10 per acre, in lots of forty acres and upward, situated in the counties of Howard, Cerro Gordo, Kossuth, Hancock, Pine Alto, Pocahontas, and Leon, in Northern Iowa, on the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul, McGregor and Missouri River, and the Des Moines Valley Railroads. SOIL, rich, black loam. LANDS, high, rolling prairie, and without an overflow. WATER, abundant. TITLE from the U. S. Government. TERMS—One per cent. per annum interest and 10 per cent. per annum of the principal; or, if the purchaser improves the land, no payment for two years is required except the taxes. CLIMATE, the best in the world.

For Maps, Pamphlets, or other information, apply to

D. S. GREGORY, Agent,

Algona, Kossuth County, Iowa.

BLEES'

Noiseless,

Link-Motion,

Lock-Stitch

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and elasticity of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine; and, for agencies and circulars, apply at

623 BROADWAY,

New York.

DOUBLE-THICK ROOFING.

This Roofing is made of the best all-wool felt, doubled, and is prepared by saturation with a preservative compound, and all ready to be put on to flat or steep roofs and cover with our Quarts Cement, thus making a cheap and durable fire and weather proof roof at at less than one-half the cost of tin. Put up in rolls, and on by any one, needs no special skill and no warming, except to cold weather. Full directions and samples of the Double-thick Roofing, as well as samples of Patent Building Paper, sent free to any address, by

ROCK RIVER PAPER CO., Chicago, or

B. E. HALE,

22 & 24 Frankfort Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS.

Ambers, Repairing and Boiling.

Retail Store, 27 John St., middle of the block.

Send for Circular.

TAXIDERMIST'S MANUAL.

Giving full instructions in Skinning, Mounting, and Preserving Birds, Animals, Fishes, Reptiles, Insects, Eggs, &c., &c., by mail, for 30 cents. Address

S. H. Sylvester, Taxidermist, Middleboro', Mass.

EVANS' PRICES FOR THE "BEST" "MADE" FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS

$10. $13. $15 50. $18. $16. $18. $20. $22. $25. $27. $28.

BEEFING JACKETS

$9 00. $7 00. $9 00. $10 00. $12 00. $13 00. $22 00.

WINTER VESTS

$14 00. $16 00. $18 00. $20 00. $22 00. $26. $28. $32. $50.

PANTS

Fashionable Stripes $6 00, $7 00, $8, $9, $10, $12, $15, $20. $25. $2 50.

In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES THAT BEAT THE MARKET

Prices that beat the Market

At EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE,

65 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

THE IMPROVED

WILSON

SHUTTLE

SEWING MACHINE

for simplicity, durability & beauty stands unrivaled! For stitching, hemming, tucking, felling, quilting, corading, binding, braiding, gathering, gathering and sewing on gathers, its unequaled!

☞ AGENTS WANTED in every County in the United States where we have not now already employed. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

ESTABLISHED IN 1853.

MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS,

Hosiery, Gloves, &c.

THE OLDEST HOUSE IN THE TRADE, AND THE CHEAPEST!!

DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER

A SPECIALTY.

VANDERLIP & TAYLOR,

(Late A. RANKIN & CO.),

No. 96 BOWERY, NEW YORK.

SON KENSAN is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he cannot cure. Have no fear, as he sees by mail for 50 cents. A pamphlet of testimonials free. Address DR. R. V. PIERCE, 663 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

"OUR POPULAR SHIRTS,"

MADE TO ORDER FROM BEST MATERIALS, AND WARRANTED A PERFECT FIT.

Sent by express, C. O. D., to any part of the country, at the following prices:

6 Shirts, Good Muslin and Linen Fronts..... $9 00
6 " Better Muslin and Fine Linen Bosoms.... 12 00
6 " Manchville Muslin and Fine Linen..... 15 00
6 " Wamsutta Muslin and Fine Linen..... 18 00
6 " New York Mills and Better Linen..... 18 00

RICHARD MEARES,

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS,

6th Avenue, cor. 23d St., N. Y.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

PRICED AND ILLUSTRATED MANUALS on the following subjects sent free:

Part I.—Mathematical Instruments, 112 pages.

Part II.—Optical Instruments, 72 pages.

The following on receipt of 10 cents:

Part III.—Meteorological Instruments, 48 pages.

Part IV.—Philosophical Instruments, 64 pages.

JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia. 3 Doy St., New York, P. O. Box 4039.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

100 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 ..... Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

New-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Rural and Field Sports, mailed free.

MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICONS

Of every description, and the largest collection of Slides in the United States. Send for a Catalogue.

W. MITCHELL McALLISTER,

728 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

UNTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the CELEBRATED HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch," alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

SAY NOTHING.

Those who desire to make money on the quiet may send two three-cent stamps for terms. All knowing cases will understand. Address (naturally)

F. MATSON & CO., Jersey City, N.J., Box 916.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 725.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

TAKE A CHANCE?

WHATEVER may be said, in general terms, against the morality of lotteries, this easy method of raising money has become a part of the regular machinery of charitable fairs, and every objection is met with the undeniable statement that it is both popular and successful. Many a one, who otherwise would not contribute a dime, will take a chance in a lottery, especially when assailed, like the nice young man in the accompanying sketch, with the pleasant cajoleries of charming young ladies. It is a singular and not very creditable fact that mere misery is less potent than many other influences to unlock a cash-box. All around us, within a short distance of our own homes, in streets through which we pass every day, there are hundreds and thousands of our fellow-beings painfully holding themselves just above the verge of starvation, or sinking below it in despair. We know this. We know that within a stone's-throw of our own comfortable homes there is more misery than many a hard-fought battle-field has seen. And yet, partly from custom, and partly from the deficiency in picturesque elements, we are less moved by this than by a single incident of war.

It must be confessed that our sympathies are sometimes moved by circumstances entirely independent of the merits of the case. The French Zouave, for example, is a highly picturesque figure, and makes a brilliant show in illustrations of the war. Nothing is more effective than a scene in a hospital or on the field of battle, where Sisters of Mercy bend over the dead and dying, priests with the crucifix in hand listen to the hast words of confession, and groups or masses of military in the other parts of the sketch. Some such picture rises before our imagination when we are asked to contribute to a fund for the relief of the wounded. We do well to contribute liberally for this cause: but, at the same time, we should not forget that a New York laboring-man, sick and out of work, the starving seamstress, the poor widow and her children, and the wretched waifs of humanity that swarm in our streets, may suffer as keenly as the most picturesque appellant that ever marched to glory in baggy trousers.

TAKE A CHANCE?—[DRAWN BY C. R. REINHART.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1870.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient after the receipt of two or three Number's successively. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and making book Numbers.

THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

☞ With this Number of the WEEKLY we present our readers with a splendid Engraving, giving a Bird's-eye View of the Lower Part of New York and Brooklyn, and the proposed Bridge over the East River.

A LESSON OF THE DAY.

THE retirement of Secretary Cox shows that the present system of the civil service is stronger than the President. At the head of a party Administration, he finds that the condition of party supremacy, recognized by both of the great political organizations and the accepted tradition of a generation, is, in Mr. MARCY'S famous phrase, that to the victors belong the spoils. Mr. COX is of course not ignorant of the immense force of the system, and in his letter offering his resignation he suggests that he the President must decide whether the Administration can venture to provoke the hostility which would spring from his refusal to acquiesce in the usual practice. Since, then, it is a system strong enough to put the best men out of office, it will soon put honor itself out of politics. And when they are wholly gone it will be a little late to reflect that the application of the simplest principles of ordinary business to the management of the affairs of the government would have saved us from the total wreck in which we shall be involved.

When we have a party real the sole tenure of office we make every election a ferocious struggle, literally, for life or the means of livelihood upon the part of the officers. They therefore desert their duty to influence the election. The national business remains undone, or is turned off in the hastiest and most slovenly manner, and the excitement of an election becomes a prolonged fury. But the officers are ill paid. They not only know that they will lose their places if the opposition comes in, but that they will be taxed heavily for the expenses of the election, and that they will be turned out for any supplicant who can command stronger political influence. They therefore make but a while the sun shines. The system corrupts them to dishonesty. It is not honesty, capacity, and industry, it is party management and large subscriptions, that keep them in office. It is a system, therefore, under which the offices of the government are really for sale. A system which, from patent, for instance, is passed through a department—Secretary COX's or any other. The clerks are told that it is "voluntary." Young Jones, who has but a salary of a thousand dollars and a large family, feels and says that he can not honestly afford to pay the assessment. Young Jones is consequently removed; and if he inquires why, is told that there are twenty gentlemen, with a good party record, and not a family clerks as he, who would gladly pay twice the amount of the "voluntary" subscription which he declined. If the place is sold he would pay ten times as much, the office is sold to him.

But who should pay if not those who enjoy the party prizes? innocently asks some old fox. But we are not speaking of party prizes. We are speaking of the offices of the government necessary to the faithful administration of affairs. They are not party prizes, they are public services. Parties, indeed, have sometimes made them, and degraded them to prizes. But the question assumes the very iniquity. The alternative is simple. If the members of a party are not sufficiently interested in its success to pay the necessary honest expenses of an election, their convictions are not of a degree of sincerity which make their ascendancy desirable. If they insist that the office-holders shall pay the expenses, they put up the office to secret auction, and foster an abuse which is fatal to honest government. Young Jones, who is faithful and honest, and just the officer whom the country wants, says, sadly, "I didn't go round with the boys and treat, nor attend the caucuses and the polls, nor pay a political tax, nor subscribe 'voluntarily,' and here I am!" Smith, at the next desk, says, "I couldn't starve, and so I paid my assessment to save my bread and butter, as I would give my purse to a robber to save my life." Jenkins, at the desk beyond, pays up and is silent. But he feathers his nest against the day of wrath. Thus it is a pleasing system, by which every fourth dollar received disappears, and by which every man's interest is to cheat, and not to serve, the government.

"Yes, it is a very bad system, but you can't do any thing about it." Not half as bad as slavery, and a great deal less difficult to abolish that. There never was an evil yet which was removed by saying that nothing could be done about it. It is by doing that the world warps ahead. When a ship goes ashore, or drifts among breakers, if the captain should complacently swell his thumbs, and remark that it was a bad business, but nothing could be done, he might justly be thrown overboard as the DOGMA of the disaster. If deliberate venality and corruption are inseparable from politics, then the sooner decent men withdraw from them the sooner they pull the temple down. "It only lieves such folly? Who does not know that the very system which was finally established by General JACKSON, in pursuance of MARCY'S principle, led at last to the utter overthrow of the Democratic party? Who does not know that there is no advice to the Republican party so contemptible as that it should imitate the methods of its opponents?

The fatal power and tendency of the present civil service system are now apparent. It constrains a President to sacrifice the best men in his own party. That sacrifice is necessarily attended by the disapproval of the best sentiment of the party. It tends to destroy that harmony and unity which are indispensable to party success. The Administration, whose party of purpose we do not doubt, should respect this political sentiment, and by many of the best men, of thousands and thousands of the most intelligent of the country, arises from the feeling that one party is the unfamiliar with politics and politicians and political methods, is experimenting, and, as we believe, with perfect honesty, to reform the character. The character of the Republican party and its natural tendencies, we believe that he will agree with us, justified at the beginning of the administration to have been correct, and that it is safer to alienate the mere party managers than the intelligent judgment of thoughtful American citizens.

A FRENCH APPEAL.

THE dignified, pathetic, and powerful appeal of M. ADOLPHE LAUGEL to the Americans, and to the Germans in America, in behalf of his country must be without effect. It is a plea to the friend and secretary of the DUC D'AUMALE, and his wife is an American. He is a gentleman of the highest position and tone. He who came to us, full of sympathy, during our war, and upon his return published a work upon the United States which is the best document. He has been long exiled under the empire, with so many of the best Frenchmen; but the sincerity of his country's appeal must go deeply as to give to his appeal an eloquence all the more persuasive from the calm of its tone. Nothing can be more dignified. He begins by confessing the justice of the German indignation with "the unprovoked and wicked attack of the French Emperor." But as the war has now become one of conquest, its character is changed. Germany has no more right to annex Alsace and Lorraine than the right we had to divide Germany; and the situation shows that dismemberment is no longer essential to the security of Europe.

Has Germany a right to annex all German-speaking provinces? May she take German Switzerland and Germany in Austria? Will Europe allow France to claim Belgium, Luxembourg, and Geneva? Alsace, M. LAUGEL acknowledges, has never been a part of Germany. When LOUIS XIV. persecuted the Protestants elsewhere he spared Alsace. The very provisions of the German language in the province is the best proof that France has not interfered with the habits and customs of the people. And it is this policy which has made Alsace loyal to France. She became free, her peasants became proprietors, and her soldiers became generals. Why should she now be given up? Germany can only invoke the right of conquest. She would hardly dare to trust an appeal to the intelligence of the nineteenth. On both sides, if the annexation could be accomplished, M. LAUGEL thinks that it would not be for the advantage of Germany. Alsace was a mediator between the countries. Through her German ideas penetrated France, and French ideas Germany. To annex the mediating territory is to isolate France completely, and intensify the national jealousy and hostility.

M. LAUGEL then turns to the Americans at large, and asks the voice of their sympathy for France in this terrible hour of her humiliation and ruin. "Now that we are vanquished," says this noble and honorable Frenchman, "that our fields are devastated; that our fortresses are falling under the guns of the invader; that we have rid ourselves—even in the face of his advancing armies—of the corrupting power which prepared our ruin; that we are ready to give up every thing to our enemies except the honor of our fellow-country-men; that we accept ruin, humiliation, and famine, and only refuse to pay peace with the loss of our faithful Alsatians—I call upon Americans to remember the past—to remember LAFAYETTE and ROCHAMBEAU, TOCQUEVILLE and MONTALEMBERT—to remember the COMTE DE PARIS and his brother. Let the voice of America be heard, and that voice will not be heard in vain."

Such manly words are refreshing, for they assure us that there are still thought and reason in the hearts of Frenchmen, of which the lamentable rhetoric of GAMBETTA and the rest had made us despair. Here is an honorable acceptance of every thing but what seems to the writer a cruel betrayal of part of his countrymen, and a fatal dismemberment of his country. Upon no appeal will more avail. Since the address was written Metz has fallen, and the occupation and virtual annexation of Alsace and Lorraine to Germany are accomplished. No power—not even the United States—could consistently protest, or even demand that a vote of the people be taken. We have acquired great territory without consulting the inhabitants, and the right of possession by conquest is inherited by constitutional custom. France pays the terrible penalty of the total demoralization wrought by the empire of LOUIS NAPOLEON. No great, brave, long ignominious, a fall no nation ever had. But it is to men like M. LAUGEL, who have not succumbed to the general decay which has overtaken the nation, that France must look for her resurrection, not as a grande nation, but as a great, free, self-respecting people.

CONGRESS AND THE PEOPLE.

THE reputation of part of the judicial bench in the city of New York has become so tainted that Mr. ANDERSON says that there are judges here who, as the World says, "sell injustice for a price"—that it is very pleasant to contemplate the Supreme Court, with the highest ability and the best disposition, like those in the Circuit Court of this district, upon occasion of the attempt to test the constitutionality of the law to secure honest elections for members of Congress. There are hard necessities in every profession, and it may have been a little difficult—whatever the liberality of Tammany Hall—for two respectable lawyers like Mr. STOUGHTON and Mr. GEORGE CURTIS to know that they appeared in the interest of that vast system of electoral fraud which is now the most threatening danger to our political situation. Their cause was the cause of repeaters, ballot-box stuffers, bullies, and scoundrels of every description. They pleaded, as was their legal right, the constitutionality of a law which could by no possibility harm any man, and whose enforcement was a good citizen's the most precious political right of every citizen. The success of their effort to impeach the law would have been fatal—and it is, if they thought it so unconstitutional, they probably felt that they were doing a professional duty.

Now the law, however, must they have repetted the hard necessity of professionally siding electoral frauds, and all the more must they feel justified, because have rejoiced that their constitutional insight and greater professional ability than theirs enabled the court to establish the constitutionality of the law which they disputed, and to baffle the designs of those shameless corruptionists of the Ring, whose cause was defended by the World herald, and who were, of course, not the employers of Messrs. STOUGHTON and CURTIS in the case. It is to be regretted, however, that Mr. STOUGHTON should have allowed himself more than once to speak in a highly emphatic and pointed manner of the "personal" and unprecedented course of the Court, as if he intended to convey a very much stronger criticism than the word could justify. The Court, however, calmly corrected him in a tone and spirit which, it is to be hoped, will not be without benefit to the learned counsel. It is so easy for prosperous and noted professional gentlemen at the bar to acquire an offensively dictatorial manner, which kills them business, courtesy and propriety, that a tranquil reproof is of the utmost service, and it is undoubtedly gladly welcomed by them, as it is universally approved by the public.

The opinion of Judge WOODRUFF sustaining the constitutionality of the election law is very clear and decisive. It asserts that the method of ascertaining the qualifications of an elector provided by the law is not an attempt to prescribe his qualifications, and therefore does not conflict with the constitutional provision in regard to qualifications. The opinion affirms, secondly, that the clause in regard to the manner and times of election was inserted to secure the honest and free expression of the popular will in Congress, which might be defeated by indifference or lawlessness in the States, and since Congress could certainly enable all to vote for its members who are entitled to vote, it may equally prohibit the voting of those who are not entitled; and the fact that the power has not been hitherto exercised is no argument whatever against its existence. Congress provides in the law that Congressional elections shall not be decided by fraudulent methods under the guise of the law. If it has the authority to make such regulations, the people of the United States would be powerless against just such organized villainy as Tammany Hall.

The denunciations of this law as "centralizing" are part of the Tammany tactics, to hide its purposes by its unscrupulous political mask under an appeal to jealousy of the national authority. It is an attempt to wrest the doctrine of State sovereignty to the protection of electoral corruption and fraud, as it was formerly invoked to shield slavery. The Democratic party is now, as it has been for a generation, a disorganizing party. Its efforts are all turned to foment suspicion and hostility between the national and the State powers. It strives to deject the government of all the people at Washington as a centralizing tyranny, and the interests of Tammany Hall—that shield a despotism as LOUIS NAPOLEON'S empire—despicy Congress as despotic! To all this foolish clamor the opinion of the Court in this case is an admirable reply. It states temperately, completely, forcibly, and finally both the constitutionality and the wisdom of the constitutionality of a law which aims to keep the Congress of the United States what the Constitution meant it to be, the representative of the people, and not of any clique of shameless corruptionists in this or in any State.

MONEY AND POLITICS.

IN the State of Massachusetts Mr. D. H. MASON was nominated for Senator at the recent election, and he declined the honor upon the ground that he could not afford to take the office. He said that a Senator must spend half of the year in arduous public duty with no adequate compensation, and a man who could do this, he said, without serious loss, must count his labor of little value. Mr. MASON states very pointedly what has become a grave consideration—the expense of taking office. Dr. FRANKLIN, who has the reputation of great shrewdness, was of opinion that the officers of the national government should serve for nothing. Subsequent experience and the decree day does not illustrate the wisdom of his judgment. A sagacious politician estimated ten years ago that the annual expense in member's bills, outside the entire sacrifice of time and labor and conscience, for an election as a representative in Congress, was not less than the salary of the office. This was the calculation of a moderate and economical man, and indicated what may be called a representation is a distinct tax upon the nomination was equivalent to an election.

But when an honest man is nominated in a doubtful district for a smaller position, as a member of the State Legislature, for instance —a position which is not generally personally desirable, and which requires of a man more than immense sacrifices—what will he find to be the situation? In the first place he will be assessed by the local committee. Even if he will be expected to subscribe liberally to the local clubs. Then he will be waited upon by all the target and other companies. He may be very fond of the printing of posters and circulars, and for speakers, and for the incessant "cheerful glass" of friendly entertainers. He may have a small agent or two, "practical politicians," who "know all about this thing." There must be many who are old banners; and, as the basis approaches, every kind of "usual" outlay will be suggested to him by perfectly disinterested gentlemen, who really think that, with this care, he can be elected. Meanwhile the glamour that touches the eyes of every candidate does not spare his. He is nominated, and he naturally wishes to make the best fight he can; and really, under the circumstances, it does look as if he had time—he might be successful! What, then, are fifty dollars here, or a hundred there?

If the honest man is rich and is elected, very well. He will be paid about a twentieth part of what he has spent. If he is poor and is elected, and has preserved the means for the campaign, and must leave his business, to be paid some two or three dollars a day in the Legislature, he is not his honesty exposed to a considerable strain? If, on the other hand, he is not an honest man and has spent five or ten thousand dollars to secure the chance of being paid three dollars a day for a hundred days, he will make the three dollars three hundred a day if he possibly can. Thus the small sums paid for the public service, and the enormous expenses to the candidate of a canvass, allow only the rich or the dishonest to hold office. The pay of a member of the Assembly in New York, who serves for one year, is three dollars a day for a hundred days. We have heard a member openly assert in a railroad car that his election cost him six thousand dollars, which he "had got to go" with, as much more as was needed. There are men who have no business whatever but politics, and who grow suddenly and enormously rich. They live in fine houses, and are good-humoredly regarded as "knowing." There are other men who, with as much honesty, forge or steal; and they are sent as felons to Sing Sing. A rose smells so differently under different names!

These are very familiar facts, but they show plainly that money has become one of the chief elements in politics. The office is not regarded as a post of the public service, but as a prize for which aspirants must pay. To take office is not considered a patriotic sacrifice, a duty which must be done, when honestly practicable, to undertake, but a chance at money-making, for which he must expect to pay a good price. It is manifest that of the influences which are becoming so universal and imperative that good citizens can no longer safely disregard it. But for this reason there is no remedy but the wise and constant interest of honest men in the details of politics. There will then be a chance for the nomination of more candidates like Mr. MASON, who will break with the traditions, and refuse to pay great sums of money to obtain positions which they do not wish, but which the intelligent and honest public wish them to fill. And if such men feel with Mr. MASON that they can not properly accept the nomination, we shall begin to ask whether it is not true economy to save money by removing the temptation to steal.

A STRAW THAT SHOWS THE WIND.

At a recent political meeting in Norfolk, Virginia, at which the Secretary of the Navy and other gentlemen were present as speakers, a disturbance began while Professor LAWSTON, a colored citizen, was addressing the audience, which ended in a riot which the police were powerless to quell. Fire-arms were freely used. The negro speaker was ordered away, and was pushed and dead in an alley near by, and JOHN T. DAVIS, a well-known white Republican, was severely wounded. A Democratic body supposes that it was the Republicans who disturbed their own meeting, and shot and murdered their friends. It was an outbreak of the hatred and jealousy which still agitate the public mind in the late rebel region. And what does such an incident signify?

Nothing is truer than that trouble must for a long time be expected in that part of the country. We have constantly insisted in these columns that nothing was more foolish than to suppose that, because actual hostilities in the field were over, all the animosities of peace had ceased. The Democratic candidate for Governor of Massachusetts at the late election said that of course the late leaders in the rebellion could not be dreamers of peace offered to Congress. Let us make no more of the fact than it will honestly bear, but do not let us assume that it is a dead fact, and act accordingly. Ostrich statesmanship is the most intolerable of all.

What the late United States really want more than any thing else is the conviction that the people of the country have a steady policy in regard to the whole subject of pacification and reconstruction. If the ugly element in those States knows that the government—that is, the party most friendly to the Union cause—will support it to the last, and with all its power, that element will become less and less pernicious and inevitably. If, on the other hand, it knows that the government is hostile, and heartily hates the political equality established by reconstruction, that element will be the dominant influence in the Southern States, and endless agitation must follow. When the Democratic organ foolishly has to favor fellow-partisans who shot at the Republican party, and when that party ought to cause its open warfare upon the political equality of all citizens, the persuasive argument is, in substance, that, if there is evidence of acquiescence, the party at large could only gain the national control, then the party in the various States might not see the same policies as it pleased, and the Democratic central power would be sleeping or gone upon a journey; in any way a party could not see itself.

Mr. GERRIT SMITH, in urging the colored voters to support the anti-drunkenness ticket at the late election in New York, said that it was "insulting as well as nonsensical" to tell them that if the Democratic party triumphed the Freedmen would be re-enslaved or disfranchised. Mr. GERRIT SMITH is a true friend of the colored citizen, but it is insulting as well as nonsensical to say that if the Democratic party could obtain national power, such riots as that at Norfolk would become very common, and the exercise of the right of voting and of free discussion in public would become extremely difficult for the colored citizens; that terror can disfranchise as well as law; and that while slavery might not be restored, the spirit of slavery would affect the conduct of the ugly element of which we have spoken? Could there fail to be immense excitement and agitation, a feeling of insecurity upon the part of the colored citizens, and of triumph upon that of the worst classes of the community? And what possible benefit would this be to any human being? On the contrary, would it not be a very grave disaster for the whole country?

When, therefore, we read the story of such a riot as that at Norfolk, let us reflect that if any things are to be naturally expected, as we admit, even under the Republican national ascendency, what might be naturally expected should the Democratic party come into power

THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

THE attempt to bridge a stream or estuary, like the East River at New York, of a breadth of sixteen hundred feet navigable channel in a single span, is something new in the progress of engineering. This is twice the span of Roebling's Cincinnati Bridge, and four times the longest non-suspension spans ever attempted. The height of the proposed structure also is (practically) unprecedented; that is, although other bridges have been built at as great or greater height above the surface of the water, no other bridge has ever been projected at such an elevation above the shores. A proposal, by JOHN ROEBLING, to replace Old London Bridge with an iron arch rising to a height of sixty-five feet, or about two-third the height of the proposed East River Bridge, was rejected on account of the enormous impracticable extent of the approaches or ironches! Times change, and so do places, and men of Anglo-Saxon blood seem to change with both.

This bold and peculiarly American design is not yet wholly free from the cavils of doubt, or in perfect success, if achieved, will be a subject of congratulation, not only to the myriads of inhabitants who daily pass from their business stores on business or pleasure, but also to the whole world which visits the great metropolis. Yet the successive steps, as sure as bold, which have led up to the solid position from which Mr. JOHN A. ROEBLING, the son of the projector, has this last—to be avested in the very act by his lamented death—seem to have been taken with the practical demonstration for engaging in so magnificent an enterprise with little risk or failure to error. The only doubt-producing circumstance not shared at all by the ROEBLINGS, father or son—is in the stiffness of the suspended roadway against the lifting, swaying, and swaying effect of powerful winds. But as for the big pulsations, we, at least, must consider them matters of experiment, and to congratulate the engineer and ourselves when none can dispute the successful issue.

The bird's-eye view of the proposed bridge, herewith presented in a hypothetical form, portions of New York and Brooklyn more distinctly connected by it and the outlines of the river, its islands, and the surrounding shores, is, we believe, an unprecedented piece of engraving of the kind. It is distinguished for comprehensiveness and detail both into considerations. The more familiar the reader is with the localities represented, the more readily will the successful effect and the general accuracy of the artist's work appear. It is necessary to call attention to the bird's-eye view of the New York and Brooklyn bridge, which is gridironed with the tracks of all the city railroads east of Broadway, except the Second Avenue. The Grand Central, the new Post-office, as it will be in time. A corner of the Astor House here peeps into the picture, and next to it stands St. Paul's Church. Midway down the magnificent street stands Trinity Church, backed by Wall Street upon the right, the dome of the Custom-house, partly hidden by the shanties before referred to, but which have not yet been built all over it. The large dirt-heap at the foot of Broadway is the city dumping-ground, formerly the Battery, the old shore line surrounded by the most fashionable and aristocratic mansions of the city. The next street parallel to Broadway, on the left, above the second, William; the third, Gold; the fourth, Cliff; the fifth, Pearl; the sixth, seventh, and eighth, unattractively seen, are Water, Front, and South. Crossing them all, and heading off those west to right) of Pearl Street, the high rocher, or land approach of the bridge, is clearly shown down to the level of the water. The tall spire of the Tribune, on the corner beyond, and of the Times, fronting on the square, are plainly distinguished. Beyond the Times, on the further right-hand corner of the same block (formerly the Brick Church property), is the office of the World, on Park Row and Beekman Street. Next the pleasant corner of Beekman Street and Park Row comes the Standard, further down the same block the Express, and finally the Herald building, where Barnum's Museum so long stood, at the junction of Park Row with Broadway, opposite the old Park Church. The Post is at the bither extremity of the square, and the artist has kindly turned the front of the sign to send the rays of the sun on occasion, so as to give us a view of it.

The ground-floor of the enormous building, or block, in which the bridge approach on the New York side terminates will afford spacious waiting-rooms and platforms for passengers, besides abundant room for any possible number of discharging and reloading cars, for droves of foot-passengers, and for droves of vehicles and beasts of burden. The lucrative position and great public convenience of the stores above the ground-floor need not be pointed out. Many regard the heavy operations in real estate and building involved in these and approaches as a formidable obstacle to the practicability of completing the bridge. It is strange that any one should fail to perceive that the privilege of acquiring and controlling these approaches, necessarily property of third or fourth rate productiveness) carries with it one of the most enormous speculations or known in real estate, and constitutes the one part of the Bridge Company's business to the profit of which no alternative can be supposed.

The total length of the colossal structure before us is about a mile and one-seventh. From the entrance on Chatham Street to the tower at the New York shore is nearly half a mile, or, accurately, 2277 feet. Of this part of the structure, 940 feet, from the tower to the anchor-wall at Franklin Square, is to be suspended. The remainder, 1337 feet, is to be built up from the ground in fireproof workhouses and stores, supporting the roadway on their roofs. The streets will be crossed by iron truss and girder bridges. The grade of this approach, from Chatham bridge to the base of the bridge proper, is 3½ feet in 100, and the total ascent, or height of the bridge at the outer border of the ground depot, is 100 feet. The span from tower to tower is 1600 feet long and 80 feet wide, with an elevation of 135 feet above high-water. The base of each tower measures 56 by 134 feet, and the height of each is 278 feet above high-water.

The Brooklyn approach has a span of 940 feet, suspended over the roofs of the city, precisely like that on the New York side, and a similar roadway on the buildings to be erected for the purpose of 1337 feet from the bridge storage to the Washington Square Garrison, obliquely to the terminus in the block bounded by Fulton, Prospect, Sands, and Washington streets.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE MILITARY SITUATION IN FRANCE.

The Independance Belge claims to have intelligence from an escaped French officer, corroborated by a Prussian officer, to the effect that when the armistice, that the French leaders to the last deceived the army by promises to relieve Paris, and that consequently they were actually treating for the surrender.

The Prussian army was concentrated in the magazines and arsenals of the forts at Metz since the fall of Sedan, including provisions sufficient to maintain the garrison for six months.

The Alsatians captured at Metz and elsewhere are to be kept separate from the other prisoners, and they are hereafter to be regarded as Germans, and not French.

A despatch from Berlin announces that numerous political organizations in France waited upon M. Gambetta immediately upon his arrival there, and the appointment of commissaries in the Departments to organize the defense. The Prefects of the Departments were ready to carry out the policy across arms and munitions of war, and to raise the levies en masse, and, in fact, in every effort, and must not be allowed to make armament to surmount obstacles which they themselves might remove.

M. Thiers has been unsuccessfully negotiating with Count Bismarck for an armistice. At the first interview, on the 1st inst., it was arranged that an armistice should be made for a month, during which time the interval the inhabitants were to be at liberty to bring food into Paris, and to depart if they chose, but all the departments. M. Thiers asked if Alsace and Lorraine should be joined to the German Empire, and received for answer that the conditions were not favorable to Germany. The second conference was held on the 2d, when was directed to discontinue the negotiations, and to leave the Tuileries immediately.

Some disturbances were recently connected in Marseilles by the Reds, but promptly suppressed. Letters from that city represent that when Chanzy was carried in triumph to the Hotel de Ville he fortunately declined to be nominated George Francis Train its General-in-Chief of the Red Republic.

A version of what is called the Emperor Napoleon's thoughts on the war is published in the London papers. He thinks that Germany will have to raise 50,000 men at Metz, 100,000 at Strasburg, and 80,000 at Ulm, Spain, and in the Rhine near Belgium with 40,000 in large force, so as to do Germany, win the first rout, and secure the alliance of America and Italy by imposing neutrality on the South German states. The effective military operations and delay in bringing up food and material frustrated the plan, and the Germans, having all the material, and a large force formed, surrounded the French, and put them on the defensive. A new plan was then made to overwhelm the investment on a flanker. Thus the regency appeared as necessary to the Emperor. The Empress was opposed to it, but he had the Republic in view, fearing that it would end catastrophe. The author analyses the battle of Sedan, and the issue of the German successes, and points out many of the defects in the French army.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Austrian government has sent a circular to Interfere in Roman affairs, but suggests a conference of the powers to be held in Switzerland, which is refused by the Pope.

Among the propositions of the Italian ministry are the recognition of the Pope as the spiritual sovereign, and the municipal control of the army of the capital.

On July 18, 1871, has been fixed upon as the date of the centenary of the arrival of Italy by Romans.

A written acceptance of the Spanish crown by the Duke of Aosta was received at Madrid on the 31 inst.

Another hurricane occurred on the island of Cuba on the 16th inst., doing much damage to buildings, crops, and shipping. No loss of life is reported. Mzzanine and Cienfuegos suffered most severely. There was a destructive gale at Key West, Florida, at the same time.

The Sultan's steam-yacht Schooner ran on the rocks in the Bosphorus and sinking, were recently captured near Nagara, and are now in Turkish hands.

The French authorities of Martinique have shot twenty-three of the leaders of the insurrection, and have one hundred others in their power.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE expenditures of the United States government during the months of October amounted to $29,000,000.

The revenue collections of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870, amounted to $258,000,197, an increase of more than $25,000,000 over those of the preceding year.

The drawing of the Mercantile Library Gift Concert took place at Steinway Hall, Tuesday evening, the 15th inst., and was attended with considerable excitement. The first prize of $10,000 was drawn by ticket No. 13,945, held by Mr. Holloran, of this city.

The steamship Alice Vivian, from Galveston, Texas, foundered during the night of October 28, off Jupiter Inlet, Florida, and all on board, except the second mate and four men, were lost. She carried thirty-six passengers, among whom was Mr. Jenkinson, member of the British House of Commons.

The post Whitter was offered the nomination for Congress in the Sixth District of Massachusetts, by the prohibitionists, but declined it.

The official returns of the South Carolina election show that Republican members of Congress have been elected in all the districts.

WASHING FOR DIAMONDS AT THE NEW DIAMOND FIELDS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN DIAMOND FIELDS.

THE diamond fields recently discovered in South Africa are situated on the Vaal River, far inland, though easily accessible from Cape Town by steamer to East London, and thence by an overland journey of about 300 miles through a country where the means of travel are good, and subsistence obtainable at moderate prices. A letter written from the mines by a Mr. VOS ROSS gives the following interesting particulars of his visit there:

He started from Phillipolis Missionary Station, which lies in the Orange River Sovereignty, between the Caudock and Vaal rivers, and after passing through Jacobsdaal—a most miserable village of about twenty houses, situated in a waterless desert—entered some immense plains stretching on every side without any landmark. A few miles before reaching the Vaal River, however, the landscape changed, and our traveler entered a region of stony hills and immense boulders of rock. He was much pleased with the first sight of the lovely Vaal River, which he compares to the Thames at Richmond. It is shaded with willows and other large trees, and the sloping hills, except that they consist of basaltic rocks, closely resemble those of the Thames. For two miles in length both banks of the Vaal are dotted over with tents and wagons, and, Mr. VOS ROSS reckons that the population at the time of his visit could not be far short of 4000. Since then it has doubtless greatly increased, as people were rushing there from all parts of the colony.

The diggers gravel the floors of their tents with the refuse washings of the mines, and amuse themselves by looking for diamonds while lying in bed. Several have been found in this way. Gambling and drinking prevail to some extent, but on the whole Mr. VOS ROSS gives the people a very high character. They are very civil, friendly, and obliging, and help each other in every way. Besides this, there are a large number of respectable women and children at the mines, so that the rowdyism of California and Australia is not likely to be reproduced. "In fact," says Mr. VOS ROSS, "it is a large and enjoyable picnic, just the thing for a Dutchman and his family, so that those who are compelled to go away all say they shall come back again."

DIAMOND MINERS GAMBLING AT NIGHT.

Travel and Adventure.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER VI.

A new Guide.—An inveterate Snuff-taker.—Icelandic Snuff-horn.—An Escape from Drowning.—Preparations for ascending Mount Hecla.—A Hospitable Clergyman.

At the village where the incidents narrated in the preceding chapter occurred our traveler procured the services of another guide, and resumed his journey. He was not very favorably impressed with the character of his new servant, who appeared to be inefficient, and who was certainly slow and stupid. Among other disagreeable personal traits he was an inveterate snuff-taker, and constantly inhaled the titillating dust, after the Icelandic fashion, from a receptacle somewhat like a powder-horn. It requires the use of two hands to manage an ordinary snuff-box, and this on horseback is not very convenient. So the Iceland peasants have adopted another contrivance, consisting of a kind of horn, the stopper of which, when taken out, is held by a short chain. The man then holds the orifice to his nose, and giving the horn a shake, and inhaling vigorously, performs the operation in a very satisfactory manner.

AT THE MINISTER'S.

VOLCANIC DUST.

The traveler met with some accidents characteristic of the country as he went on.—One of his stirrup-straps broke, and he was obliged to ride with his legs dangling by the horse's side until he arrived at the next church, where the minister produced the necessary tools and repaired the damage; for the ministers, it seems, in addition to their scholastic attainments, are possessed of many other kinds of knowledge and skill, which are often called into requisition. After going on somewhat farther his horse, in crossing a ford, fell into a deep hole, in which both horse and rider were completely submerged —so much so that the latter was wet through to the skin. Indeed, our adventurer was thrown off his horse entirely, and was only saved, as he says, by seizing hold of the horse's tail, and being dragged in this way out to dry land.

It was blowing a gale at the time, and the guide, by signs, indicated that M. Nougaret ought to stop and change his clothes. But M. Nougaret was thrown, he says, into a state of irritation bordering on frenzy by his mishap, and he whipped the horses and drove on at the utmost speed he could attain to the next hamlet, hoping that the excitement and the exercise would prevent him from taking cold. The name of the hamlet was Thyorsholt, a little village on the banks of the river Thyorsa, flowing at the foot of Mount Hecla. Here he was received with the greatest hospitality, and made the recipient of the utmost kindness and attention by the whole family. They put him into the best room, brought out the ancient sacred family chair for him, and all together began to remove his wet clothes and dry him with towels, the young people of both sexes taking part in these attentions with an innocent simplicity and assiduity by which the object of them was much impressed. When he was dry, and fresh clothes had been put upon him, they brought him such refreshments as their cabin afforded. Among these was a cup of coffee containing in the saucer the single lump of sugar which comprised the whole family store of that article, and which had long been preserved for some great occasion of hospitality. The traveler found that he could not decline using this precious delicacy without wounding the feelings of his hosts, but he took care to replace it secretly from his own stores before he left the cottage. He was so much impressed by the devoted attentions which he received from this family that he says, on leaving them, that though the Icelanders have not much blood in their veins, and though what they have is poor and thin, he really believes they would open their veins and shed every drop of it, if it was necessary to do so in order to relieve the distress of any chance guest that should come among them.

After spending a day or two in the enjoyment of the hospitality of this kind-hearted family, and completing in the mean time his preparations for ascending the mountain, M. Nougaret announced his determination to depart. They all urged him to remain longer, especially as there was a heavy gale of wind blowing, by which the air was filled with flying volcanic dust and ashes from the vast stores which had been deposited all over that region by former eruptions. But he was intent on proceeding, and so the horses were loaded and brought to the door, and he bade his hospitable entertainers farewell. The cavalcade was followed by several members of the family to the banks of the river Thyorsa, which was not far distant, in order that they might witness the process of crossing the stream—an undertaking not unattended with danger in such a wind. There was a large, broad, flat-bottomed boat on the bank. The horses were unloaded, and the baggage put into the boat, and then the poor animals were driven into the water with sticks and stones. The boat followed, conveying the baggage and the men. The air was so filled with clouds of dust that in the middle of the stream nothing was to be seen except that an occasional glimpse was now and then afforded of one bank or the other, and of here and there a horse, drifting down with the current, and with only his nose and his tail to be distinguished among the soggy waves.

ICELANDIC SNUFF-BOX.

M. ISSANDIER'S BALLOON, FROM PARIS, DESCENDING NEAR DREUX.—[SEE PAGE 745.]

However, in due time the passage was effected, the boat reached the further bank, the horses were collected from the places in which the stream where they had several scrambled to the shore, the loads were replaced upon their backs, and the cavalcade was fo med in order of march again.

The party arrived after a time at the village of Stonesville. Here the traveler stopped a while, in order to confer with the minister of the place in respect to the best mode of procuring a guide for the ascent of the mountain. The minister received him with great kindness, caused a table to be spread for him with refreshments, and while he was partaking of them stood by, conversing with him in Latin on the subject of Mt. Nougaret which he appeared to find how well informed he was even in respect to those portions of which could hardly be expected to possess the same interest and solicitude as the rest. He found, however, that there was a newspaper published occasionally at Revkjavik, the capital, and that the successive numbers found their way by some means even to this lonely retreat. The minister produced the last number of the paper, and read an article from it, translating it into Latin, as he read it, for the comprehension of his visitor.

When M. Nougaret was ready to resume his journey the minister insisted on accompanying him to the next halting-place, which was a hamlet named Hankadolur. The track lay among the ranges of hills and broken ground and pinnacles which surround the mountain, and in one place the travelers were obliged to cross a patch of loose volcanic dust, that was driven about so furiously by the wind, which was still blowing heavily, as to make the progress of the party extremely disagreeable, if not dangerous. They protected their mouths in some degree by their handkerchiefs, which they wrapped over them, but still they were almost suffocated; and the horses appeared to suffer even more than the men.

TO BE CONTINUED.

BRED THE BONE.

By the Author of "Cayton's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beginner in Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

IN COUPLES.

What tender-nurtured boy, newly-arrived at school—that Paradise when looked back upon from afar, that Inferno of the present—has not awakened from sweet dreams of home to the first busy hear? Who has not pictured to himself the weary months that must elapse before he can once more regain his freedom and his friends? The burden (one may say) is light, but then the back is also what it bears it. It is a grinding woe. Soothing of this, but tenfold in intensity of wretchedness, Richard felt when he awoke for the first time a convicted felon. He had dreamed that Carew was dead, and left him heir of Cranbrook; his mother and his sister Mary and Harry as his wife. The splendor of the house, the beauty of the grand lawn, abused it. It were as vividly presented to him as when he saw them with his eyes; and they were all his own. The hope of his youth, the dream of his manhood, were gratified to the uttermost; yet through all ran an undercurrent which warned a portion of the present reality. In the marshy pond where he had fought the Squire by moonlight the bodies; it was shallow, as it really had been, and he could see their faces as he peered into the water; they were those of Coe and Trevethick. He kept them there, and would not have the pond dragged; but would go thither and look upon them for half a quarter a day. The mansion was full of gay folks—his old town companions invited to a house-party, and behold his greatness (as he had often imagined they should be): Tuly Kyll was his jester now, and Parson Waymper his "chaplain." They were all playing pool as usual, and he was just about to make an easy hazard when Waymper begged his elbow. It was the warder of the jail.

"Come, come—this won't do," said he, gruffly. "You must wrap up when the bell rings, or we shall quarrel. Fold up your hammock, and clean your room."

Even the school-boy does not begin on his first morning to moan on his chimney-piece that the day gone, twenty-four hours of prison life before-hand, Richard made no such complaint. He did not note, who had twenty years of prison life before him, save one day!

He did as he was ordered, wearily, with a heart that had no hope: it seemed to the warder that his duty was sullen.

"I 'ha happens again, young fellow, I report you; and you good-by to your Y C's."

He did not seem to be heard; but Richard could have stabbed him where he stood. There were times to come when the temptation to commit such an act was to be very strong with him; and when no thought of punishment, for loss of right, restrained him, but that of his projected vengeance always did. Every rough word, every insult, every wrong, was treasured up in his mind, and added to the long account against those who had doomed him to such a fate. It should be paid in full one day; and in the mean time the debt was out at compound interest.

He took his sordid meals, his cocoa, his bread, his gruel, not because he had ever any appetite for them, but because without them he should lose his strength. He must husband that for the long-expected hour when he might need it; when the moment had arrived to strike the blow for which his hand was clenched ten times a day. His hate grew every hour, and, like a perfect spring, fed drop by drop about his heart, and made it stone. In the mean time, a fiend in torment could alone imagine what he suffered. He spoke to no one but his warders and the chaplain; for both he was a mystery. He was in communication with his fellows; only once a day for an hour and a half he took his moonrace exercise in the high-walled quadrangle. Tramp, tramp, tramp, each half a dozen paces behind the other, with an officer on the watch to see that speech was preserved.

"Keep your distance, you there, unless you want to be reported."

Richard did not want that; but at times his temper was like a devil incarnate, and for the longer one like a devil incarnate, and for the longer one like a devil incarnate, and for the longer one this. The bald animal: of the place reveal nothing of this terrible secret.

Richard rose at five at clang of bell, cleaned out his cell, and folded up his bed more neatly than did ever chamber-maid; at six was breakfast—porridge, and forty minutes allowed for its enjoyment; then chapel and parade; then labor—mat-making with coarse rushes, on which he became a great proficient. His fingers deftly worked, while his mind needed. At twelve was dinner—bread and potatoes, with seventy minutes allowed for its digestion; then exercise in the yard, and mat-work again till six in summer, and four in winter; prayers, supper, school till eight; when the weary day was done. On Sunday, except two hours of exercise and chapel, Richard was his own master, to brood as much as he would. There were also but more than three holidays in the year, on which it has been witnessed with pleasure the convicts have gambled. There was, however, no such excess at Lingmoor.

As for society, there was the chaplain. This gentleman could make nothing of Richard, though he tried his best. It was evident to him that the young man had something on his mind: if he would only confide in his spiritual adviser, he assured him, comfort could be administered. But no confidence ever took place. It was a most distressing case; here was a youth of superior position, and well educated, as obstinate and stubborn as the most hardened criminal in the establishment. His Bible was never opened. One of his warders had expressed his opinion that No. 81 was vindictive, but for the chaplain) was bound to say he had observed nothing of that. The remarks in his note-book respecting 421 were these: "Richard Yorke's general history, looks ten years older; reserved and cynical; a hopeless infidel, but respectful, uncomplaining, and well-conducted."

Richard had been reported more than once for "inattention to orders," and had also been one of his good marks accordingly. The cause of this was one over which he could now be scarcely said to have control. He had become an absent and distrait man he sometimes hardly knew what was going on about him. Fragmentary reading to which he indulged had, in fact, already postponed the accomplishment of the very object which enthralled his fancies. The effect of this was in various; and he had good reason for the apprehension which existed in that his wits might leave him before that day of liberty arrived, which was still so many years distant. On account of his previous reading, which was described as the prison books as landscape-painter, he had been put to a handicraft trade; but he now applied for harrow-pins, and the surgeon seconded his application. This change of occupation, which was destined in some respects to be beneficial, proved at the outset most unfortunate. The outdoor toil was mostly spade and barrow labor on the ground on which the convicts worked in gangs—each gang under supervision of two warders, armed with cutlass and musket. The first face that Richard's eyes lit on, when he found himself in the open, with the free air of heaven blowing in him, and already, as it seemed, bursting the seals of health and hope, was that of Robert Balfour. In his joyous excitement he sprang forward and held out his hand; the other hesitated—for the old cracksman was prudence itself—then, as if with an irresistible impulse, grasped the offered fingers, with an "I am right glad to see you, lad." The next instant they were in the custody, and marched back to the prison, charged with the high crime and misdemeanor of conversation, which at Lingmoor was called "colloguing," "conspiracy," and other terrible terms. Brought before the authorities upon the charge, Richard, as usual, confessed himself alone to blame; the fresh air had, in a manner, intoxicated him, after his long confinement within stone walls; and the sight of his old acquaintance had caused him to forget the rules. The offense-list being examined, it was found, however, that No. 421 was a good deal in the habit of forgetting. His cell-warder gave him but an indifferent character; and Richard, in a fury, committed the fatal indiscretion of rebutting the latter accusation by a counter-charge of tyranny and ill-usage. The next instant he could have bitten his tongue out—but it was too late. He felt that he had made an enemy of this body-servant, who was also his master, for the remainder of his term. An "old hand," indeed, is a professional gaoruter (in which case he is generally too much respected to be ill-used), is always careful to keep on good terms with his attendant; otherwise—since a warder's word, if it be not law, is at all events worth that of his prisoner—there will be no end to your troubles. This is not because warders are not as a class a most respectable body of men, but simply because you can't get all the virtues for a guinea a week. A strict and impartial sense of justice is especially a rare and dear article—even governors have sometimes been deficient in it. Most men have a little spice, sullen, ignorant fellow, in a false position; he had an almost absolute power over his fellow-creatures, and like many—perhaps like most who have ever possessed such a thing—it was too much for him.

"I am a tyrant, am I?" said he, significantly, as he marched Richard back to his cell after sentence was decreed. "Very well; we'll see."

Richard got bread and water for three days certain, and, what was far worse, another "monstrous cantle" might be cut out of that period of remission which began to be all the dearer in his eyes the more problematical it grew. Garroters, as we have said, were respected at Lingmoor; they are so rarely with their legal appellate hands, and so dull-brained with respect to consequences; yet Richard's warder, when he brought his bread and water, with a grin, that was probably as near to death by stress of giving as he had ever been during his professional experience. It was not that he was on his own account the object of his prisoner's wrath, but that by his conduct he had, as it were, supplemented the inexpiable wrong originally committed, and earned for himself a portion of the unlying hate which was due elsewhere. "I may kill this brute some day," thought Richard, ruefully, "in spite of myself." And he resolved on the first opportunity to communicate to a fellow-secret which was on his mind to a friendly ear; so that after at least should be utilized to the disadvantage of the foes, in case of accident. No question should one day compel him to sacrifice a lesser victim, and make his great revenge of no avail. He had not once entered into his mind that he could forgive his persecutor, but only that circumstances might render it impossible.

The occasion for which he looked was not long in coming. His case of punishment was over, and he was once more marched out upon the moor, and again found himself in Balfour's company. Not a sign passed between them, but one that before they could be talked. "I fear you have been suffering for my sake," said Richard.

"It is no matter. My shoulders are broad enough for two," returned the other, kindly. "I am right glad to see you back, though it is changed. You have been ill, have you not, lad?"

"I don't know. Something is wrong with me, and I may be worse—that is why I want to speak to you. Listen!"

"All right. Don't look this way, and shift your voice if either of these dogs comes to leeward."

"If you get away from this place, and don't—"

"Now, none of that, lad," interrupted the old man, earnestly. "That's the worst thing you can get into your head at Lingmoor, if you ever want to leave it. I've been here now more than 'ten.' I am three times your age, and yet I mean to get out again and enjoy myself. I've got a twenty years now, without counting remission—though I've got into disgrace with my cursed watch-dog, and that's a great deal of time—but I mean to feed a good heart."

"I shall keep a firm one," answered Richard, "never fear. I wish to guard against contingencies, that's all. If I die—"

"Don't talk of that, lad," said Balfour, sturdily, quite innocent of any plagiarism from Uncle Toby.

"Very good," continued Richard, coolly. "If you get out of this before me, let us merely say, I have something of value which may be of service to you. There's a man in Breaknock-shire called Carew of Crompton—"

"I know him well—a gentleman born as put on the gloves with Bendigo at Birmingham?"

"Very likely; at all events, you only knows him in the Midlands. He will go to the dogs some day, and his estate will be sold. You have saved money, you tell me; if by chance you can't invest it better than in the lot called Wheal Danes, a mine in Cornwall—"

"I believe you every word," said Balfour; "but a mine would be rather over my figure, wouldn't it? I have only got a hundred pounds."

"That would be plenty. It's a disused mine and supposed to be worked out. There's only one man in England that knows it is not so, except myself. Will and testament, as the auction, expecting to get it cheap; but do you bid two hundred pounds beforehand, and you will get it for a trifle. Say you want the place—it's close to the sea—for building purposes; they'll think it's you, and jump at the offer. Dames, I assimple is not supposed to be worth five shillings an acre. It will turn out a gold mine to whoever buys it."

"Wheal Danes," repeated Balfour, carefully. "I'll remember the name. I am obliged to you, but I not forget the man as told me of it. It's not the profit that I am speaking on: that will be yours, I hope, as it will be in all reason, and not mine; but it's the confidence." The old man's voice grew husky with emotion. "Dames, I liked you from the first, as was natural enough; but there was no reason why you should take a fancy to an old thief like me more than to any other among this pretty lot here. The first as speaks of secrets is of course the one as is most in risk, but I will do what I can to show myself honorable on my side. You have trusted me, and I'll trust you."

"Have you any plan to get away from this?" whispered Richard, eagerly. "All that I have shall be yours: I swear it."

"Nay, lad; your word's enough," returned the other, reproachfully. "And I've nothing nothing of yours; indeed I don't."

"I was a brute to talk so to you, Balfour," answered Richard, penitently. "But you don't know how I crave for freedom: it makes me hard to think of it."

"Ay, ay: I know," sighed the old fellow. "It used to be so with me once; but now—but now I've promise you we shall be the men to know it. It's another matter altogether. I'll mount to tell you about. You've given me an address to remember: let me give you another in exchange for it—No. 91 Earl Street, Knightsbridge. That's where mother lives, if the poor soul is alive, to whom you wrote for me from Cross Key. She'll be dead, however, long before you or I get out of this, that's certain, or I should not be telling you what I do; for one's mother is the best friend of all friends, and should come first and foremost. Well, the world do look more no good, and if any thing happens to me, I have neither chick nor child to inherit it. I am speaking of this eight hundred pound, lad. If I get into the world, I shall want for myself, for I doubt my limbs will be too stiff for work by that time; but if not, then you shall have it—every shilling. I am digging my own grave, as it might be, with this spade, and making my will, do you see?" said the old fellow, smiling.

"I thank you for your kind intentions," returned Richard, absently; "it's very good of you, I'm sure." His hopes of some scheme of present release had been excited by the old man's manner, and this faint and far-off prospect of a legatesship seemed but of little worth.

"I may not have another chance to tell you about it, Dames, and I should be sorry to think, if any thing happened to me, that it should lie there unclaimed. I've been accidental like, and perhaps fall into the hands of the bluebottles. Your memory's good, my lad, I dare say, and you won't forget the number nor the street."

"My memory is very good, friend, 'returned Richard, 'and I shall have only two or three things else to keep in it. And you, on your part, you will not forget the mine?"

"Nay, nay; I've got it safe: Wheal Danes, Wheal Danes."

"Silence, down there!" roared the warder and nothing but the squeak of the barrow-wheel and the clean slice of the spade was heard in air that throng of involuntary toilers.

HANDWRITING.

MANY people laugh at what is called "graphomancy," or the art of judging characters by handwriting; and yet all acknowledge that handwriting does indicate something. Every one allows a difference between a man's and a woman's hand; we hear people speak of a vulgar hand, a gentlemanly hand, a clerkly hand, etc. "I had no idea," said Archbishop Whately, "of the remarkable proof that handwriting is sometimes, at least, an index to character. I had a pupil at Oxford whom I liked in most respects greatly; there was but one thing about him which seriously displeased me—his hand, and that, as I often told him, was his handwriting: it was not bad as writing, but it had a mean, shuffling character in it, which always inspired me with a feeling of suspicion. While he remained at Oxford I saw nothing to justify this suspicion; but subsequently to which he was afterward engaged, and in which I saw more of his character than I had done before, when he proved that the writing had spoken truly. But I knew of a much more curious case, in which a celebrated 'graptomancer' was able to read character more correctly by handwriting than he had been able to do by personal observation. He was on a visit at a friend's house, where, among other guests, he met a lady whose conversation and manners greatly struck him, and for whom he conceived a strong friendship, based on the esteem he felt for her as a singularly high-minded woman and single-hearted woman. The lady of the house, who knew her real character to be the very reverse of what she appeared, was desirous to know whether M.—— would be able to discover this by her handwriting. Accordingly, she procured a slip of this lady's writing (having ascertained he had never seen it), and gave it him one evening as the handwriting of a person whose character she wished to submit to decipher. His usual habit when he undertook to read character was to write the name of a letter, eat down lengthwise so as not to show any sentences, to his room at night, and to bring his mind to his judgment in writing in the next morning. On this occasion, when the party were seated at the breakfast-table, the lady whose writing he had unconsciously been examining made some observation which particularly struck Mr. ——as seeming to betoken a very noble and truthful character. He expressed his admiration of her sentiments very warmly, adding at the same time to the lady of the house, 'Not so, by-the-way, your friend,' and he put into her hand the slip of writing of her guest which she had given him the evening before, over which he had written the words, 'Fascinating, false, and lofty-minded.' The lady of the house kept the secret, and Mr. —— never knew that the writing on which he had pronounced so severe a judgment was that of the friend he so greatly admired."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE clerks at the New York City Hall are so accustomed to getting marriage licenses signed with O and an apostrophe that one of them recently, addressing a friend, wrote, "Take letter with, 'and O'Riley' yours," etc. The letter was to a gentleman in O'Main, Nebraska.

WHY is the world like a piano?—Because it is full of sharps and flats!

A close-fisted man invited a friend to dinner, and provided only two mutton-chops. Upon remonstrating with his host, My friend, when you invite me to a dinner, you set your dinner before me." "Very well," replied the host, "you may begin with the friend replied, "Yes, I do; but where is your dinner?"

A man in Buffalo pulled off his coat and jumped in the canal to save a woman from drowning, when a pickpocket stole his pocket-book from the coat, and the woman swore at him for pulling her hair in his efforts to save her life. There isn't much inducement in Buffalo for a man to act as a retriever.

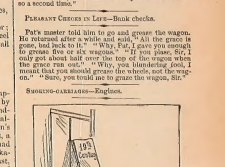
"Will you dake sbanding?" said a German testator to a friend, while standing over a tavern. "I don't care if I do," was the reply. "Vell, den, let us dake a valk."

A banker lent a graceless scamp fifty dollars in the hope of getting rid of him; but, to his surprise, the fellow paid the money punctually on the day agreed upon, and a short time afterward applied to him for another loan. "No," said the banker; "you have deceived me once, and I am resolved you shall never do so a second time."

PLEASANT CREEKS IN LIFE—Brook cheeks.

PAT'S master told him to go and grease the wagon. He returned after a while and said, "All the grease is gone, but back to it." "Why, Pat, I gave you enough to grease five or six wagons." "If you please, Sir, I only got about half over the top of the wagon when the grease ran out." "Why, you blundering fool, I meant that you should grease the wheels, not the wagon." "Sure, and you never told me so plainer than that."

SMOKING-GARRIAGE—Engines.



A rich old speculator in Chicago, It is said, has sent a request to our Italian minister to engage "Mr. Chromo" to paint him a picture worth not less than $50,000.

AN INDIAN ACT—Pulling down the blind.

"WIFE, I don't see how they send letters on them 'ere wires without tearin' 'em all to bits." "They don't send the paper," said the wife. "They just send the writing in a fluid state."

A liberal translation of "tempus fugit" in "few got time."

The man who by mistake took a drink from a bottle of mucilage says he has felt "stuck up" ever since.

BEHIND THE RAMPARTS—A CRITICAL MOMENT.

IRREGULAR FRENCH TROOPS.

FRENCH SOLDIERS.

We give on this page some illustrations that show the motley character of the armies on which France now relies for deliverance. The honest-looking but not very smart nor intelligent Breton would doubtless make excellent soldiers in time, but no amount of drilling they are likely to get before the Prussians force them into the field can make them equal to the educated peasant-soldiery directed by MOLTKE. As for the Turcos, and other wild people brought over from Algeria, they are good for nothing in a war like this. Against their own kind their military training would make them efficient troops; but when employed against such men as Germany sends into the field, they must share the fate of all savages brought into conflict with a civilized race. Their bravery and dash avail nothing against the steady resolution and intelligent training of the Germans.

TURCOS IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

A BALLOON DESCENT.

THE dispatch of balloons from Paris conveying persons and bags of letters, when the wind favors the passage, to territory beyond the Prussian lines of investment, is a remarkable characteristic of the siege of that capital. The picture on page 741 shows the descent of one of these balloons at Dreux, on the Eure, fifty miles west of Paris. The aeronaut, M. ISSANDIER, who was alone in the balloon, was greatly alarmed on nearing the ground by the approach of a number of horsemen, whom he took for Prussian Uhlans; but he had discharged so much gas that he could not help coming down then and there. To his great relief they turned out to be French volunteer cavalry scouts, ordered to welcome him, and assist his landing on terra firma. M. ISSANDIER gladly availed himself of their protection, and proceeded to Tours with important dispatches for the government from Paris.

PRUSSIAN SOLDIERS COOKING IN THE TRENCHES BEFORE PARIS.

THE END OF ALL.

WHEN mirth is full and free
Some sudden gloom shall be;
When haughty power mounts high
The Watcher's axe is nigh.
All growth has bound; when greatest found
It hastes to die.

When the rich town, that long
Has lain its lure among,
Tempts its pageants vast,
And vaunts—it shall not last!
Bright tints that shine are but a sign
Of summer past.

And when thine eyes surveys,
With their adoring gaze,
And yearning heart, thy friend—
Love to its grave doth tend.
All gifts have, save Truth, but grave
Toward an end.

WHERE THE PATHS PARTED.

AFTER some restless wakening up and down the room the young lady had paused before the mirror, and now stood with her eyes riveted upon the image revealed to her.

This circumstance, you will think, was not in itself remarkable. Very true, it was not; but the fact referred to was far from ordinary.

It was a miracle of contradictions. It was a young face and an old face at once. It was fresh and yet a faded face. A care-worn, thoughtful face, that might, nevertheless, have been mistaken for a merry face. It was trustful, perhaps; or was it perhaps cynical? But one thing one might swear: among all its shadowy meanings of expressions it was very earnest, very honest. There was not a taint, either, of the dry-rot of vanity.

The eyes thus sounding themselves were not large, but were well shaped and liquid, and delicately charming, through their limpid softness and calm sincerity. The forehead above them was rather high and full, and upon it, between the somewhat heavily marked eyebrows, were two or three fine lines, visible in a strong light. It was the effect of these, perhaps, to fade the past round cheeks, if you observed them. The nose was not remarkable; the nostrils, thin and flexible, being quite too wide, with a slight dent in the upper part of their fine curves. Its whole shape have been wished away. But the mouth—the mouth was beautiful! perfect, in right of its outlines, its color, and its wonderful, delightful sweetness. And the chin was almost as pretty; decided, but gently carved, as lovingly impressed with one smooth dimple in its centre. I am sure that no woman would have called the face pretty, and no artist could have called it plain. It was framed by much (natural) dark brown hair, just now hanging loose and long about the girl's shoulders.

Between her elbows, where, for the better support of her chin, she rested them on the mantel by an open letter, hastily opened, evidently, for the envelope was on the floor, and torn in two or three pieces. And somehow, though her attentive glance had never touched it since she paused in her walk, you would have felt almost distinctly certain, if you had seen her, that this letter contained the motive of her present reflection. She did not sigh once. Observe, that she did not once sigh. But when her scrutiny had lasted perhaps five minutes a film seemed to create itself in her soft eyes, which still regarded themselves in an alien, critical way, exceedingly strange. The mist thickened, clouded her vision, and, resolving itself into two heavy and pearlish tears, rolled slowly down her cheeks. Others followed; and she watched them fall without the smallest change of expression. Presently, however, a slight spasmodic stricture contracted her lips, and a sob caught in her throat and choked her. At that she turned from the glass with a gesture of disdain toward the figure in it; but, seemingly in despite of herself, her head sank, she buried her face in her hands, her shoulders beat, her bosom heaved, her whole figure was convulsed by a sudden storm of some nameless emotion.

Almost immediately she lifted her head, and cried out aloud, passionately:

"Do my tears change my thing? I am a fool! My God! were there not reasons enough? What was the Heavenly reason for making me?"

Then she laughed. Not a self-scornful, female-Mephistophelian laugh; not even a merry heart-broken little sound, full of music.

The next thing was to take up the letter and reperuse it; and again; and again yet several times. Its sole and simple contents were what follows:

"DEAR MISS FELIX,—Hitherto I have been too busy to indulge myself with the happy-making pleasure of a visit to you; but if you are disengaged to-morrow evening, and it is sound for acclamation, I shall have a holiday, and inflict an hour or two of it upon you. If I bring with me the body-guard of which you wrote, which you maintain I support, I shall hope to leave them behind. Yours very truly, "ANTONIUS BOWARD."

It may not be out of place to state, at this point, that Mr. Augustine Howard was a journalist, industrious in his way, but hopelessly familiar genius for never making money; which was only equaled by his gift for throwing it away if chance ever forced any into his pocket. Miss Carmen Felix was a resident governess.

Long after it would have seemed that she must have extracted every possibility of meaning from the simple words of the note, Miss Carmen rose, and remarked to herself, philosophically:

"Well, the world turns round. To-morrow he becomes to-day, and it is time I should dress myself."

The direct sequence of these words seemed to be that she should so dress again, which she did, and looked thoughtfully at the carpet a long time. Then she slowly unlocked a writing-desk at her elbow, and selected from a thick package of letters, directed in the firm clear hand of a man of business, one—the most recently dated. It was what is called "a love-letter," in the entirest sense of the phrase; devoted, ardent, and decidedly silly. In addition to the absurdities inherent in such a composition, it was noticeable that in this specimen the capitals were not correctly placed, and that the punctuation was managed in accordance with a system original with the writer.

It is impossible to imagine any one with a more vivid perception of such infelicities than Miss Felix; but she read the letter through, word by word, slowly and attentively, twice; then slowly and carefully replaced it among the others, laid the package in its proper compartment, closed the desk methodically, and locked it with a sudden decisive click. Once more she spoke to herself—thus to speak being a bad habit of hers.

"There must be a death that he loves me," she said, right sadly. "Unfortunately there can not be a death of that. I wish I were not going to-day this evening too. However, I must comply with him."

She attended to this duty with scrupulous exactness. And though she was far from looking as handsome or as charming as she could look, she still dressed with unlikely about her bare shoulders, I am bound to say that the result would not have been unsatisfactory to the man she had loved her, which, thank Heaven! I never did. It is, perhaps, a matter for regret that I did not; it is downright fatality to love such a woman as Carmen Felix—a woman capable of so much controlling power. But what was about one would be pleasant, no doubt. Water-lilies are pleasant things to look at, but if I were in a strong swimmer? I would prefer they should not twine their soft long stems around my neck. I have noticed that there is a class of women (this is said in parenthesis), happily a small class, and unhappily a fascinating one, who do most particularly delight in making persuade themselves that they are conscientiously refraining from any and every thing which Carmen Felix may have belonged to it.

After she was dressed, she felt her heart dissink when she sat waiting. It did not flutter —it never did—but somehow impeded her respiration. Then, suddenly, it left off, which she did not disguise from herself, distressed her, and she was aware also that it would be apt to flush her face alarmingly. Yet she had resolved in the course of Emerson to quiet herself. It will be admitted that she chose wisely. Carmen Felix never was against her. When the servant entered her room a little while after, with Mr. Howard's card, she was trembling and changed five times over these words, which she had lit upon, and twice erased:

"Whatever is fated, that will take place. The great, immense mind of Jove is not to be transgressed."

"Very well," said Miss Felix, rising; "I will be down in a moment." She added to herself, "But should I not be free from responsibility, in any rate." After a little pause and laughing: "Oh yes! Amen, I say, remember Mr. Howard Ainsworth's speak with perfect ease again, and yet with a curious effect of forcing herself to say what she was saying.

"Don't you remember? He used to bring me flowers sometimes when I was boarding at Mrs. Dixon's. You did not like him much, though, I believe."

"His favorite outlook?" Mr. Howard repeated her words without emphasis.

"He likes it very much indeed; and who can wonder? All my friends are not so forgotten as to be, I hope, unremembered, Mr. Howard. By-the-way, that reminds me that I am angry with you. What is the reason that you have not come before?"

Mr. Howard had been in the room but a few while—perhaps a minute—and no words of particular meaning had been spoken by either. Miss Felix, I suppose, was self-possessed, I suppose, the impossibility of making commonplaces commonplaces; of banishing meaning from words and sentences; of quite covering the fire which leaped in tremulous flashes to the surface of the ice-cold and cold unreproved by the eyes of the other. He looked deeply into her eyes as long as she would let him, and when they dropped beneath his, behind their long fringes he spoke. Slowly, as a man speaks who speaks to be heard, and to be heard only by those for whom he has brushed wrangling; as a woman speaks when she quietly soothes her child who is dying. He spoke in a very sweet, rapid, dangerous way in darkness; as a diplomatist touches tenderly the heart of a woman before he pierces it.

"I think I can explain," he answered, gazing at her eyelids as if they were white eyes—"I think I can explain, if you will let me. I can assure myself of two things. To make them certain beyond a doubt. One was assured me months since. The other—Do you remember a little note you wrote me two months since?"

"I suppose I did not destroy it," said Miss Felix, in a low voice, without looking up. Her face was quite white.

"It was of importance to me," he answered, with a painful and pallid smile, "when it took the form of a note to frame a suitable reply. I have brought one with me. I came to make it, and I beg you to hear me. I wish to make you feel—"

"Don't go on!" cried Miss Felix, in a sharp, unnatural voice. "I have something to tell you. I am going to be married in October!"

There was a dead silence after that, and a sense of suffocation in the room. A burning pain devoured Miss Felix's brain, neck and chest below, and receded, leaving an ashy pallor. She was conscious of the horrible fear and shame that forgot every thing, even the despair she had thrust into her listener's heart. She had held in her hand a carven fan; its delicate handle snapped, and it fell to the floor; neither of them made the small, sharp noise, or stooped to recover the toy. Mr. Howard did not seem to notice the advantage she had given him. He looked at her like a man bewildered by a sudden blow. At last he held out his hand, and when she placed hers within it he crushed the soft palm.

"I congratulate you from my heart on whatever is likely to make you happy. God bless you, Miss Carmen Felix!"

He uttered these words in a husky voice, that came from a pierced heart, and that thrilled his listener's like living flame. "If God ever made a creature who deserves happiness, it is you: if a man's deathless—if my eternity—could do it seems to me you would have it in spite of God himself."

"Oh, even! what am I, that you should say such things?" The words dropped from her lips in a half whisper, her white, scared face without a feeling the anxious passion of his. "Why—oh, my God!—why did you not answer my letter?"

She rose from her chair. I can not describe her look, nor his. Her gesture was unutterable, horror of herself, despair, half extinguishing agony. He stood as he had been struck, silent for one moment, she changed. Her eyes lost their intensity; a little color crept into her cheeks; her high mood seemed to lower itself; her whole figure somehow to settle. She sank back into her chair as if she were tired, and her fingers loosely, and pressed them against her breast; she drew a long, slow breath, and with a faint smile said, murmuringly:

"Do, pray, forgive me! Sometimes I am so silly."

"Forgive you! I can not understand you. If I—if I could think a possible—"

"Oh, I hope it is possible!" she cried, opening her eyes and looking at him merrily, with the same lonely light and rippled over them, "when, a while ago, up stairs, she had called herself a fool. She was very much obliged, now, and was in danger of them just now. But, you see, though I expect to be very happy, of course, the thought of it never kept my heart from these distresses me. You must have been truly amazed at such a singular unconcernedness of mine. Pray, pardon me, if you were. Yes, I am going to marry Mr. Ainsworth." Then she went on with increasing brightness, her cheeks burning scarlet while she talked. "I wish you were better acquainted with him; I am sure you would like him very much indeed. There is nothing remarkable about him; he is nowise brilliant; but he is very good, and he will make me more to do with everyday happiness than all the brilliancy in the world. Don't you agree with me? And I am very fond of him, you know, since I am to marry him—he has plenty of money, And I have been sensible, just now, reasons —what not—so long that I shall be quite ready, no doubt, to appreciate pretty things and handsome. Ah, I had you are thinking of going? Why, I supposed I should have a nice long visit. Yes, yes," seeing Mr. Howard turning flippancy, "you remember you have to present me with your flowers."

"Nay, I am sure you will pardon me without an explanation." Mr. Howard's haggard face was a curious study of pity and his low voice, uncertain and tremulous, had the same quality. "I would gladly do anything my sky, if the object of my coming is answered. I can not affect indifference well, and I do not wish to pain you."

"Oh, I am sorry you came!" repeated Miss Felix, with uncomprehending, cordial warmth. "I am sorry you came, and I am glad you came. I should hope for the pleasure of reintroducing you to Mr. Ainsworth. I expect him also this evening."

"There is the more reason for a speedy leave-taking," said Mr. Howard, with the frank courtesy of a gentleman. "I fear it will be a long one to us. I shall probably leave for Europe in a day or two. I shall know I have accomplished a visit to my mother for a long time, and the pressure will be a fortnight or more."

Miss Carmen expressed her frankly warm regrets and good wishes with eyelids that never quivered, and with a face that never flushed. But just as he was leaving—He had said farewell quietly, and had shut her hand in his, and held it open in a hungry, clinging grasp, that seemed as though it could not loosen, and looked at her with the silent, death agony of a heart-rent beginning in his eyes. This gleam fell into hers with all its weight. She pierced him deep, and sunk out of it in inexplicable lethargy. She seized with both hands the one that had held hers, and pressed it with a passion of tenderness against her breast. There fell from her lips one monosyllable, but it sounded like the falling of a heart-rent deep in the darkness, as the murmured, and stopped. At that his eyes lighted with a renewed interrogation; there was a smile in hers, and no answer.

When he had gone she stood still in the same attitude, looking at the vacant air as if she saw his ghost. She was quiet and motionless a long time. Then she spoke:

"I wonder if I am dead, or alive," she murmured, smiling quietly. But her face looked ashen, and her lips were torn open with pain. She put her hand on her heart with a whimsical air of interrogation. "It certainly beats! Well, it is a comfort to know where to place one's self. But if I am not dead, I am certainly drowning. I feel nothing, and I don't wonder at wonderful things. Yes, I'm certainly dreaming. To be dead might be the fate of the two. There is a doubt, at least, about the quality of the dreams they shut up in the coffin with one. I wonder if pins or crosses hold the heads down. Ah, what a pity I did not think of that doubt before!"

This she murmured, after a minute of silence, with a quaint air of calm affectedness, which, in some inexplicable way, might have suggested a broken heart.

"Yet for our love shall fate retire,
Nor God relent for our desires,
Till the grave open for our call.
The end is more than joy or anguish,
Than lives that laugh or lives that anguish,
The poppied sleep, the end of all!"

She repeated these lines in that musical, soft, sad voice of hers, whose subtle, heart-seeking intonations somehow always reminded me of the leaping and murmuring of white flame. The last low cadence dispersed itself like melting perfume. The bell startled the listening silence. Miss Carmen clasped her hands and looked upward.

"Now God help me to do the hard, right thing!"

The gesture was honest, the aspiration sincere and fervent. But from her lips it might well have reminded one of the text on a good Mussulman's sharp and cunning—pretty quoted at bloody work.

Mr. Ainsworth entered the next moment. He was what is called a "good-looking" man; decidedly so, indeed, though the cast of his features was rather heavy, and though his figure, which was of no more than the medium height, was somewhat too stoutly built. His was very fair, with a profusion of blonde hair, and blue eyes, which were honest and tender, but not bright. His manner was more choice of courtesy, and his appearance and elegant, unassuming dress those of a man of wealth. I am bound to say that the difference between himself and Miss Carmen was conducted in the manner of bestrothed lovers. But this over-fine and well-bred lady had merely submitted to an embrace which she could hardly avoid), she seated herself at some little distance from her lover, and gave a hasty conversation of commonplaces. There was visible about her a remulous agitation, a certain cowardice—a certain irresolution in the nervous twitching of her clasped fingers. But Mr. Ainsworth was not the person to observe either indication.

However, love is prescient, wherever its home may be; and he grew uneasy after a little while, without knowing why. Perhaps he remembered that his mistress did not use to receive him in such a chilling distance.

"Come Carmen," he said at last, "come and sit beside me on the sofa. I want to tell you about something important. I want to explain to you about some matters I have been looking at. You remember the corner house I spoke of, the brick, with brown-stone trimmings, dear—I—why don't you come and sit beside me, Carmen?"

"I'm coming. But brick and brown-stone are such heavy topics! Don't talk to me about houses, please. Besides, I know all about it beforehand: 'the man won't hear reason, won't give in an inch,' you'll say, 'and therefore I shall you purchase whether or no?' Indeed, I can't tell. I'm not a woman of business. Please I myself."

She loaned her head back, and folded her hands, and closed her eyes. She was pallid under them, but they seemed so. She looked indifferent, almost tired.

"Why, surely, Carmen, it is something to you!" said Mr. Ainsworth, after a minute's surprised silence. "But perhaps you are not well. If I won't weary you, love, with details that you don't care for. Come dear, and sit beside me a little and let me die, you shall go over it with me, if you will, and see all for yourself. You will understand it better then."

"You find me rather stupid to-night, perhaps?"

"You stupid?" cried the lover with ardor, and would have kissed her; but she avoided the embrace, and seemed a little hurt.

"Carmen! What is the matter with you to-night?"

"The matter? with me? Am I not looking well? It is this blue ribbon, perhaps; blue is not becoming to me, in spite of my complexion. But just now I am anxious to hear what you wish about the house.

"My darling," said Mr. Ainsworth, beginning to look puzzled as well as grieved, "I thought the subject was you?"

"It did, but I've changed my mind. Ferdinand—you—you tell me if I ask you."

Mr. Ainsworth was very distinctly in love, and it took only the slight accent of kindness in this question to banish the shadow which had begun to creep over him.

"I will do any thing on earth for you, my pet!" he answered, with devotion almost overpowering to the subject.

And so he began, immediately forgetting his momentary pique in his desire to please her, and shortly entering into his subject on source. For though he was a young man, with a fortune, and courted in consequence, he was full of home longings and fine domestic instincts; and he had pleased himself for many a week with imagining all sorts of pretty contrivances, and luxurious nooks and corners, in the new house he was to make ready for the bird he had won, and which he truly thought of Paradise. So he told her all he meant to do, and mixed up his descriptions with raptures and ardent epithets that showed his very soul. And Carmen—though her head still lying back against the wall, her hand in his, he having captured it long ago. The color had quite sunk out of her face. It had not faded suddenly; the blood seemed to have drained itself away, to have fallen like the mercury when the weather chills.

"Do you like it?" he asked at last.

"Yes; that is—She broke. Now describe its mistress—"

"Describe its mistress—to you? Ah, I can't do that! God made her, and made her perfect; too good for any home but heaven! And God grant I may be there first, and see the spirit in the flesh!"

He added this aspiration after a moment's silence, with an egotism and a sudden, poignant anguish of love which love alone can create or justify. "And she is beautiful as well as good. Kiss me, Carmen."

She let him kiss her cheek, and then, with a quick, bitter sigh, turned her lips to his for one immeasurable instant. His frame quivered from head to foot: he could not speak. He held her fast, and looked at her—looked at her as a man looks at but one woman on earth—as he has never indeed his very soul, and his whole being yearned to her. But she was gone, suddenly and far from his lips.

"Please let me go." The words came in a soft, voice, which, being so distinct just then, had death in it. Let me go, Ferdinand. I shall never be your mistress of this house."

He did not seem to hear her, and would have drawn her head down against his breast.

"Let me go, Ferdinand. I shall never live in the house you have been making ready for me. You must find another mistress for it, my poor friend; a better one than I."

He loosed his hold of her, and stared at her with exacted brows. Then he spoke, it was huskily and painfully and slowly:

"I don't get so, Carmen. Darling, don't jest so. You puzzle me and you pain me. I don't understand you. I can not bear to hear you talk so, even in jest. Tell me what it is."

"No: I don't love you," answered the girl, quickly, with no pause.

He seized her hands, and crushed them with a fierce pressure.

"Good God! What do you mean?"

"I have wanted to tell you before, Ferdinand—often." And her voice was low and very hoarse and dry. "I have wanted to tell you often. But until this evening I did not know how wicked and how cruel I was to torture you so. Now I can not marry you."

A great cramp from his lips. He looked at her with the eyes of a drowning wretch in sight of succor. She turned her face away, and went on:

"I want to ease your pain by telling you just what I am. I want you to know what I am. Will you hear me, Ferdinand? Then you could only despise me as I do myself! Then you would read me as you have read me, and would trample on every thought of me; you would disdain to suffer for such a creature as I!" She interrupted herself, and a drowning wretch in sight; she had glanced at the face confronting her. "Oh, don't look at me so, Ferdinand. I will cure your love for me. Only listen. Ferdinand, before I saw you I loved some one. I would have married him, but he was poor, and he did not; I thought he had seen my love and despised it, and he was very wretched and very poor. Then you came. I was so lonesome and so miserable. And you seemed to love me—I don't ask, I don't care, if you did not—but only listen. I remembered I was poor and plain, and not very young nor talented, and I knew you had money, and I could perhaps make you happy at least. And—oh! Ferdinand, understand, for God's sake, how I came to do it! I knew you had money, and I longed for ease. And so I promised to marry you. But this evening he came back to me. He must have asked me to marry him, and I would not let him. I told him that I could not marry you. And I can not! I can not! I can not!"

She covered her eyes with her hands, because she could not look at him any longer. She trembled with horror of herself and terror for him. His face was like that of a man in a fever. "Is this the right thing?" She heard his slow, difficult breaths, and saw him shudder. His face was utterly changed. It had grown old and gray and ghastly. With a wolfish, murderous light in the eyes. He spoke slowly and painfully.

"You are going to marry him, then? Damn him!"

"He bade me farewell," she whispered, pallid to the lips. "He has gone away; he will never return."

"You double-faced flirt! Fly after him; hang upon his neck. Curse him! Kiss him. And pray God—"

She held up her hands with one of her strange, speaking gestures. All the long weeks of her humiliation, all the pleading of undefended weakness. Her eyelashes were wet with tears that came no further. Her noble bosom seemed broken up with smothered sobs. At that sight—the misery and the weakness of the woman—he was the man once more himself. He held out his arms, with a strange, dumb yearning, and drew her close again to his breast. He kissed her head, figure in his arms, and kissed her forehead again and again; the despair of his own heart was lulled by the called love; endearing name a thousand times—his love, his life, his flower, his pretty bird of thought. It was instinct that drew her way above price! And she lay in his embrace without a word; she had neither voice nor power out a word; she had neither voice nor power out a word; she had instinct that drew her away from him at last. Then she held his hands in hers, and looked at him with a ghastly smile.

"Only reproach me! Ah, only tell me you forgive me because you despise me!"

"Carmen! Is there no hope? Don't you think you can learn to love me—a little? I would die for you, Carmen!"

Her grief broke into passionate sobs at last, and there fell upon his hands a mingled rain of tears and kisses.

"I do like you—too well, too well to marry you. Your wife should give you her whole heart, and that I can not. Forgive me, and live to thank me for saving you from such a woman as I am!"

Let the rest pass. She remained steadfast. In spite of his pleading, of the traitor in her own breast, of her remorse and his despair, she sent him from her.

Mr. Howard sailed in two days. He passed quite away from her life; she never saw him nor heard of him again. Within some years Mr. Ainsworth married a sweet and loving girl, who was not in love with Carmen had been, but who gave to his life its calmer light of content.

And Carmen. She, too, was married—to a clergyman. He was quite a severe man, with exalted views of his office; decidedly inclined to Romanism. During six months his wife was very ill and a invalid. After that she wrote a book. It was a strange volume, not successful, and which was severely, yelling fatalism and despair. It was the cause of difference between herself and her husband, which resulted in a total separation, during the greatly commiserating the sanctified minister of God.

I have in a letter in her private journal inscribed with a date—the date of this one evening in her life which I have endeavored to describe, as it is burned in a flower, brown and crisp, which she wore in her hair that day. And the place is kept with a blue ribbon.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE high and exposed situation of Willehmshöhe, the present residence of the ex-Emperor Napoleon, is said to be unsuited for the sufferers very severe. It doubtedly a prolonged sojourn there would be trying to the health of persons accustomed to the rigors of a northern climate. This fact, added to the circumstance that the Empress Eugenie's health is now very cold, may have given rise to the report that he is about to remove from Willehmshöhe to Wilhelmsthal in Ems. But that is it may, this rumor brings into notice that little island in the Mediterranean. Ellis is about eighteen miles long, and its greatest width is twelve miles. It has an area of about ninety-seven square miles, and a population, according to census of 93,000, of whom between 700 and 8000 are proprietors of the soil. It has numerous mountainous, and some of its peaks rise to the height of 3000 feet above the level of the sea. Its coast is generally rocky, and rises from shoreside in the valleys. Red and white wine, merino salt, sardines, anchovies, and other fish are among the products of Ellis. It is also noted for its iron and other minerals. During the brief sovereignty of Napoleon I. at Ellis he made many improvements upon the island.

The English who, from motives of curiosity or otherwise, are still visiting New York, are reported to be under the protection of our minister, Mr. Washburne.

NEW York is to be favored with another census. The order for it states that the charges which have come to the Treasury Bureau, alleging that the first census was grossly inaccurate, render it necessary to have another completed, so that the charges may be disproved, or a fuller and more accurate enumeration of the inhabitants obtained.

Stenographic reporting by machinery is one of the latest improvements. Some English genius has announced a stenographic press, which enables the reporter to sit at his ease, and transcribe at a proper time, and by applying his fingers to the keys to print in a style of perfect uniformity upon which present the words which drop from the lips of a speaker. A new monthly periodical is to commence in Paris in the most finest speaker with case. Pity that somebody can not invent a condensing machine to work in connection with it. Speeches would be too long for newspapers unless judiciously cut down.

It is well known that some colors do not "take well" in photographs, as purple, pink, violet, pale, and negatives will come out very light. Dark shades of brown, drab, green, maroon, and plain black, without gloss, will take a rich drab-color. So, also, scarlet, cherry, crimson, and dark orange. Silks come out lighter than woolen goods.

The work of counting sustituted fractional currency and legal tenders received at the Treasury Department for redemption, from all parts of the country, is done entirely by women. It is said that they excel men in counting the notes, as they are quicker, and their fingers more pliable, but that they do not succeed so well in the work of counting silver. Probably we are not large enough to grasp the bundle and separate the notes quickly enough.

The Bishop of Calcutta recently visited Burmah, but the various points of etiquette prevented a proposed interview between him and the King of Burmah. The king intered the room on his hands and knees, cross-legged before him on a small carpet. The bishop asked to be excused from this mode of salute, but he could not allow any man either to stand before him or to occupy a seat not lower than his own. The bishop ended by lying on a very low couch on these occasions. The bishop was likewise firm; he declined to suffer the indignity of either sitting cross-legged on a bit of carpet; and the result was that the bishop left Mandalay without seeing the king. Preparations both were very desirous that an interview should take place.

The presence of a lady law student in a court-room in Rockford, Illinois, created a sensible diminution in the number of boot-heels resting upon tables and railings, low tones of conversation, and whispered remarks—his love, his life, his flower, his pretty bird of thought. It was instinct that drew her away above price! And she lay in his embrace without a word; she had neither voice nor power out a word; she had neither voice nor power out a word; she had instinct that drew her away from him at last. Then she held his hands in hers, and looked at him with a ghastly smile.

"Only reproach me! Ah, only tell me you forgive me because you despise me!"

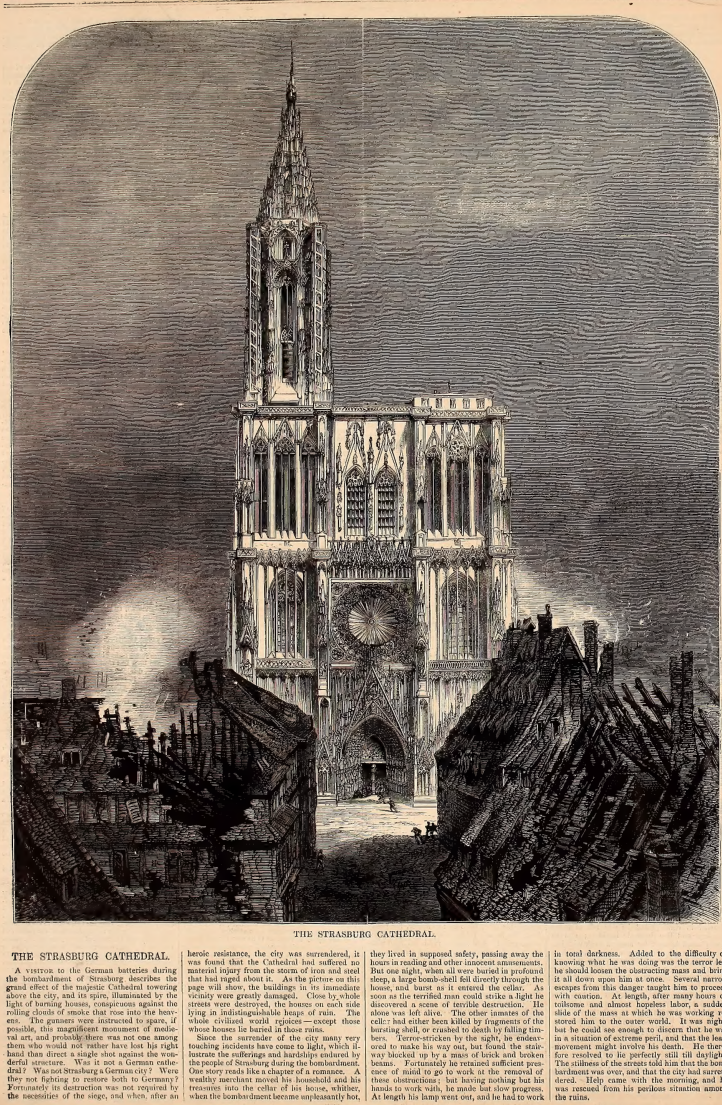
"Carmen! Is there no hope? Don't you think you can learn to love me—a little? I would die for you, Carmen!"

Her grief broke into passionate sobs at last, and there fell upon his hands a mingled rain of tears and kisses.

"I do like you—too well, too well to marry you. Your wife should give you her whole heart, and that I can not. Forgive me, and live to thank me for saving you from such a woman as I am!"

Let the rest pass. She remained steadfast. In spite of his pleading, of the traitor in her own breast, of her remorse and his despair, she sent him from her.

Mr. Howard sailed in two days. He passed quite away from her life; she never saw him nor heard of him again. Within some years Mr. Ainsworth married a sweet and loving girl, who was not in love that



THE STRASBURG CATHEDRAL.

THE STRASBURG CATHEDRAL.

A VISITOR to the German batteries during the bombardment of Strasburg describes the grand effect of the majestic Cathedral towering above the city, and its spire, illuminated by the light of burning houses, conspicuous against the rolling clouds of smoke that rose into the heavens. The gunners were instructed to spare, if possible, this magnificent monument of mediæval art, and probably there was not one among them who would not rather have lost his right hand than direct a single shot against the wonderful structure. Was it not a German cathedral? Was not Strasburg a German city? Were they not fighting to restore both to Germany? Fortunately its destruction was not required by the necessities of the siege, and when, after an heroic resistance, the city was surrendered, it was found that the Cathedral had suffered no material injury from the storm of iron and steel that had raged about it. As the picture on this page will show, the buildings in its immediate vicinity were greatly damaged. Close by whole streets were destroyed, the houses on each side lying in indistinguishable heaps of ruin. The whole civilized world rejoices — except those whose houses lie buried in those ruins.

Since the surrender of the city many very touching incidents have come to light, which illustrate the sufferings and hardships endured by the people of Strasburg during the bombardment. One story reads like a chapter of a romance. A wealthy merchant moved his household and his treasures into the cellar of his house, whither, when the bombardment became unpleasantly hot, they lived in supposed safety, passing away the hours in reading and other innocent amusements. But one night, when all were buried in profound sleep, a large bomb-shell fell directly through the house, and burst as it entered the cellar. As soon as the terrified man could strike a light he discovered a scene of terrible destruction. He alone was left alive. The other inmates of the cellar had either been killed by fragments of the bursting shell, or crushed to death by falling timbers. Terror-stricken by the sight, he endeavored to make his way out, but found the stairway blocked up by a mass of brick and broken beams. Fortunately he retained sufficient presence of mind to go to work at the removal of these obstructions; but having nothing but his hands to work with, he made but slow progress. At length his lamp went out, and he had to work in total darkness. Added to the difficulty of knowing what he was doing was the terror lest he should loosen the obstructing mass and bring it all down upon him at once. Several narrow escapes from this danger taught him to proceed with caution. At length, after many hours of toilsome and almost hopeless labor, a sudden slide of the mass at which he was working restored him to the outer world. It was night, but he could see enough to discern that he was in a situation of extreme peril, and that the least movement might involve his death. He therefore resolved to lie perfectly still till daylight. The stillness of the streets told him that the bombardment was over, and that the city had surrendered. Help came with the morning, and he was rescued from his perilous situation among the ruins.

TAKING THE CENSUS.—[From a Sketch by Thomas Worth.]

SOCIAL IRREPRESSIBLES.

ACCORDING to Rabelais, there once grew a kind of medlar which caused those who ate of the fruit to swell enormously; and, in like manner, some persons having partaken of mischievous food, their natural priggishness is developed and distended to an extent which seriously interferes with the comfort of others. Sometimes this dreadful mania for improving others takes the shape of exercise in socialism. We men will be seen making the lives of their husbands, brothers, and lovers a burden with the high cause of altering and moulding with what really does not concern them, if they could only be persuaded to think so. Nothing is sacred with them but reform, root and branch, of all the habits and peculiarities which have become sweet with the nature of the unfortunate victim. It is the "See what I can do!" of the loving, restless fingers, which are never still, on a man who have the beard or moustache taken from his whiskers docked, his latch-key taken from him, his cigars counted out to him, his manners looked after, and all his little weaknesses crushed out of him, until he hardly knows himself as he stands in the street, the sport and derision alike of Barbarian and Philistine. It was said of Madame Récamier, "Elle n'est pour ses amis la sœur de charité, de leurs peines, de leurs faiblesses, et souvent un peu de leur fortune." What a charming woman that must have been! But one of the class we have in view has been described as "being in this sort of benevolence thoroughly cruel, and she would listen to nothing that was said to her, because she was convinced that she was managing admirably." There is a that she was managing admirably." There is a world of significance in the words we have italicked. This particular disposition of mind perhaps rather pedantically defined as a deficiency of Entropelis, which is the power of altering your own mental attitude to that of others. Who will show us any good? Alas! how many are too ready to undertake the task under the impression that they, of all others, can demonstrate it most effectually! Indeed, they are quite convinced a grave mistake; for, besides affording these Irrepressibles the unholy satisfaction of feeling that a point has been gained, you will discover that it is the prelude to other demands, and, before you know where you are exactly, you will find yourself attired in a swallow-tailed coat or a round jacket, or something else equally unsuitable to your habits and opposed to your own inclinations. It does not matter whether you go to bed early or late—if you did the one before you will have to do the other now; or whether you smoke five times or twenty times a day—whichever it is, your privilege will be reduced by one-half, and the safest plan is to demand in the first instance, and peremptorily, fully twice as much as you desire to obtain.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"IT gives me pleasure to add my testimony to that of many others as to the superiority of my Wheeler & Wilson Machine over all others with which I am acquainted. During the twelve years I have had it it has traveled many thousands of miles, accomplished a great deal of sewing, from the finest linen cambric to coat broadcloth, and has never once been out of order."—MRS. ANNIE TYNDALE, Middleburg, Neb.

LOW PRICES—NO RISK—FULL GUARANTEE.

FOR Price-List of Genuine WALTHAM WATCHES, which can be sent by Express to any part of the country, write to HOWARD & CO., 619 Sansom St., Phila. Stating you saw this in Harper's Weekly.—[COM.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TIN- [PREVENTS POISONING from LINED tinned Lead Ware, and costs but little more than LEAD ware. Is as durable, and as much admired, as Silver, for Tea Sets, Coffee Sets, Waiters, &c. Send for illustrated circular. THE COLUMBIAN TINNED LEAD PIPE WILLARD MFG. CO., 213 Centre St., N.Y.

$55 Sewing Machines for $1.

By paying $1 00 cash and sending a small club of subscribers to that first-class popular family magazine, THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, you will receive a new GROVER & BAKER FAMILY SEWING MACHINE, price $56 00. Inclose stamp for particulars, or 10 cents for specimen number. Complete list of most liberal premiums. Address

S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

1500 DISTRESSING CASES OF CONSUMPTION

Cured without medicine. A grateful mother will cheerfully send the remedy free to any one afflicted. Address MRS. C., care of GEO. WILCOX, Cohoes, N. Y.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 191 Chatham Square, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties leagnie how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club Form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

CARTWRIGHT & WARNER'S
PATENT MERINO UNDER-VESTS, DRAWERS, AND HOSIERY.

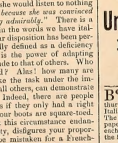
A LARGE VARIETY OF NEW GOODS, AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Union Adams & Co., No. 637 Broadway.

DOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS for D VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with English and English words. Price Half-a-Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing from 170 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO, with the four Overtures.
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-Sellers and Booksellers in the States, or by the Publishers, DOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond Street, New York.



THE STORY OF THE ROCKS.

STEELE'S
FOURTEEN WEEKS IN GEOLOGY.

This is the fourth volume of the celebrated "Fourteen Weeks" Series, designed to place the leading branches in all the sciences for schools. The author's very pleasing style, judicious selection of topics, vivid illustrations, and practical helps to teach, have contributed to introduce these books into thousands of schools, where they awaken an enthusiasm for science with other works fail even to interest. This work, like its predecessors, was made to be school room, and is the result of many years' teaching, and verified by the crucial test. Price 75 cts. postpaid.

A. S. BARNES & COMPANY,
111 & 113 William St., New York.

$3 Watch! $3 Watch!
THE GREAT EUROPEAN
Eureka Aluminum-Gold Watch Co.
HAVE AUTHORIZED
J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., JEWELERS, 561 Broadway, New York,
SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U. S.

And have arranged them to sell their great EUREKA ALUMINUM-GOLD WATCHES for THREE DOLLARS, and to warrant every one to keep correct time and run for one year. This WATCH we guarantee to be the best and cheapest time-keeper that is now made in any part of the globe. The works are in double case, Lodge's and Cutt's cylinder, and are beautifully finished. The case is made of the metal now so widely known in Europe as ALUMINUM-GOLD, which is proof against all acids, and of a strong resistance. It will stand the test of strongest acids; no one can tell it from Gold only by weight, the ALUMINUM-GOLD being only 1 per cent lighter. The works are all made by machinery, the same as the well-known American Watch. We would further refer to the annexed box and send it by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $3 00. Every WATCH is sold with a certificate. A key is sent free with each Watch. Money should be sent by Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order. Address all orders and communications to

J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., Jewelers,
561 Broadway, New York.

SLEEP—Powerful, Calm—SLEEP.

CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics. Will not produce drug-sleep. Sample size by mail per bottle. Send for Circular containing medical indorsements. P. DE WITT KAVANA, Sole Agent, 81 Barclay St., New York.

Nasby's Paper.
THE TOLEDO BLADE.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with the choicest literature the World affords, original and selected (E. Benton, Petroleum V. Nasby, Will Carleton, and others), every number contains a Spiritual Department, an Agricultural Department, a Religious Department, and a Commercial Department, all prepared expressly for the BLADE, rendering it the most complete and perfect Family Newspaper published anywhere.

The Nasby Letters!

These inimitable Letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued in its columns during the year. Mr. Nasby's productions are the whitest of the day, and are enjoyed by the freedmen and poor whites of the South as much as by the rich. He says a the genius of extermination, who have been sent by the cowerdun of some of the greatest evils in our government at last, and the spread of political intelligence among the people, then all the species politicians ever made."

ORIGINAL STORIES.

The first week in March, 1871, we will commence the publication of a charming original story, written expressly for the BLADE, by one of the most popular writers in the country. The high reputation of the author warrants us in promising our readers a story of unsurpassed interest and merit. Other stories by distinguished writers will be published during the year.

Remember that the BLADE is truly the National newspaper—not a paper for either the East, the West, the North, or the South alone, but for The Whole Country.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club of ten.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent in every Post-Office in the United States. Send for Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Persons desiring to see a copy of the BLADE before subscribing, or to send a copy to their friends, will please favor us with the address, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid.

Address
MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

It is handsomely Illustrated, and has for contributors some of the most eminent and attractive writers in the country. Among these are

Prof. JAMES DE MILLE, H. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON,
MRS. HARRIET BEECHER LUCIEN M. ALCOTT,
STOWE, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE,
GRACE GREENWOOD, "SOPHIE MAY."
MRS. REBECCA HARDING DAVIS,

Its reading is adapted to the old and young, is very varied in its character, and is pure and entertaining.

Subscription Price, $1 50.

Send for a Specimen Copy.

PERRY MASON & CO.,
111 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

THE PATENT BASE-BAT-AND-BALL PIPE.

Sweetest Smoker, Easiest Cleaned, Cheapest Pipe in the World. Agents and Dealers well paid for selling, and wanted in every city and town. Price-List and full information mailed.

Address
E. HOOPER, Mf'r of Briar Pipes,
No. 23 Broadway, New York.

Sample boxed and sent prepaid for 25 cents.

LATEST IMPORTED TRICK NOVELTIES. Set of Magic Mystical Dice, $1 00; Magic Cup Bottle, $1 00; Magic Cannon, $1 00; Magic Chair Cane, $2 00; Magic Watch Chain, $1 00; The Three Magic Babies, $1 00; Magic Wedding-Rings, $1 50; Magic Money Till, $1 50; Magic Bag and Keg, $1 50; Magic Invisible Purse, $1 00; Magic Barrel, $1 50; Comical Donkey, $1 00; Magic Photographs, 12 assorted packages, $1 00. Full directions sent with each trick. Good Books: 500 Puzzles, 25 cts.; Parlor Magic, 25 cts.; Tricks with 52 cts.; Dialogues, 40 cts.; Comic Speeches, 40 cts.; 100 Conundrums, 25 cts.; Book of Riddles, 25 cts.; Courtship Made Easy, 25 cts.; Bridal Etiquette, 25 cts.; Book of Verses, 25 cts. Your Marriage Guide, 25 cts.; Fortune-Telling Cards, 25 cts.; Book of Correct Etiquette, 25 cts.; Book of Jokes, 25 cts. Books and Novelties sent by mail, postage paid.

W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, New York.

SOLAR MICROSCOPES,

For examining the Cavities and other Phenomena in the Photosphere of the SUN. The microscopic revelations are awe-inspiring, marvelous, and fascinating. Every intelligent person should possess one. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1 00. AUTOMATIC LAMP WORKS, 103 Pearl Street, New York.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 337 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1871.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and entertainment to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine on intelligent reading family can be afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a dull line in it. Its stories are the best and more intelligent point expended on its articles and illustrations make it the cheapest Magazine. Its price is but 25 cents. "There has never been a more value publication."—The Independent. "There is no better Magazine in the world."—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most practical of our Magazines."—All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

The best publication of its class in America, and as far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collection of literature and art that can be found. Its Illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its literary merit is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, entertaining, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require to enjoy one's self, and love to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Argus.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself but for your wife or daughter, sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so thoroughly filled the bill as this does, and we do not see how a new Bazar. It will have yet ten times the prize in the immediate economy it insures.—Providence Journal.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S WEEKLY or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1871, for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE (a cents a year; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 12 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any number. When no time is specified, it will commence with the current Number. Back Numbers can be sent at any time.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will commence with the first Number issued after the receipt of the order. Back Numbers can be sent at any time.

When the Subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not sufficient to give merely the Number required.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen it can be renewed without cost to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $100; Quarter Page, $50—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 00 per Agate Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Page, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, at the same rate as Weekly.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ On Receipt of One Dollar We will mail to you the most acceptable gift to a Young Lady,

LORING'S BOX OF HOME NOTE PAPER,

French or Scotch Linen, Octavo, Initialed.

Address LORING, Publisher,
16 School Street, Boston, Mass.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL OF 1871.

Contains Christmas Stories, Poems, Games, Magic Sports, &c., &c.; 48 pages; illustrated. Sent free on receipt of one stamp for postage. Address ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the materials accompanying them, you can do your own printing, thus saving much time and many pennies. Circulars containing full information about 4 lb. or 8 Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent on receipt of one postage stamp. Specimens-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Nassau Street, New York.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Sample sent free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

To the Retail Merchants of the U.S.

Call for the WRIGHT MANUFACTURING CO.'S
ALPACA BRAIDS
in the following Celebrated Braids, and buy no other.
Stearns' Gold Band—warranted full 6 yards.
Stearns' X and XX—
Stearns' XXX—in Nos. 29, 40, 85, 65, 60, 75, 81, and 85.

The Finest and Best ever Made in this Country.

Wright Mfg. Co.'s Best Crown Alpaca—6 yards.
" " " Oriental Alpaca—
" " " Regular—6 yards, 35, 40, 75, 81, and 85.
" " " Mixed and Fancy Plaid Braids.

For Sale by all Dealers who keep the Quality.
A. W. STEARNS, Treasurer,
Lawrence, Mass.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS.

F. E. SUIRE & CO.

Wholesale Druggists,

N. W. COR. FOURTH & VINE STREETS,
CINCINNATI, OHIO.

New York Depot, . 18 Dey St.

YOU WANT IT!

THE TOLEDO BLADE is the best family newspaper published any where. Person Nasby's great story, "Paul Dashaway: a Tale of the Great Rebellion," just commenced, and will be concluded this year. Terms—$2.00 a year; for clubs $1.75 each; 10 copies, $17.50 each. Three months (which will include all of Nasby's story), 50 cents; five copies, $2.50; ten copies, $4.00, and an extra copy to getter up of club. Specimen copies sent free. Send for one, and give us the addresses of a dozen or so of your friends, at different Post-Offices, to whom we will send free specimen copies. Address

MILLER, LOCKE & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

TRADE MARK

Use None but OX AND SHEEP THE BEST!

SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION.

Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in Housekeeping! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the same that received the highest prize at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signatures of Baron Liebig, the inventor, and of DR. MAX VON Jenkofer, delegate, on every jar.

J. MILBAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For sale every where.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

WITH
NEW STYLE JOB PRINTING PRESS,
the best press ever invented for the purpose, and second to none for the money. Several Job Printers, They are now in use, and admired for Business Print. Send for Circular. Also, Card Presses, Cutting Machines, and Gauges for Missionary and Blank Books, for editorial purposes, or for a Village Newspaper and Job Office.

Price of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $50.

Send for Catalogue, with testimonials and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, to BENJ. O. WOODS, MR., 59 Federal St., Boston, Mass.; C. C. Townsend, 16 College Place, New York; Kelly, Howell, & Lowell, 917 Market St., Philadelphia; A. C. Kellogg, 66 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

TEXAN LIEBIG'S TRADE MARK EXTRACT OF MEAT

The only genuine domestic Extract. Better and cheaper than all others. A. GLANZ, Sole Agent, 194 Water St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class pianos, including Chickering & Sons, at Extraordinary Low Prices for Cash, or will take them $6 to $10 monthly until paid.

CORNS CURED WITHOUT PAIN FOR 25 CENTS, by the JAPANESE CORN FILE. Sold at all Druggists', Shoe, and Notion Stores. Samples mailed on receipt of price. Agents wanted.
Depot, 54 Pine Street, New York.

DRUNKENNESS — Boston, Mass., cures the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

HELMBOLD'S
FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU

Contains all the valuable properties of the plant in a highly-concentrated form, and is much prized by the medical profession as a positive remedial agent for diseases immediately connected with the bladder, kidneys, and urinary organs, as well as for organic weakness and extreme prostration.

HOTTENTOTS SEEN GATHERING BUCHU LEAVES AT THE
CAPE OF GOOD HOPE,
FOR
H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist,
594 BROADWAY, New York.

Beware of Counterfeits.

$90000 of the PATRONS' FUND of Fourth Series now ready for Distribution. For a List of the Numbers drawn, address THE WASHINGTON MEDALLION PEN CO., 11 College Place, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, the NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR CUTTING THEM BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted in the most inexperienced manner.

The following patterns are now ready:

BERTRAND CASAQUE WALKING SUIT....No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT..... " 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.... " 25
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS..... " 39
PRINCESS JUST WALKING SUIT..... " 40
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS..... " 35
TRAINED STREET SUIT..... " 49
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT..... " 48
VERY-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 47

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and MUST MEASURE. The same Patterns exist sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $9.00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the most discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A MUSICAL BOX for $2.

THE French great exposition novelty, cheapness, durability; in highly polished case, metallic tongues, brilliant in tone, of the best construction, with the most recent improvements, new patterns. Eight tunes, conveniently adapted for the drawing-room table. Guaranteed of the best workmanship and performance. Thousands sold monthly. No. 1, 8 tunes, $7: No. 8, 14 tunes, $7: No. 4, 24 tunes, $8: sent free by mail on receipt of price. Send stamp for illustrated catalogue, with list of tunes. Try none other. Address WM. ERDOZE & CO., 9 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

THEA-NECTAR IS A PURE BLACK TEA WITH THE Green-Tea Flavor. WARRANTED TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

THEA-NECTAR TEA COMPANY 31 & 33 VESEY ST. NEW YORK

AGENTS WANTED in every county in the U. S. and Canada for the Youth's Illustrated Bible History. 300 choice Engravings. A commission to the Heb. Bible. One of the best-selling books ever published. Sample copy sent on receipt of $2.75. Sold by subscription only. BIBLE BROTHERS, Publishers,
631 Broome St., N. Y.

WATCH FREE, and $30 a day sure, and no humbug. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

"COMING TO THE PARSON,"

A Group of Statuary by John Rogers, is now ready for delivery. Price $10.

This and other groups, suitable for Wedding Presents or Ornament, will be delivered, with all express charges prepaid at any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price; or sent C. O. D. to parties to whom by freight, and a discount allowed to the trade. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to

JOHN ROGERS, 212 Fifth Ave., New York.

JUDGES' REPORT American Institute Fair, Nov. 5, 1870. For the best Sewing Machine, Hartford Reversible Sewing Machine Co., No. 917 Broadway, first premium. The Company offer their Machines, which have then been adjudged the best in the market, at $50, with all attachments, and offer liberal inducements to Agents in all parts of the country. HARTLEY REVERSIBLE SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, 917 Broadway, N. Y.

STEEL PENS.

American Branch of House,
91 JOHN ST., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

FREE, FREE, FREE.—No charge will be made if Dr. Tobias celebrated Venetian Liniment does not cure Chronic Rheumatism, Sore Throat, Lumbago, Pains in the Chest, Limbs or Joints, Sores, Wounds, Bruises, Sprains, Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Colds, Sore Stickiness, &c., internally. Warranted perfectly safe to give or apply to the youngest child. Used 26 years. 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Sold by Druggists.

100,000 SOLD.—More Photographs. Wonderful and curious. They please everybody. We will send 20 cents a package: 8 packages for $1. C. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, N. Y. The Library of Love, 50 cents.

VINEGAR, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 36 hours, without other drugs. For circular, address F. T. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

AGENTS WANTED in every county in the U. S. and Canada for the Youth's Illustrated Bible History. 300 choice Engravings. A commission to the Heb. Bible. One of the best-selling books ever published. Sample copy sent on receipt of $2.75. Sold by subscription only. BIBLE BROTHERS, Publishers,
631 Broome St., N. Y.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

IN DEVIL BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "The Chronicles of Barsetshire," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By Miss Cole. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By Mortimer Collins. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Reynolds's Heritage," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A DANGEROUS GUEST. By the Author of "Gilbert Rugge," "A First Friendship," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS, COMPLETE. Harper's Library Edition. Complete in 8 Vols., 8vo, Green Morocco Cloth, $8 00 per set.

Hard Cash.—Griffith Gaunt.—It is Never Too Late to Mend.—Love Me Little, Love Me Long.—Put Yourself in His Place.—Foul Play.—White Lies.—Peg Woffington, Christie Johnstone, and Other Stories.—The Cloister and the Hearth.

W. M. THACKERAY'S NOVELS, COMPLETE. Harper's Library Edition, with Illustrations by the Author. Complete in 3 Vols., 8vo, Green Morocco Cloth, $6 00 per set.

Vanity Fair.—Pendennis.—The Virginians.—The Newcomes.—The Adventures of Philip.—Henry Esmond.—Lovel the Widower.

Wanted

Agents.

$75 to $250 per month, every where, to sell the GENUINE IMPROVED HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, more elastic seam than ours, or makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and the thread will not ravel, and will not break without tearing the cloth. We pay from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission, if preferred. Circulars free. Call or address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chicago, Ill.

WESTERN

Local Agents Wanted.

We want a local agent in every town and village in the country, to canvass for the BEST SELLING WORLD. A Large Pecuniary profit guaranteed. From $5 to $10 can be easily made in an evening. Liberal cash commissions paid. Send 10 cents stamp for SPECIMENS and FREE CIRCULAR.

JAMES R. ELLIOTT, Boston, Mass.

50,000 Boys and Girls

Wanted, one in every school-house, to act as agent for Bright Side, Juvenile Books, Pictures, and other popular and useful articles. Good pay in cash, and permanent employment for leisure hours.

JOHN B. ALDEN & CO., Chicago, Ill.

$500 PER WEEK

Can be made by parties who are wide-awake, without interfering with other business. Address as JAMES & CO., P. O. Box 5643, New York City, N. Y.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $100 per Week and expenses, or allow large commission, to sell our new and wonderful invention to every farmer and mechanic. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

$100 to 250 per month guaranteed. Sure and steady employment for all ambitious men and women selling our work cheapest and best. Write—Wire Clothes Lines. Business permanent. For full particulars, address the Manufacturers, Wm. Hall & Co., Hartford, Ct.

WANTED AGENTS, at $8 per month, to sell Wire Clothes Lines. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me. It costs only seven cents a quart, and will last for thirty minutes. Send 25 cents for sample, particulars, and to insure employment. Address C. CUTLER, Shermansdale, Pa.

$1500 A YEAR.

WANTED AGENTS to sell the Universal Stitch Sewing Machine. Price of Machine, size 12 in. long by 8 in height, of great capacity, reversible feed, makes the genuine Lock Stitch, complete, $15 00: sent C. O. D. to Agents. Universal S. M. Co., 24 Broomfield St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED, in every section of the United States, to sell the History of the Wars between France and Prussia, by L. P. Brockett, M.D. The most complete, authentic, and cheap work ever published. Sample sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1 50. Send for circulars. ADDRESS GALLOWAY BROTHERS & CO., 16 Bromfield Street, New York.

Photographs! Photograph Album. Imitation 50 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 60 Cts.; 7 for $2. Stereoscopes and Stereographs, free. Address C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

$30 PER WEEK.—Agents wanted in every town. Samples sent free. Address C. M. LININGTON, Alfred, Me.

$60 A WEEK paid Agents in a new business. Address SAXTON NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

$240 PER MONTH to Agents. Best selling new articles; staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, 88 South Halsted St., Chicago.

$250 a Month. With Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Don't fail to secure Circulars and Samples, free. Address S. M. Stencil, Smithboro, Vt.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Address, for Samples, J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

G—— (passionately). "Yes, Sir! I was born here! I repeat it, Sir—I repeat—"
INSPECTOR. "Bad luck ter yes—yer Repeat, does yes!"
OFFICER. "Here, yer scoundrel, that owns up to Repeating."

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
offer a large assortment of
SEAL SACQUES,
at $85, $95, $110;
Astrakhan Sacques,
at $40, $50, $60.
All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.
502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S
CHALLENGE SAUCE
Pronounced by Connoisseurs
TO BE THE
BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,
AND
SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.
For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.
Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

"OUR POPULAR SHIRTS,"
MADE TO ORDER FROM BEST MATERIALS, AND WARRANTED TO FIT.
Sent by express, C. O. D., to any part of the country, at the following rates:
4 Shirts, Good Muslin and Linen Fronts..... $7 00
6 " Better Muslin and Good Linen..... 10 50
6 " Measurable Muslin and Fine Linen..... 12 00
6 " Wamsutta Muslin and Very Fine Linen.. 13 50
6 " New York Mills and Better Linen..... 15 00
RICHARD MEARES,
GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS,
676 Avenue & 19th St., N. Y.

THE NEW EMPIRE
SEWING MACHINES
Prove a perfect success! The Company already supplied to meet all reasonable demands on favorable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.
224 Bowery, N. Y.

Farnham, Gilbert & Co.,
BANKERS,
No. 8 Wall Street, N. Y.

Samples mailed free on receipt of 25 cents.
Address E. W. WEEDEN,
AGENTS WANTED. Box 3631, New York.

$250 A MONTH.—AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH), by the AMERICAN MANUFACTURING MACHINE CO., BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
OFFER FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

ELGIN
[ILLINOIS]
Watches!
UNDER PATENTS R. R. OFFICE OF GEN'L SUP'T.,
CHARLESTON, ILL., Dec. 16, 1869.
HON. T. M. AVERY,
Pres't National Watch Co., Chicago, Ill.:
Dear Sir.—During the month that I have carried one of your "B. W. Raymond" Watches it has not failed to keep the time with so much accuracy as to leave nothing to desire in this regard. For accuracy in time-keeping, beauty of movement and finish, your Watches challenge my admiration and arouse my pride as an American, and I am confident that in all respects they will compete successfully in the markets of the world with similar manufactures of older nations. They need only to be known to be appreciated.
Yours most respectfully,
L. G. HAMMOND, Gen'l Sup't.
☞ Call on your Jeweler and ask to see the Elgin Watches.
Business Office and Salesroom National Watch Company,
159 and 161 Lake Street, Chicago;
1 Maiden Lane, New York.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S
PURE CALIFORNIA
BRANDY
F. SCHLEIFER & CO., Proprietors.
HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

WEDNESDAY, November 23d, is the day to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the only reliable and only "lock stitch" alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICONS
of every description, and the largest collection of Slides in the United States. Illustrated Catalogue.
W. MITCHELL McALLISTER,
726 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

PRINTING DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.
Printing Machines of all kinds, from $3 to $300. Send for circular.
Pelzer Manuf'g Co., 14 Kilby St., Boston, Mass.

HARVEY FISK. A. S. HATCH.
Office of FISK & HATCH,
BANKERS AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York, Oct. 31, 1870.
The funding of United States Five-Twenties into a first-class security, paying the same rate of interest (six per cent., gold), and which can not be called in under twenty-five years without the consent of the holder, may now be effected at a clear profit of about twenty per cent., by exchanging them for the First Mortgage Bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.
The Central Pacific is a completed, thoroughly-built, well-managed road, doing a large business and earning an immense revenue. The bonds are well and favorably known and constantly dealt in, both here and in the chief financial centres of Europe, and they can be disposed of at a quoted market price with the same facility as government bonds, and are daily quoted at the Stock Exchange.
Having originally negotiated these bonds, and being thoroughly acquainted with their soundness and value, we have introduced them as a specialty in our regular business in connection with our dealings in government securities, and recommend them without hesitation to our friends and customers desiring to make investments or to fund their Five-Twenties upon advantageous terms, without reduction of interest.
FISK & HATCH.

AMUSETTE,
OR
PORTABLE FAMILY BILLIARDS.

Can be placed upon any Table. It takes but a few minutes to put it up or take it down.
☞ Every family should have it.
COMPLETE SET, INCLUDING BALLS AND CUES,
PRICE $6 00.
SEND STAMP FOR DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULAR.
Agents in Chicago, Ill.:
S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Booksellers, State St.
W. B. KEENE & COOKE, " "
WESTERN NEWS CO., " "
VERRINO, REBILLOT, & CO., Toy Importers, Lake St.
RICHARD SCHWARZE, " "
SWITZER & BRO., " "
COBB BRO., Booksellers, " "
J. A. FRENCH & CO., Toys and Notions, Clark St.
E. B. SMITH & CO., Detroit and Jackson, Mich.
E. I. HORSMAN, Sole Agent for U. S. and Canadas,
100 William St., N. Y.

$500 Reward is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents. A pamphlet on Catarrh Free. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, No. 128 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

DRESS SHIRTS,
TIES, SCARFS,
UNDERGARMENTS,
AND HOSIERY.
The Oldest House in the Trade, and the Cheapest!
VANDERLIP & TAYLOR,
No. 96 Bowery, New York.
Established in 1823.

F. J. KACHENMEISTER, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Amber, &c., at Wholesale and Retail. Repairing done in all its Branches. Circulars and Price-Lists sent. P. O. Box 6784. Office of Importer, 4 John St., next Dewey. 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Paris Exposition Prize of 1867.

$40 A DAY.—LLOYD'S Patent Reversible Lever Feather Seed Fruit Maps of AMERICA and EUROPE, for 1871, showing from ocean to ocean; 54 by 36 inches large; with the Mail Routes, Counties and Price-Lists sent. P. O. Box 6784. Office of Importer, 4 John St., next Dewey. 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Paris Exposition Prize of 1867.

$40 A DAY.—LLOYD'S Patent Reversible Lever Feather Seed Fruit Maps of AMERICA and EUROPE, for 1871, showing from ocean to ocean; 54 by 36 inches large; with the Mail Routes, Counties and Principal Towns. Size, rich, black loam. LANDS, high, rolling prairie, not subject to overflow. WATER abundant. TITLE good. Sold by U. S. Government. TERMS—7 per cent. per annum interest and 5 per cent. per annum of the principal; or, if the purchaser improves the land, no payment for two years is required and no interest. CLIMATE, the best in the world.
For Maps, Pamphlets, or other information, apply to
O. E. PALMER, AGENT.
Algona, Kossuth County, Iowa.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
150 Designs and Plans.
$1 50.....Postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.
New-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For details address, address Stanleon & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE
Contains every month 64 pages of useful and entertaining reading, with numerous fine engravings. Only 25 cents a year. Specimen copy FREE. A clergyman's wife writes: "I like it so much that I feel as if I could not keep house without it." Every paper is worth ten times the price. Send for circular. Specimen copy FREE. A clergyman's wife writes: "I like it so much that I feel as if I could not keep house without it." Every paper is worth ten times the price. Send for circular. Address WOOD, NEWBURGH, N. Y.

EVANS' PRICES FOR THE "BEST" "MADE" FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING IN NEW YORK.
EVANS' PRICES FOR THE EVANS' "MADE" FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING IN NEW YORK.
EVANS' PRICES FOR THE "BEST" "MADE" FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING CLOTHING IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS
$10. $12. $13 50. $15. $16. $18. $20. $22. $23. $25. $28.
HEAVY JACKETS
$6 00. $7 00. $8 00. $10 00. $12 00. $13 00. $22 00.
WINTER SUITS
$14 00. $16 00. $18 00. $20 00. $23 00. $25. $27. $30.
PANTS
Fashionable Stripes and Mixtures, $6. $8 50. $9. $9 50. $10. In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.
PRICES THAT BEAT THE MARKET
Prices that beat the Market
A LEVANT CLOTHING WAREHOUSE,
66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER
THE BEST
TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

Engines, Tools, Machinery, &c.,
FOR SALE,
THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,
FOOT OF EAST 13TH ST., N.Y.
Including
ENGINES, LATHES, PLANERS, LATHES, SMITHS' AND BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS, And Machinery and Fixtures of the most approved kinds, &c., &c. Also,
6 HIGH-PRESSURE ENGINES, partly finished;
2 STEVENSON'S PATENT TURBINE WATER-WHEELS, 60-inch diameter; and
1 MARINE BEAM ENGINE, 40 by 10-ft. stroke.
JNO S. SCHULTZE,
Receiver of the Novelty Iron Works.
☞ Send for Catalogue.
New York, Oct. 29, 1870.

POLLAK & SON,
Manufacturers of
Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS.
Ambers, Repairing and Boiling.
Retail, 27 John St., middle of the block.
Send for Circular.

150,000 Acres of Land For Sale.
THE McGREGOR AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY offer 150,000 acres of land for sale, at $5 to $10 per acre, in lots of forty acres and upward, situated in the counties of Howard, Cerro Gordo, Kossuth, Hancock, Polo Alto, Pocahontas, and Lyon, in Northern Iowa, on the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul, McGregor and Missouri River, and the Des Moines Valley Railroads. SOIL, rich, black loam. LANDS, high, rolling prairie, not subject to overflow. WATER abundant. TITLE good. Sold by U. S. Government. TERMS—7 per cent. per annum interest and 5 per cent. per annum of the principal; or, if the purchaser improves the land, no payment for two years is required and no interest. CLIMATE, the best in the world.
For Maps, Pamphlets, or other information, apply to
O. E. PALMER, AGENT.
Algona, Kossuth County, Iowa.

PRICED AND ILLUSTRATED MANUALS on the following subjects sent free:
Part I.—Meteorological Instruments, 112 pages.
Part II.—Optical Instruments, 84 pages.
The following on receipt of 10 cents:
Part I.—Marine Lanterns and Stereopticons, 88 pages.
Part II.—Philosophical Instruments, 64 pages.
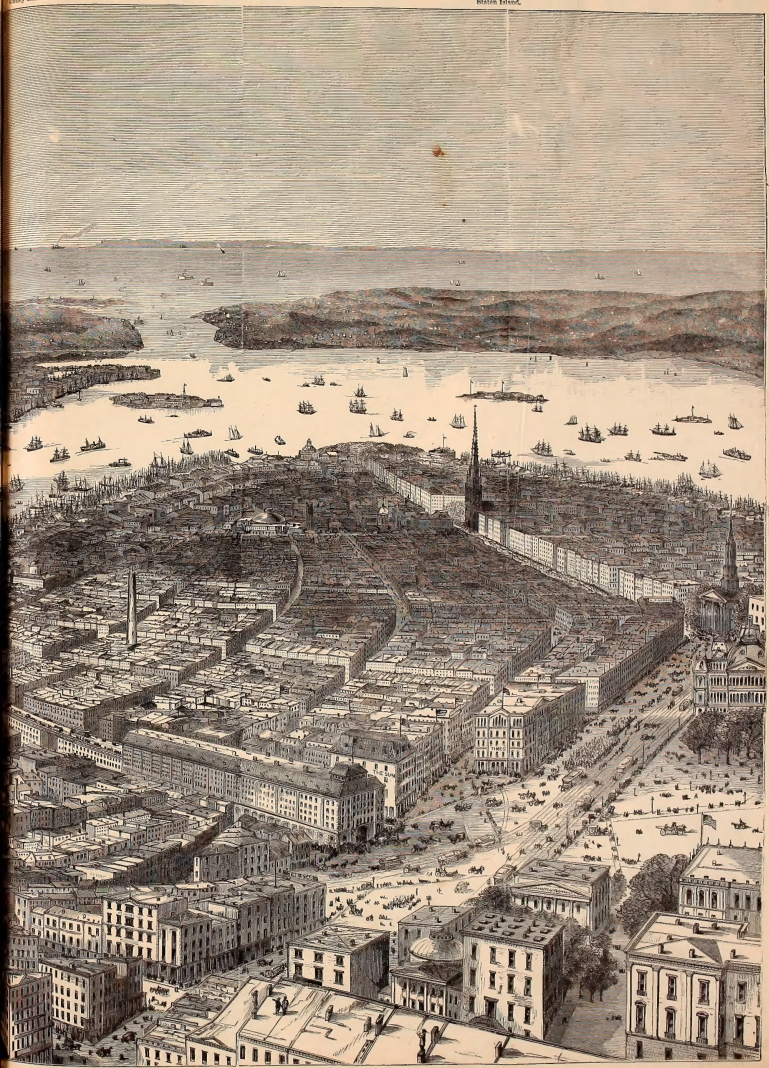
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia; 9 Dey St., New York. P. O. Box 4379.

WILL WIND ANY WATCH
AND NOT WEAR OUT.
Ask your watchmaker for it. Sent by mail for 50 cents. J. S. BIRCH & CO., 8 Maiden Lane.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE SOUTHERN END OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN, SHOWING THE PROJECTED SUSPENSION-BRIDGE

Coney Island. Sandy Hook—Highland Lights. Staten Island.



ST RIVER, FROM THE WESTERN TERMINUS IN PRINTING-HOUSE SQUARE, NEW YORK.—Drawn by Theo. R. Davis.—[See Page 739.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 726.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

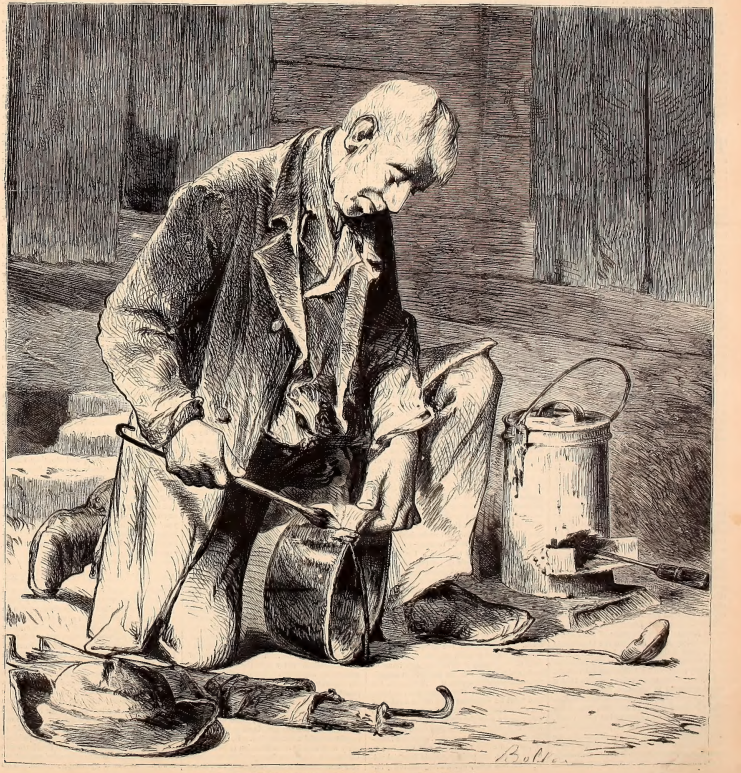
THE TRAVELING TINKER.

THE itinerant tinker, a few years ago, was an important personage in the rural districts. He traveled from village to village, from farm-house to farm-house, and being generally a good-natured, oddish man, with a talent for conversation and telling stories, and always willing to chat over his puttering work, he was almost as welcome as the traveling peddler. The growth of villages, and the increasing cheapness of manufacture, have nearly driven him out of business, and he is now rarely met with except in districts remote from large towns. People have discovered that it is cheaper to throw away leaky pans and kettles, and buy new ones, than to have the old tinkered up. He is, however, to be met with occasionally in the vicinity of our larger cities. The illustration on this page is a sketch from life in a New Jersey village near New York.

CHINESE GODS.

THE amiable celestials do not treat their gods with much veneration. If burning sun, continued drought, and dry weather should prevail, and their simulated offerings, their scant prayers, should not result in the required change of weather, they very coolly take down Joss, kick him and cuff him, and put him out in the sun and heat, just to let him see how he likes it! Then, as they keep the poor dumb image out of doors until the rain comes, he gets the credit of having produced it after all; and accordingly becomes duly reinstated to his former dignity, amidst the joyful adoration of his benighted worshipers.

In every corner of the Chinese empire you come upon the Joss-house. Many are crumbling into ruins, and but few of the best are remarkable for any architectural beauty, but make up for any deficiency in that respect by a super-



THE TRAVELING TINKER.—[DRAWN BY JOHN ROLLES.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1870.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient to prevent mistakes and DELAY in SUPPLYING SUBSCRIPTION. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and making back Numbers.

THE SITUATION.

THE elections of this autumn were peculiarly interesting, because they were the first answer to the inquiry whether the Republican party had fulfilled its mission. The Democrats upon one side, and Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS upon the other, loudly sneered that the Republican party cumbered the ground. They insisted that it was organized to withstand slavery, and that, slavery being utterly abolished, the party was superfluous. Had the political situation been as simple as they represented, they would have been quite correct. The party would be superfluous, and would be discarded by the country. But as it is not so simple, and will control the next Congress by some majority, as the Democratic majority in New York is not increased, notwithstanding the Republican feuds, as Mr. PHILLIPS's vote falls far below what had been anticipated by his friends, and as, in a word, the Republican line is virtually unbroken, it may possibly occur to the Democratic orators and to Mr. PHILLIPS that they are mistaken, and that there is some reason for the steadfast support which the Republican party receives from the people of the United States.

This reason is evident enough. Upon questions of general policy both parties are united. For instance, the Republican party, as such, is not a protectionist party, nor is the Democratic, as such, a free-trade party. But both parties demand reduced taxation. The foreign policy of neither party is belligerent. The doctrinaires can please themselves as much upon one side as upon the other. But the Republican party, being in power, is criticised in every point. Its mistakes are magnified in every spirit, and they chill or even alienate many of its own friends. It is full of the suspicions, jealousies, and hostilities that attend every protracted conflict, despite all these considerations, is due to the deep distrust of the Democratic party felt by the country, and by the profound confidence, even of the impatient and critical, that the great measures of real progress are to be expected from a party of the history and composition of the Republican. A self-respecting and truly wise foreign policy, reform in the domestic civil service, and practical dealing with the danger of electoral corruption, are to be expected from the Republican party, and from the Democratic party.

This feeling that Democratic ascendancy would fatally disturb the peace of the country is founded upon the fact that the Democratic party, down to the year 1860, had subordinated every interest in the country to the extension of slavery; that in 1861 it exerted its influence to a revolutionary faction; that in 1864 it urged surrender to the same faction; that in 1868 it advocated repudiation and renunciation of the political results of the war; that it has been for ten years a disorganizing party; and, above all, that its spirit and purpose and leadership remain unchanged to-day. It sneers at the war, it sighs for the old day of the slavery despotism, it hates the negro, it denies the validity of the amendments, and it would repudiate the debt. Mere passive opposition to a party so radically destructive and revolutionary would be enough to hold the Republican party together, and, in view of the facts, the support by some Republicans of certain Democratic candidates, because of some special measures which they are supposed to favor, is as much a betrayal of the great interests of the country as if a Prussian company should shoot their own officers in the back because a party fancied that some of the French officers were better soldiers.

That this is the real situation, and that this well-founded and most natural distrust of the explanation of the unyielding Republican strength, is felt by the Democrats themselves. They shout that they have not been defeated in New York, but they are too shrewd not to understand the significance of the whole result. So on the day after the election, when it was plain that the hope of a threatening minority, if not of an actual majority, in Congress was utterly baffled, the New York World began to shadow out the explanation of the unyielding Republican strength, is felt by the Democrats themselves. They shout that they have not been defeated in New York, but they are too shrewd not to understand the significance of the whole result. So on the day after the election, when it was plain that the hope of a threatening minority, if not of an actual majority, in Congress was utterly baffled, the New York World began to shadow out the explanation. The Democratic intention is known. Tammany Hall, the most powerful and corruptest organization of political managers in the country, has again elected its docile agent, Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, Governor of New York. It now prepares to vote for the control of the country, with him as its Presidential candidate in 1872. Its organ, therefore, begins immediately to claim that the party is always successful in New York, and that therefore the leaders in other States should yield to the New York policy. That policy, when it insinuates, is persuaded that there is but one way in which the party can succeed in 1872, and that is by abandoning acquiescence in the great Republican settlements of the war, without which the national distrust of the party will remain unabated.

That it can bring the Democratic party to this acquiescence we do not suppose, because, although Tammany Hall has no conception of principles except those of success at any cost, there is a large part of the Democratic party which has. A delicacy of feeling, a sensitive sentiment, and hatred of the debt and the negro, are sincerely felt by the great bulk of the party in the country. A very large part of it is not strictly ex-rebel, and that part, at least, has a great deal of fervor of conviction. Moreover, as in the party of opposition the ruling democratic prejudices of every kind are invincible. The Tammany managers, therefore, will not find it the easy task to persuade as the defective declaration of Freedmen in favor of some form of government. The refusal of the authorities to engage in the election necessarily covers them with doubt, and of course lessens their influence and command. The evident number and force of the Irish Democracy, the constitutional republicans, and the conviction that so much of the intelligence and character of the country are dominant against that party, the political struggle will really be between them and the Reds—the constitutional republicans acting with the Democrats, as the struggle approaches the situation will become still more tragical. The actual suffering will be more intense, and the feeling of the world will be that the French authorities ought to have accepted the armistice. Those who have been loudly looking for a great leader round this party, who have expected to see a MIRABEAU arising to unite EUROPE in a fiery, resistless crusade, or an ADAMS who would improvise a conquering army from raw and despoiling recruits; those who declare that a great occasion always develops a great man—are silent during the terrible fact. Will TROCHU yet justify what MARSHAL BUGEAUD wrote of him to GUIZOT in 1845? "If you have him you would be as much satisfied with him as I am; he has precisely the head and sentiments that you love. He is absolutely a servitor at any height. I know no man in the army more thoroughly disposed than he is."

REPUBLICAN REVENUE REFORMERS.

IT is very evident that what is called revenue reform is assuming a certain importance in politics, and, as was expected at the time of the Missouri movement, it is a fact which should not be turned off with a sneer or an epithet. The Revolutionary party was originally composed of Whigs and Democrats. They united for action because they believed the slavery question to be the most urgent and vital issue, and they were agreed in the policy that should be pursued. Their views upon other subjects were held in abeyance, and each wing of the party was willing to make certain concessions to secure harmony and success. That harmony and success did follow. The achievements of the Republican party are the noblest ever wrought by any party. The consequences of the rapidity of its political movement are only paralleled by the military success of the Germans in France. But, naturally, as the slavery question is in process of settlement, the views of the members of the party upon other subjects become of more pressing importance, and require careful consideration. If, indeed, the party were merely a combination of Whigs and Democrats to abolish slavery, when the members were satisfied that there was no further danger they might return to their old parties. But the situation is not quite so simple.

The Whig party is extinct, and the Democratic party is the residuary legatee of the remains of slavery, and its fatal spirit and disorganizing tendency. Moreover, there is all the new generation of the Republican party—the young men who have been only Republican, and to whom the old Whig and Democratic names are mere traditions. In other words, the Republican party is not, as seems to be often assumed, a league for a particular purpose, which may be harmonized and closed when the purpose has been formally fulfilled, but it is a political organization founded upon certain principles, and which has so steadily persisted because it has applied them with the utmost sagacity to the paramount issues as they arose. That question of revenue and the present system of taxation, including the tariff, are now becoming prominent; and since the party must occupy some position and hold some policy upon that subject, and can not differ upon a vital point, there is no more interesting question than that of what that policy shall be.

Mr. JESCKES, of Rhode Island, in the speech which we elsewhere mention, declared himself a protectionist, and he very truly said that the Republican party in this Congress or the next must decide upon what principle the tariff is to be revised. A correspondent of the Tribune asserts that the great mass of the party is protectionist, while the Evening Post openly advocated the election of Republicans who were not free-traders or revenue reformers; and we had, at the late election, the remarkable spectacle of a Republican paper denouncing the corruption of the Tammany Ring as hostile to the existence and permanence of the government, and in the same breath urging Republicans to vote for a candidate of that Ring, a gentleman who said, during the war, that he considered JEFFERSON DAVIS and LINCOLN and JEFFERSON DAVIS equally guilty, and to vote for him merely because he was not a protectionist, against MR. GRIFFIN, who was, at the same time a third of the Republicans in Missouri united with the Democrats to elect a candidate who, in every speech that he made, denounced protection as virtual robbery. And it was announced from Washington, immediately after the election, that an alliance was contemplated between the revenue-reforming Republicans and the Democrats to organize the House by giving the Speakership to the former and other substantial advantages in the committees to the latter.

This is the exact situation. As we say elsewhere, we believe that, with reunion, the unshaken ascendency of the Republican party can be maintained. But it can only be by reasonable, the course of the Evening Post during the recent campaign should be made that of the Republican revenue reformers, they will, of course, actively destroy it. An alliance with the Democrats would be simple absorption; and the revenue reformers would discover that they were merely throwing the fetters of Tammany Hall over the whole country. They will not find that their proposed allies voted for the imposition of taxes at the last session. But they would find that they must either obey those allies or become futile and ridiculous. The consequence is plain. For the object for what is called revenue reform upon free-trade principles are these Republicans willing to help the Democratic party to the national supremacy? Are no other questions, no other interests, to be considered? Is not a reform in the civil service, or radical and organized effort against corruption in politics, quite as important as revenue reform, and do they look for any such effort in the Democratic party? Is not a faithful and honorable care of reconstruction as indispensable to the national welfare as revenue reform, and do we expect that of the Democratic party? These are some of the questions which Republican revenue reformers ought to ask themselves, if they are resolved that there is but one object, and that they will make any alliances and take any risks to secure it, from which to return, beyond reflection. But do they really see nothing in the national ascendency of the Democratic party but a reform in the revenue system?

A SHORT WAY WITH DISSENTERS.

GENERAL BUTLER, if he is correctly reported in the Tribune, warns respect for the popular judgment. He thinks that the country can be lulled and the Republican party saved by a cry of war with England, which will be entirely safe, because England, he says, will not dare to make war. Here we differ with General BUTLER, as we very inconvenient for Great Britain to go to war. It may be even hazardous, under existing circumstances. But the blood that flows in English veins is our own blood; and if England believed herself to be insulted she would do precisely what we should do. She would fight to the last gasp. We have heard before that people . . . . . But fight. Before our own war began it was very generally said at the South that the North was a mob of peddlers and white-livered sneaks; and at the North that the town's poor would as soon rebel against the town as the South against the Union. This want the Chinese method. It was beating a tremendous tootsum of big words. But the wise men were mistaken. The North had the South did fight, and we have none of us forgotten how.

General BUTLER has himself already announced this policy. Upon Memorial-day, a year ago last spring, he addressed the soldiers at Gloucester, and defied Great Britain. There are no responses from the country, if we remember correctly. And Senator CHANDLER has belabored England in the Senate with the most energetic epithets, and still the country was silent. A war policy! It was tried in Congress last year, with Cuba as the point of departure. There was only Spain to consider, and what was Spain? Then there were a struggling people and a brave people. There were, besides, a great many grounds of a truly powerful and sympathetic appeal. General BANKS tried it. The country smiled at the General's zeal, and went to dinner. What! Have we, then, become indifferent to freedom, to humanity, to our own honor? Far from it: but we have become remarkably perceptive of Buncombe. When the member for that constituency rises we know that we shall hear all about that Strasburg mark upon the left arm, and "it is! it is! nee long-lost brother!"—but we have heard it before, and we are a little used to it.

The policy which the General is reported as advocating is the declaration to Great Britain that we propose to settle the Alabama difficulty immediately, amicably if possible, if not, then forcibly. The terms of the proposition are, that John Bull is to go down on his marrow-bones and cry peccavi, and agree that any Canadian provinces that wish to join the United States shall do so, and the annexation treaty be a receipt in full by us for all demands. It is truly simple. It is a transaction for the ocean telegraph. The State Department will send a message to Downing Street. "Do you confess your sins in the Alabama case, and will you telegraph a peccavi to the Canadian provinces?—If not, war exists between the United States and England." Nothing could be neater or more explicit; and of course England would immediately reply, "Any thing you please." This is a policy which is to electrify the whole country, and re-elect General GRANT triumphantly, and, of course, bring General BUTLER into the State Department. The General's cleverness is unquestioned, his services in the war are gratefully remembered; but does he seriously think that England will be persuaded by a kick, or that it is statesmanship to propose to begin a war as a method of keeping a party in power?

EXTRAORDINARY CHARGE AGAINST A SENATOR.

THERE seems to have been an open market for votes at the late election in Rhode Island. The Providence Journal asserts that hundreds were bought, that the price was five dollars, and that there was scarcely a pretense of secrecy. It has been often alleged that the politics of the little State were more venal than those of any of the other States, and that preferment and influence have depended mainly upon money. The late contest in Rhode Island has occasioned a great deal of plain talking; and one speech of Mr. JENCKES just before the election is of national importance, because of the grave charges which it makes, upon official documentary evidence, against a Senator of the United States. Mr. SPRAGUE, one of the Senators from Rhode Island, has been known for some time to be peculiarly hostile to Mr. JENCKES, one of the Representatives—a gentleman most honorably known to the country for his bankrupt act, and more especially for his efficient advocacy of civil service reform. The Republican Convention of his district were unable to agree upon a candidate, and referred the selection to the people. There were two candidates at the polls, and Mr. JENCKES was defeated. Mr. EAMES, who is called a Sprague Republican, was elected, having only a few thousand majority over Mr. JENCKES, and nearly four hundred over all.

Of the local and personal considerations affecting the election we have, of course, nothing to say, except to regret that so experienced, able, and faithful a legislator as Mr. JENCKES is lost to the country. But in the speech to which we have alluded Mr. JENCKES, after stating very plainly that it was the general impression in Congress that Senator SPRAGUE's ill will is the law of Rhode Island, and that his will was established by political bribery and fraud, in consequence of which the State was every where notoriously disgraced, proceeded to charge, not, as he said, "without the most ample proof.....that, in the darkest days of the war, WILLIAM SPRAGUE, formerly Governor, and now Senator, of Rhode Island, in the Congress of the United States, violated the articles of war of the United States in holding commerce with the enemy, and aiding them with money and munitions of war."

Mr. JENCKES then read an official report from General HOLT to the Secretary of War in 1865, concerning a case of illicit trade to Texas, "implicating HOYT, SPRAGUE, and others, brought to the notice of the Department by Major-General DIX." The substance of the case is, that in the autumn of 1862 certain firms in Providence furnished money with which vessels were bought, loaded with machinery, arms, and cleared for foreign ports, and run to Texas under changed flags, the cargoes sold in TEXAS, and the proceeds invested in cotton. General HOLT states that Mr. SPRAGUE wrote several letters to General DIX denying the statements of HOYT, who seems to have been the agent, and who asserts that Mr. SPRAGUE was fully informed of every thing, and advised and aided the enterprise. Mr. JENCKES, in speaking of the subject was to aid Union men in TEXAS; but no one else, the General says, seems to have had any such idea, and Mr. DIX's letters show that, who, as the Senator admits, had especial charge of the undertaking, describes its object in very different terms. In a letter to General DIX, in writing to the Secretary of War, states that the proof of illicit trade is ample, and that it is an important question whether the proceedings should be by military commission or in a civil court, and whether the State, if a civil court, is entitled to the res of war or a still higher crime under the Constitution. General HOLT, in conclusion, is of opinion that the examination of the papers, that the persons involved may be brought to trial for relieving the enemy with money and munitions of war, and violating the rules of war in trading with the enemy. His report is dated JUNE 15, 1865; and he says it is "the duty of the Government to consider, in view of all the circumstances and of the present condition of affairs," the trial shall be ordered.

In the question, why the accused persons were not tried at the time, Mr. JENCKES replies that HOYT and SPRAGUE were not indicted upon the ground that in that dark hour the trial of a Senator upon such a charge would be too demoralizing a shock to the Republic to be undertaken; when the report was made by General HOLT in 1865, more than two of the three years from the offense, required by the statute within which it can be tried, were passed; there were no national civil courts in TEXAS, and the authority of military tribunals was considered at the Supreme Court, which presently denied it; and the offenders, according to Mr. JENCKES, thus escaped exposure. The inference seems to be understood that Senator SPRAGUE has decided either the accuracy of Mr. JENCKES's statement or the inference of guilt which General HOLT, in view of the report of the latter gentleman is very emphatic, and General DIX's opinion was that the proof of illicit trade was conclusive.

It remains for us, for instance, from the invoice of the cargo with which HOYT went from Havana to Matamoras, that it included "thousands of cartridges and percussion caps."

Party and personal feeling in Rhode Island are very acrimonious. But these are not the considerations of a partisan, they are official documents of the government. Their charges are so grave, and the implication of Senator SPRAGUE is so apparently positive, that no one is so much interested as he in a full and frank statement of the facts. One thing, at least, is very evident. If Mr. SPRAGUE satisfactorily explains this extraordinary charge, his opponents in Rhode Island will be decisively and finally overthrown, and his power must remain for a long time unassailable.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AND MARRIAGE.

IF the charge that is sometimes carelessly made that the movement for the suffrage of women implies sympathy with the views which some of its prominent friends hold of the divorce laws or of any other subject, the number and weight of those friends would certainly be very seriously diminished. Mrs. STANTON, for instance, is very well known as one of the earliest, ablest, and most faithful advocates of the concession of the suffrage to women. Her knowledge and experience as a woman reveal to her a thousand wrongs which might be rightly, and measures of common advantage that might be adopted, if women were admitted to equal political power. She is of opinion that the laws of marriage would possibly be altered if women voted; and she has probably very many other expectations of the results that would follow the granting of women. These views she expressed at a late meeting of the friends of woman suffrage in New York. They were her own views, sincerely entertained, eloquently set forth, we have no doubt, and to be judged by their intrinsic merits. But they are not the platform of any woman suffrage society, and are to be received as the expression of another person might be who should say that the prohibition and extermination of evident spirits would follow the voting of women, and were in themselves desirable objects.

This speech of Mrs. STANTON was very vigorously criticised in the Woman's Journal, as containing views fatal to all domestic happiness, or even to the existence of the family relation; and, of course, there was a natural regret that the teaching of "a woman beloved and honored as Mrs. STANTON is" should tend directly to inculcate doctrines which the Journal believes to be so pernicious. There was doubtless, also, very serious regret that they would undoubtedly be considered the views of the woman suffrage party, and a great injury be consequently done to the cause by confounding it with other questions. The Revolution, which is understood to be peculiarly friendly to Mrs. STANTON, replied to the criticism by asserting that the editors of the Woman's Journal were quite as heterodox upon the subject of marriage as Mrs. STANTON, and printed a private letter from that lady contemptuously criticising Colonel INGERSOLL, whom she declares to be the real leader of the Boston movement, Mr. HIGGINSON having, as she says, no knowledge or interest in the matter.

This little bickering will explain to our readers why there are two associations to further the extension of suffrage to women. It is plain that those who think Mrs. STANTON's views of marriage, which she urges as of the first importance at the meetings of the society, are false and perilous, will naturally prefer to work by themselves and in their own way; while it is equally natural to suppose that Mrs. STANTON and her friends would not be slow to labor in common with persons whom they publicly hold up to contempt. This is the real reason why the attempt at union is not only futile, but foolish. The members of both societies are undoubtedly sincerely devoted to the cause. But the "New York" methods allow a latitude of debate and a miscellaneousness of subject which in the judgment of the Cleveland or Boston society are not only perplexing, but most injurious to the cause itself. The latter association, of which Mr. BECKER is president, holds, as we understand, that the special question of reform in the marriage laws is independent of the woman suffrage question.

All the successful meeting of the American Woman Suffrage Association at Cleveland it is understood that a further proposition of union will be made by the New York society. But it is obvious that even if all other differences could be waived, that which springs from so totally antagonistic a conception of the scope of the cause does and must divide the action of its friends. The divergence is, of course, intensified by the position of Mrs. STANTON as a free strictures upon her fellow-workers, but it need not necessarily have been acrid or hostile. There is a real difference of feeling, and it is therefore proper that there should be separate action. We have no doubt that this will be the result of any effort that may be made. Something certainly will be gained by sentimentally declining to recognize the facts of the situation.

HOMEOPATHIC ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

IN the State of New York there is proper hospital accommodation for only about half the whole number of insane patients. All the retreats are crowded. The asylum on Blackwell's Island has about thirteen hundred inmates, which is, perhaps, almost twice as large a number as can be properly lodged and cared for. It is therefore a subject of general interest that another insane asylum is proposed at Middletown, in Orange County, in which the patients are to be treated by the homeopathic practice. The State gives $150,000 when an equal amount has been privately subscribed, and to complete this private subscription $75,000 are yet needed. A project so humane and important appeals to the sympathy of all intelligent citizens; and Dr. GEORGE E. FOOTE, at No. 6 West Thirty-second Street, New York, will furnish any information.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE first important success achieved by the French arms since the commencement of the war was the reoccupation of Orleans on the 9th of November, by the secret battle, in which the Prussians under General VON DER TANN were defeated with great loss, and compelled to evacuate the city. The broadest part of the fighting occurred at the small hamlet of Coulmiers, near Orleans. The losses of the Prussians are stated by Von Tann's journals to be 10,000 in killed, wounded, and 1000 prisoners. The French report that the number killed by their own arms is little more than one of which were collected and distributed to the Na-tional Assembly. In the official report the number of Prussians is stated to be at 8000, and that of the enemy, he says, exceeds largely. The Germans have captured 1000 prisoners (said to be continually adding to the number in the pursuit of the enemy), two pieces of the Prussian pattern, and many ammunition and provision wagons. A telegram from King William to Queen Augusta announces the defeat of Von der Tann, but states that he has been largely reinforced.

The Times of Monday, of Near Orleans 200 men and 100 guns—published November 11 to the besieging and consisting of those of the 14th and 15th result of the surrender of this fortress was the dismantling of the German fortifications at Ad Brisach, across the Rhine, which, it is presumed, will no longer be necessary.

M. JULES FAVRE has addressed a circular to the French representatives abroad on the subject of the recent effort to obtain a new neutrality, in which he asserts that Prussia must assume the responsibility of rejecting the proposition for an armistice, and argues that Prussia, in rejecting it, proves that she makes war for personal aims, and not for the interests of Germany. M. FAVRE represents that an armistice without the preliminary convening of the German Constituent Assembly, in which Prussia would condemn the population of the annexed provinces to a state of slavery.

The Russian government has informed Austria that the treaty of 1856, so far as it relates to the Black Sea, will no longer be observed. This action has created great excitement in Europe, and may lead to very serious complications.

The Prussian Governor of Lorraine has ordered a census of persons liable to military duty, and evasions are to be punished severely.

The special committee of the Italian Senate on the question of changing the capital to Rome recommend that it, the Senate, should not make any of the death of the present Pope. M. THIERS, in a letter to the Pope, assures him that the French army will remain in the case at the coming Conclave, and a position "worthy of God's supreme Head of the Catholic Church."

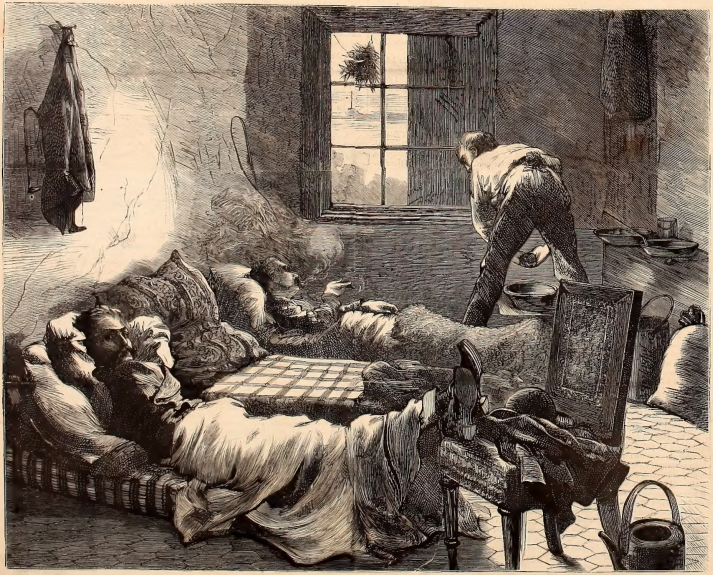
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE New York State election, which took place November 8, resulted in the defeat of the Republican State ticket, headed by General SEYMOUR L. WOOLLEY for Governor, over whom Governor HOFFMAN was re-elected by a majority of about fifty thousand. The delegation in Congress will stand sixteen Democrats to fifteen Republicans. The State Legislature will be Democratic by two votes in the latest returns—sixty-one Republicans to the same number of Democrats.

The next Congressional House of Representatives will probably number one hundred and forty-five Republicans and one hundred and sixty-seven Democrats, five of the present being colored.

MAP OF THE SOUTHWESTERN PART OF FRANCE, SHOWING ORLEANS, TOURS, LYONS, AND THEIR RAILWAY CONNECTIONS.

THE NEW PARISIAN POLICE.—[SEE PAGE 759.]



A NIGHT AT THE FRONT.—[SEE PAGE 759.]

M. THIERS.

On another page this week we give an account of the unsuccessful negotiations recently attempted by this veteran statesman to secure an armistice for France; on this page the reader will find his portrait, as he now appears, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He has exerted himself boldly and diligently in his patriotic mission, and has failed only because the headlong current of events was already too strong to be controlled. We can not, within the limits of a newspaper article, give even an outline sketch of his long and varied career in the departments of literature and politics, and can only glance at his history since the revolution of February, 1848, which brought him more prominently than he ever had been before to the notice of Americans.

On the breaking out of that revolution he was invited, with OUDINOT BARROT, to make one attempt at saving the monarchy; but it was too late. He was never a republican, though he accepted the republic, and endeavored to give it a conservative turn, vehemently resisting the fallacious notions and preposterous schemes of the Communists, and the intrigues and agitations of the Red party. Sitting in the National Assembly for the department of the Seine Inférieure, he supported the advent of Prince LOUIS NAPOLEON as President of the Republic, and the French intervention at ROME, fighting a duel with the Italian General BIXIO upon that occasion. He has always upheld the temporal sovereignty of the Pope. In 1850, with the conservative majority of the Assembly, he helped to carry the restriction of universal suffrage, in order to prevent the re-election of the President.

M. THIERS.

LOUIS NAPOLEON was by this time obnoxious to that party, who suspected him of a design to usurp absolute power; while he suspected them, on the other hand, of an intention to restore the Orleans monarchy. M. THIERS had become his chief antagonist; and when the coup d'état of December, 1851, struck down the legislative body of the republic, M. THIERS was arrested, taken out of his bed at five o'clock in the morning, and confined some days in the prison of Mazas. He was released, but expelled from France, and passed some months in Belgium, England, Italy, and Switzerland. Returning to Paris in August, 1852, he finished his Napoleonic history. It was not till 1863, after the adoption of a more liberal constitution for the empire, that he entered the Corps Législatif, in which he has delivered many effective opposition speeches. He has denounced the financial extravagance of the imperial government, its wars in Italy and Mexico, and not less its abstinence from a warlike behavior toward Prussia four years ago. He has incessantly protested against the movement of the Italians and Germans toward the completion of their national unity, and he has taunted the Emperor for not daring to stop them. It can not, therefore, be denied that M. THIERS is, as much as any Frenchman, responsible for the irritation which has caused the present war, though he disapproved its undertaking last July, because he thought the opportunity was not well chosen. Notwithstanding the grave political errors which have been pointed out, his conduct, during forty-five years of public life, has not deserved the reproach of tergiversation; he has not belied or forsaken the principles which he formerly professed. Constitutional monarchy, with a responsible ministry dependent on parliamentary and popular support, and with a permanent aristocracy to strengthen the throne, has been the object of his constant faith.

THE EXODUS FROM ST. CLOUD.—[SEE PAGE 759.]

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Greendolme's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXV.

BASIL.

It is nineteen years since Richard Yorke stood at the dock at Cross Key and heard the words of doom. Almost a whole generation of his fellow-creatures has passed away from the earth. Old men have died, young men have become old, and babes have grown to be young men. There are but some half dozen persons in the world who, if reminded of him by some circumstance, can recollect him plainly. There are two who still keep him in their thoughts continually, just as he was—like a picture which bears no longer any resemblance to its original—and even these never breathe his name.

Here is a young fellow walking with his mother along Oxford Street who is not unlike him, who might be himself but for those nineteen years, and the girl that walks upon the other side of him might also be Harry Trevethick. Youth and beauty are not dead because Richard Yorke is dead, or as good as dead. The name of the girl is Agnes Aird, a painter's daughter, who is also a teacher of his art. The lad is her father's pupil, and has learned beneath his roof a lesson not included in the artistic course: he must know that the way in which his eyes devour the girl, the intonation of his voice when he addresses her, are silent pressure of the arm on which her fingers rest. Charles Coe is in love with Agnes, and in all his studies of perspective beholds her, a radiant figure beckoning him on to a happy future. His pencil strays from its object in journey her features—maybe her name beside his own. Mr. Coe, his father, recordingly disapproves of this projected alliance, and has forbidden the young people to associate. This shake, however, can scarcely be obeyed while the whole party are inmates of Mr. Aird's residence, who "lets off" the upper part of his house as furnished apartments, which the Coes have taken for lodgings for one of their sons. Selfcemon (now a very well-to-do personage, and a great authority on metallic cements) is also under the same roof as business, and left to his wife the choice of a residence; and she, to please her son, had chosen the artist's dwelling-place whose door-plate was inscribed the fact that he was a professor of drawing. Solomon was not displeased that his son should gain his name in distinction; it might be useful to himself hereafter in the matter of sales and auctions: but he is distantly opposed to this ridiculous love affair, which is to be stamped out at once. To that end he has instructed Charles Coe to look for lodgings in the east quarter, and it is on that errand that we now behold him. It is characteristic of the Harry whom we once knew that she permits these young people to accompany her—and one another—in the very quiet that has been their final separation for its object. She can not resist making them happy while she can; and she can re fuse her Charley nothing. Moreover, Solomon is in the City, looking after his mining interests, and need never know.

In appearance, however, Harry Trevethick is greatly changed. She is not worn and haggard, yet has already passed into the shade of middle life. Her hair, though still in profusion, is tinged with gray; her features are worn and sharp; her brow is wrinkled; and in her once trustful eyes dwells a certain anger and suspicion that are the trouble, not an anxiety which is almost Fear.

The three are now in one of the streets which unite Cavendish Square with Oxford Street, and a busy babbling riff connects the unruffled lake with the roaring river. The pavements are full of shops and private houses, the latter of which it seems once deep, notwithstanding their genteel appearance, to accommodate visitors in the week or month.

"This is the sort of locality your father wished for, Charley," remarked Mrs. Coe, looking about her: "it seems central, and yet tolerably quiet. Let us try his house."

The name of "Basil," without prefix, was engraved upon the door-plate; and in a corner of the dining-room window fluttered a pasteboard card with "Apartments" on it.

"There's no use to drag Agnes and you in," Mrs. Coe went on, as they stood waiting for the bell to be answered. So Charles, well pleased, was left outside with the young people, while his mother went over the house." In a few minutes, however, she reappeared, and in a somewhat hurried and excited tone observed, "I think this place will do, my dears; but there is a good deal to talk about and settle, which will take some time. Therefore I think you had better go home together, and leave me here." And without waiting for a reply, she retired within and closed the door.

"How very curious!" exclaimed Agnes, wondering.

"Oh, not at all," said the young man, cheerfully; "my mother likes to do things for herself, and I dare say has not a very high opinion of our judgment in domestic matters. You don't seem over-pleased, it seems to me, Agnes, at the notion of a day-walk with your humble adorer;" and Mr. Charles pouted, half in fun and half with annoyance.

"No, no; it is not that, Charles," answered the girl, hastily. "You know I have no pleasure equal to that of being with you; but I don't like your mother's looks; she had such a strange look, and spoke so differently from her usual way. I really scarcely like to leave her."

"My dear Agnes, you don't know my mother," returned Charles, laughing. "One would sometimes think she had all the care of the world upon her shoulders when every thing goes not as smooth as oil. You don't appreciate the grave responsibility of taking furnished lodgings for a week certain. Come along, you little goose. And, drawing her still hesitating arm within his own, he marched away with her.

Yet Agnes had reason for what she said; and Charles, somewhat selfish as he was, would have forgone the flirtation and remained with her mother's side had he seen her the moment after the front door had shut her in.

With a throbbing heart, and a face as white as the handkerchief she pressed over her damp brow, Harry stood against the wall of the passage, with trembling steps, she approached the open parlor door. An aged woman stood in the centre of the room, with hair as white as snow, but with a figure straight as a poplar, and drawn up rigidly to its full height.

"Why do you come back again?" cried she, in accents soft as mails, yet keen as steel. "Why! is you once more on my threshold, you false witch, who flees is nothing more to blight and blast? Did you think I should not know you? Did you think I had to come? I should know you among all the fair faced fiends in hell."

"Mother, mercy, Mrs. Yorke!" cried Harry, feebly; and she fell upon her knees, and made as though she would kneel to kiss the other's garments with her stretched-out arms.

"Don't touch me, lest I strike you," answered the old woman, shrinking back. "Seven years ago I would have struck you on your cruel lips, and spoiled the beauty that has been your curse and ruin. May you have sons to perish through false witness, and to pine in prison! May you be deserted, and know the want or hope, as I do, O God, O devil, go, and rid me of your hateful presence!"

"Mother, hear me, Mrs. Yorke!" cried Harry, clutching at the other's garments. "Strike me, spit upon me, if you will, but only hear me! Abject as I look, remember, as I once was, I have not needs look and feel—I have longed for this hour to come, as my boy longs for the day when he shall be a man, to wake the next to find his bride a corpse; or, better still, to find her false, like you.

"I am not false; I never was; Heaven knows it!" cried Harry, passionately. "I do not blame you for your bitter words. I have earned your curses, though I meant to earn your blessing."

"Of revenge," muttered the old woman, struggled for the mastery in her tone. "Richard, Richard! in your chains and toil, do you hear? Is there no woman among men who knows mercy?"

"Upon my soul—whose salvation I would have imperiled by my silence—I do not know whether it seemed my worst," cried Harry. "That I was weak and credulous and fearful is most true. Richard Yorke, I have been false to you—you: My father—he is dead, madam, and past your judgment! Let the fire of his wrath burn out, and blazed up afresh at the mention of him)—deceived me with false hopes; for fear alone—though I swear it—I have done what have caused me to break the promise I had passed to you. He said, if I married myself and him by the law, as I contemplated, that he would mean me from his door forever; that in the lips of all the world he would call me a designing woman of the slume and infamy; that even the man I loved would loathe me when I had thus served his turn. I answered him, 'No matter, so I am true to my act.' Then he said, 'But you will not save him; you will turn him, rather, into a felon, and expose you purpose to give. We have proof enough of this Yorke's guilt, no matter what you swear; and with such proof before the jury, they cannot but set other offenses, if we choose to adduce it. All you will achieve by your generosity is your own.' Then I hesitated, not knowing what to think.

"The case is this,' argued my father: 'I have no fear to maintain this prosecution; because the money has been all recovered, and I don't want your revenge, as I say. I only want to be sure that I'll have him taught a lesson; he must be punished for the wrong he has done, but not severely. If you will promise judge Jones to be merciful over, will beg him off: such an appeal is always listened to, and your money, and I will make it. If you dare to speak for him, as I hear you mean to do—if you, my daughter, call yourself thief and traitress by your words, he shall be sent to jail. He shall, by Heaven! His fate hangs on my lips, not yours.'

"Is this true?" mused the old woman.

"It is true, so help me Heaven!" cried Harry. "I, not a fool, as I thought myself, believed him. I was a traitress. If you were in court, and saw me look at him—the smile I gave by word, I trusted to secure his life—you would not cavil over it it seemed—No you did see it: I see you do. Then I trusted to secure his life, thank God, thank Heaven!"

She began to sob and cry, and caught hold of the old woman's hand and kissed it, while the other stood silent, still in doubt.

"Oh, madam, you see I had you have suffered torments for long years is plain to see, and yet you have not, though he was your son, been punished for it have. Have you not had to forgive him by a word as I could; and oh, I did not utter it! I seemed to be his judge, his jailer, the cause of all his woes, to the man I loved—and loved beyond all others! I hated my own father for his sake. I"—she shuddered—"I was married to Richard's rival. You at least have been spared the contamination of his touch. He was not who helped to doom him. Your case is hard and bitter—but mine! not deserved on Richard, in his chains and toil, has suffered what I have suffered! Look at me, madam, and tell me if I speak truth or lie."

"Yes, yes," mused Mrs. Yorke, in tender tones, and passing her fingers over the other's silvering hair and haggard face; "I do—I must believe it. I should not have known you to-day had you not called me by my name. You must have mourned for him indeed. Is this the cheek that I struck? Is it to this the hair a boy of mine I took to comfort him in prison? Poor soul—poor sister!"

"How is he, madam?" whispered Harry, hoarsely. "Is he well? Is he free?"

"No, no," said the old woman. "In a year hence he will be. I had a letter only yesterday. But you must never see him. And if you really love him—I speak it for his sake, not theirs—you must never let him see eyes on your husband or your boy."

"I do not intend to see him; it would be too terrible to bear," groaned Harry.

"But he must not see them. Insisted the other, gravely. "You must put the sea between yourselves and him, or there will be murder done. His wrath is terrible, and will be the destruction of both them and him. The hope of vengeance is the food he lives upon, and without which he would have died years ago. Even if you persuaded him, as you have convinced me, that you yourself were innocent of his ruin, that would only make him firmer in his purpose against your husband. He will have his life-blood, and then will be even will prevent it. If I had not seen you, I meant to see this man, and give him warning six months before Richard was free."

"Solomon would never heed it," exclaimed Harry, "nor even believe it if I told him."

"Then he is a fool," said the other, contemptously. "You must bring him here that I may tell him. Solomon must be a fool indeed not to hearken when a mother warns him against her own son. Mind, I do not blame my Richard, Harry Trevethick, Mrs. Yorke, with a sudden passion; "he has had provocation enough; it is but right to tell him that you have been false to him, and to make no see him do it. But they must be kept apart, I say—this man and Richard—lest a worse thing befall him than has happened already."

"Never to see him more!" moaned Harry, covering her face with her hands; "never to tell him I was not the wretch I seemed! only to hear him as an enemy to me and mine—"

"Ay, and to himself," interrupted the other, gravely. "If you would not inflict far more on him than you have already; if you love Richard not—as you will, if you neglect my warning—designated by the hand of God to death, as you have involuntarily doomed him to a shameful life, keep these two men apart. If you love this man of your husband, keep him from the touch of mine."

"Great Heaven!" cried Harry, shuddering, "would he harm my boy—my innocent boy?"

"Ay, as he would set his heel upon his father in the viper and the toad. It is no idle menace—he has breathed so cautiously that the whisper might well escape even another ear than mine—he might well escape even another ear than mine—he might well escape even years. He thirsts for liberty, not for his own sake, but for the slow-ripening vengeance that he knows it will have. Unless we save him from himself by saving them from him, as sure as yonder inky cloud will fall upon us, so sure will the evil of it was fall given to his mind when he wrote from Cross Key: 'They are with me in those three, or present, and have made me ever to mention them by name; and since then he has thought of nothing else. The evil will be accomplished. Do not, I say again, beware of him."

"He must be mad to cherish—"

"Perhaps he is," interrupted the old woman, coldly; "he will not be less dangerous on that account to those who provoke him mad.

There was a long silence. Then Harry, in submissive tones, inquired what Mrs. Yorke would have her do.

"Bring your husband hither," returned she. "Let him take his children, and leave the world—telling him his peril to me: the sooner it is done the better. There is but a year at most—and Richard will be free. He has his goods, and get him away across the world, erasing every footstep behind him. Then, when no matter how great a blight the elew—Richard will track him like a blood-hound."

"I will come here at once—to-morrow," cried Harry, eagerly.

"And your name is Basil now, remember; not that it is likely," she added, bitterly, "that you will call me Yorke from habit; it is not a household word, I reckon."

"It is never breathed," said Harry, simply; "but, oh, madam, I have indeed learned I do! He was my first love, and my last; and though he should kill me for the crime, of which I have been guilty, I should pray God to bless him with my truest breath. Yet he must curse me never! I must never know but that I was the willing agent of his ruin!"

"Tis true, I dare not mention your name, Harry," said Mrs. Yorke, sadly: "and, if I talk him, all the knowledge of the deception practiced on you would make him more than ever bitter against your husband—the man who, by convivance in your father's cruel falsehood, obtained you for his wife, and his rival joined as his foe. I do not blame you for your marriage—I know the force of stern necessity too well. Richard must know that Richard could forgive you: he never, never could."

"I know it, I know it," sighed Harry, shuddering; "and yet he would pity me if he did but know what my life has been—almost as much as I have pitied him. But you, madam, you at least have forgiven me: you believe me; you will not refuse to bless me, as he would have before I go."

"I believe you, and therefore I forgive you," answered Mrs. Yorke, with tenderness; "and if I believed in blessings, and had the power of bestowing them, you should have your wish. Even henceforth we two are friends—though I were thought to kiss your cheek again, Harry—and must work together for the good of him we love in common. You will be here to-morrow for certain, then?"

"Without fail we shall."

CHAPTER XXXVI

THE ONEN.

Mrs. Coe was as good as her word, and her husband and son were Mrs. Basil's lodgers within the second-empty hours. Solomon Coe was not very particular as to furnished apartments, and left such arrangements wholly to his wife. On the other hand, he was confided to her little respecting his affairs, nor was she, on her part, envious to inquire into them. Man and wife had few things in common, and affection was not one of them. Solomon had married Harry with the full knowledge of that maiden's unprotected before him; the disclosures at the trial, and the subsequent gossip of his neighbors, had placed that fact beyond a doubt. But he was not to be balked of the bride that had been promised him so long; nor, above all, should to her but little respecting his affairs, nor was she, on her part, envious to inquire into them. Man and wife had few things in common, and affection was not one of them. Solomon had married Harry with the full knowledge of that maiden's unprotected before him; the disclosures at the trial, and the subsequent gossip of his neighbors, had placed that fact beyond a doubt. But he was not to be balked of the bride that had been promised him so long; nor, above all, should to her out of the reach of such temptation as a pretty girl living beneath the same roof must always offer to susceptible youth; and hence it was that Mrs. Coe had engaged new lodgings. But even now, so lightly did his father think of the matter, that Charley was still to be permitted to visit at Mr. Aird's daily, and take his drawing-lesson as heretofore.

An excuse for the change of residence had been afforded in the fact that Soldo was too far from the parks, in which alone Mrs. Coe took pleasure in walking. She was quite unaccustomed to town life, and the roar and tumult of the streets annoyed and even alarmed her. In some respects, indeed, she was even a more nervous, timid creature than she had been as a girl; the warning just received from Mrs. Yorke had not fallen upon her altogether unexpectedly, though she could not have been said to be prepared for it. A vague apprehension of Richard's vengeance had haunted her whole married life, she did not fear for her own safety; something told her that his anger would scorn to be so small a self; that it would pass over her head like a flaming sword, and smite her husband and her boy; and as face after face passed by her in the crowded street, she would shrink and tremble, thinking that that of Richard Yorke would come one day, and recognize her own, and track it home. Was he not fitted to work this monstrous ruin? Did not the specific ship cross Turkish Sands before she met his face for the first time? Though not very young, Harry was much wedded to superstition as ever. A curious instance of this occurred on the day that the Coes moved into their new lodgings. The mother and son had arrived first—Solomon being engaged in the City until evening—and Charley had stood upon the ground-floor parlor, while the landlady (whom he had not yet seen) was engaged with his mother up stairs in the disinfectan of the bedrooms. Above the chimney-piece hung that striking if not attractive portrait of Joanna Southcote, given her amanuensis, with which we are already acquainted; and it tickled the young man's fancy amazingly. He considered it was a fine old picture—the likeness, perhaps, of Mrs. Basil and her late husband engaged in making out their worldly balance. "I wish Agnes not to be jealous of our charming landlady," thought he, and took out his sketch-book with the intention of preserving the likeness for that young lady's amusement. While engaged in this occupation the door opened, and stepped Mrs. Basil and her new tenant. In his alarm and haste he stepped back against the small overthrow a table (on which were some ornaments, he knew not what, which rolled to his mother's feet. She uttered a cry of terror, and the landlady fainted right off, still, regarding him with a face of astonishment, and even terror.

"Is that—your—son?" exclaimed she, clutching his mother by the arm.

But Mrs. Coe did not seem to hear her.

"Look, look!" cried she; "the skull, the skull! Oh, is it not a frightful omen?"

"I am really very sorry," said Charley, picking up the article in question; "it was very stupid of me, Mrs. Basil."

"Don't mention it, young Sir," said the landlady, who had apparently recovered from her sudden alarm; "the skull is not of more value for its roll, you see; he was fortunately a hard-headed gentleman when he originally owned it."

"Indeed," said Charley, taking it from her hand with some curiosity, "it seems a curious ornament for a sitting-room. May I ask whether it belonged to when it had flesh about it?"

"It is the skull of Swedenborg," answered Mrs. Basil. "A near relative of mine was a disciple of his, and left it to me as a most precious relic."

"But how the deuce did he get possession of it?" inquired the young man.

"Well, not very fairly, as it seems to me," smiled the landlady. "While your mother sits down and rests herself—for I am sure she looks frightened her a bit—I'll tell you the story."

"I am, yes," said Mrs. Coe, faintly; "I shall be better presently; don't mind me."

"Well, the tale runs thus, Sir. Swedenborg was buried in the vault beneath the Swedish ambassador's chapel in Princes Square, Ratcliffe Highway; and a certain theologian having once affirmed that the great philosopher's soul and body with them into the world of spirits, and that this gentleman had done the like, they were obtained to settle this point by actual examination. The body was found, and the theologian confuted, but no trouble was taken to reclose again the lid of the coffin. A thieving Swede, attending a funeral of one of his countrymen in the same vault, remarked this circumstance, and stole the skull, with the intention of selling it to some disciple of the great philosopher; but I am ashamed to say that he found a purchaser in my respected relative; and that's how I became possessed of Swedenborg's skull."

"Very curious, though rather lacrimose," observed the young man, laughing. "And this good lady over the mantel-piece, who is she?"

"That's Joanna Southcott. But my good young gentleman, I will answer all your questions another time. Your mother and I will have enough to do to arrange matters before your father comes home. You will excuse my freedom, Sir."

"Certainly," said Charley, rather amused than otherwise with the landlady's bluntness. "I know I'm in the way just now; so I'll step out for half an hour or so. I am sorry I frightened you, dear mother."

He stooped and kissed her fondly; and then, with a smile and a nod at Mrs. Basil, stepped into the little passage and was out of doors and, whistling, passed the window down the street.

"Your son has a light heart," said Mrs. Basil, looking at Harry very earnestly. "How old is he?"

"Eighteen—or a little less."

"He looks his age at least," observed the other, emphatically.

"Yes; dark people always do."

"And your husband is dark, like him, I remember."

"Yes; his complexion is swarthy, though he is not ilun, like Charles."

Mrs. Coe, still in the arm-chair into which she had first sunk, here closed her eyes; either the faintness of which she had complained was continued so again, or she did not wish to meet the other's searching gaze.

There was a long pause, during which Mrs. Basil went up to the sideboard, and poured out a glass of sherry, put it to her tenant's lips.

"Do you feel better now?" said she, when Harry had drunk it.

"Yes, yes; much better. But that skull—oh, horrible! it chilled from head to foot. What an omen on your very threshold! Heaven guard my Charles from evil!"

"My husband's, Mrs. Coe. The skull is harmless; and it rolled because your son upset it."

"Yes, my son," gasped the other, trembling. "It is for him I fear. It augurs death—death—to him!"

There was a ring at the front-door, decisive, sharp, and resonant.

"Great Heaven!" cried Harry; "if it should be he himself! Hide me away; put me out of sight, for God's sake! I cannot bear to behold the shock in every limb.

"It is the post," said Mrs. Basil, contemptuously; and she was right. The servant brought in a letter for her mistress.

"It is from Richard," mused she. "Black-bordered, and black-sealed too." She opened it without excitement, and read it through: it was but a few lines.

"Your omen has proved true for once, Mrs. Coe," said she, in silence, to herself. "This speaks of death."

"Whose death?" cried Harry.

"My husband's, Richard's father. Caress of Crompton died last night."

There was no sorrow in the aged woman's face: a gravity, unmixed with tenderness, possessed it. Carew was naught to her, and had been naught to her for years. But the title of memory was at its flow within her brain; and Crompton Park Past it, Past it touch us. That man had loved her once, after his own scornful manner, when he was young, and before power and affluence had made him proud. Now he had been the father of her only son, and now he was Dead.

"I am so sorry," said Harry, not quite knowing what to say.

"There is no need for sorrow," replied the other, quietly. "Let us go up stairs and finish our work."

A NIGHT AT THE FRONT.

THE war correspondent has to put up with a thousand personal inconveniences and privations, and is frequently settled down with a besieging army, to which, in ordinary times, he would not submit without a good deal of grumbling. He has to dine when he can get it, to move to a moment's notice, night and day, either to join a fresh regiment or the wagon which contains his own battery that happens to have hit the range of his quarters; and happy, indeed, is he if he lights upon a comfortable lodging as that described in the engraving on page 756. It is, perhaps, just a little crowded; but the jolly-looking fellows seem to be taking it easy, and are probably all good friends.

THE EXODUS FROM ST. CLOUD.

A WAR correspondent writes that, walking one day in the direction of St. Cloud, he met a melancholy procession of fugitives from that village, who had been turned out of house and home, not to make room for the Prussians, but for their own safety. St. Cloud was constantly under fire, and to stay there was to risk one's life. A brother and sister, old bachelor and old maid, who had always loved quietness, led the dismal procession. Some of them were doubtless on their way to quieter themselves with more peaceful friends, but others, probably, knew not where they should lay their heads that night, and were not too glad to get out of the range of their countrymen's guns. The engraving on page 757 illustrates this affecting incident.

THE NEW PARIS POLICE.

AMONG other changes which the Paris revolution of last September effected was the disbanding of the police force. This force, which was obnoxious to the mass of the people, as instruments of imperialist tyranny and intimidation, and especially as the spies of Pietri, were disbanded, and the Red Republican Government, led the dismal procession. Some of them were doubtless on their way to quieter themselves with more peaceful friends, but others, probably, knew not where they should lay their heads that night, and were not too glad to get out of the range of their countrymen's guns. The engraving on page 757 illustrates this affecting incident.

THE NEW PARIS POLICE.

AMONG other changes which the Paris revolution of last September effected was the disbanding of the police force. This force, which was obnoxious to the mass of the people, as instruments of imperialist tyranny and intimidation, and especially as the spies of Pietri, were disbanded, and the Red Republican Government, led the dismal procession. Some of them were doubtless on their way to quieter themselves with more peaceful friends, but others, probably, knew not where they should lay their heads that night, and were not too glad to get out of the range of their countrymen's guns. The engraving on page 757 illustrates this affecting incident.

THE NEW PARIS POLICE.

AMONG other changes which the Paris revolution of last September effected was the disbanding of the police force. This force, which was obnoxious to the mass of the people, as instruments of imperialist tyranny and intimidation, and especially as the spies of Pietri, were disbanded, and the Red Republican Government, led the dismal procession. Some of them were doubtless on their way to quieter themselves with more peaceful friends, but others, probably, knew not where they should lay their heads that night, and were not too glad to get out of the range of their countrymen's guns. The engraving on page 757 illustrates this affecting incident.

THE NEW PARIS POLICE.

AMONG other changes which the Paris revolution of last September effected was the disbanding of the police force. This force, which was obnoxious to the mass of the people, as instruments of imperialist tyranny and intimidation, and especially as the spies of Pietri, were disbanded, and the Red Republican Government, led the dismal procession. Some of them were doubtless on their way to quieter themselves with more peaceful friends, but others, probably, knew not where they should lay their heads that night, and were not too glad to get out of the range of their countrymen's guns. The engraving on page 757 illustrates this affecting incident.

STRAW PICTURES.

AMONG the curiosities of art must be included pictures made of straw. How far patience is exercised in this direction at present we do not know; but in the last century the inmates of some of the French monasteries employed a portion of their time in such labors. The process was by no means a simple one. First, a selection was made of the whitest, thinnest, longest, largest-barrel straws. They were severed above and below all the knots; the knots, membranes, and small parts of the straw were removed, and the rest were retained for use, in the form of tubes. Sometimes, unopened cylinders of straw, sometimes six or eight inches long. The straws were damped, and split open by means of a sharp-pointed instrument, which was inserted at one end, and decorously run along to the other, making a straight cut. Sometimes the whole circumference of a burnisher flattened out each piece. Sometimes, to expedite their labor, the workers cut a dozen straws at a cutting-mill, which first split the straw and then opened it out flat. The straws were prepared, and dyed in various colors, and were then pasted side by side on small sheets of thin paper, forming veritable mosaics. It is not necessarily cut out always that the lines of junction could scarcely be seen. All the straws on one sheet were exactly of the same length and size. Those, then, were the materials with which the artist worked; and the work was executed on the kind of effect desired to be produced. Sometimes the sheets were cut up into very narrow strips, and made into carpet patterns by alternating the colors; sometimes the artists in straw would make diagonal patterns, producing the effect by crossing the strips, or diversified patterns by alternating broad with narrow strips. A favorite style of ornamentation was that of making the straw mosaic. Several sheets, of different colors, were glued one on another, and cut out completely through with a delicate apparatus, in accordance with some particular device; and then the regular work of pasting the tiny bits side by side on paper, in the case of his powers of color. Occasionally the pictures or devices so produced were embossed in relief by being stamped between a die of horn and a counterdie of thick pasteboard, and the raised and depressed parts of the device corresponding in a proper way with the different colors of the picture. Sometimes the artist went so far as to engrave or chase the straw, or even to work it up into a kind of cameo.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A STOUT girl, who was sitting, wearily, on a summer day, under the shadow of a small equally pompous lady, up on holding forth, whispered to her mother, "Ain't she a fool, mother?" "Hush, child," was the reply; "don't you see, she's a woman?" "Oh come now, mamma," said the child, "you are such a little booger." The birds are singing, and as a boy was passing under the little girl, all worn out, and longing for relief and freedom in the open air, she said, "Oh come now, mamma." "Hush, dear," was the response; "he'll soon be done—quiet is a lesson." This was more than little patience could stand; and while the tears were running down her cheeks she said, in an indeed hopeless way, as expanding preacher, "Oh no, mamma. He is just putting a lot more in there."

GALLEY SLAVES—Type-setters.

AT Wamego, a place in the extreme West, is a shanty which bears the sign: "Here's Where You Get a Meal for Your Money—and No Grub Ye Give You."

"THE RAW MATERIAL"—Undersize steak.

A Dutchman at Decatur married a second wife in about a week after the loss of wife No. 1. The Sabbath following the funeral of the latter, he was first reading, and was duly "cut up" with the following response, "I don't think Jemima Ann will another woman in so soon after death of mine frau? No, no!"

A PROBATING SIGH—A pawnbroker's.

A little boy was advised by his father to use illustrations in his compositions wherever they should occur to him, "for," continued the parent, "there is no more forcible way of conveying or impressing your meaning." Shortly after the boy was being lectured on propriety. "I hope," said he, "you have no vestes, fathe—far better. The Bible says so, and I say so." "Illustrate it, pupa. I think I will illustrate your back before." Father could not see the application.

MYTHOLOGY tells us that he died of love for Jupiter; but modern chemistry has to do of potash.

WHAT THE WILD WAVES ARE NOW SAYING TO THE HOZZES—"Shut up."

AN Indiana husband lately dosed valuable property to his wife, "in consideration of one dollar and natural love and affection."

A soldier, being on picket reserve, went to a house, as he supposed, to borrow a frying-pan, but for what none but he can imagine, as there was nothing to fry. However, he went to the house and knocked at the door, which was opened by a lady, who asked what he wished. "Madam, could you lend me a frying-pan? I belong to the picket down here." "Yes, Sir," and forth with came the pan. He took it, looked in it, turned it over, and looked at the bottom, and then turned it over again, and looked into it very hard, as if not quite sure of the claim. "Well, Sir," said the lady, "is it the one you want to fry in it, madam?" and he laughed in spite of himself. He got it.

In the reign of James I., of tobacco-hating notoriety, the boys of a school acquired the habit of smoking, and imitated it quite well. But they found numerous expedients to conceal the vice from their master; for when he came unawares, what he saw was hooded together round the fire of their dormitory, insulting each other in virgins of the most terrible kind. But the master, not altogether a world dignity before them, "Why, you rascals, what do you mean by such conduct? Who dare you be smoking tobacco?" "Sir," said the boy, "I am subject to headaches, and a pipe takes off the pain." "And you?" said you? said you?" inquired the pedagogue, questioning every boy in his turn. One said "raging tooth," another cold, the third a cough; in short, they all had something. "Now, Sirrah," followed the doctor to the last boy, "what disorder do you smoke for?" Alas! all the excuses were exhausted; but the interrogated urchin, putting down his pipe, after a flavorful whiff, and looking up in his master's face, said, in a whining, hypocritical tone, "Sir, I smoke for cheese!"

THE GREAT OCEAN RACE—Fishes.

When cousin Lobkins first saw the elephant at the show he exclaimed, with great astonishment, "Then that's the real menagerie—the identical critter itself! Why, I don't wonder it takes a team to draw stun with! It ain't a scrape!" Lobkins went home, and related what he had seen. "I seen," said he, "the gineruine elephant—the biggest lump of flesh that ever stirred. He had tew tails, one behind and t'other before. Philosophers call the fore 'un a proboscis. He put one of his tails in my pocket and hauled out all the ginger-bread—ever hearn on. What d'ye think he done with it? Why he stuck it in his own pocket, and began to munch for more."

A silly missionary was asked the cause of his poverty. "Principally," said he, with a twinkle in the eye, "because I have such a large family to support."

A reverend divine, who was but a no-so preacher, being called upon accidentally to preach, asked a friend what he should preach about; to which the other coolly replied, "About two hours."

ADAM DENSMORE—A Nantucket, being examined by the coroner, was asked, "What kind of a man was Adam?" "Don't know, Sir," said he, "but I reckon he was on hoeing a more special description of the first man, and answered for more experience." "What," said the cabinetmaker, "he was just like Jos Simpson, the horse-cooper." How we'll asked the minister. "Well, nobody got one thing by him, and many lost."

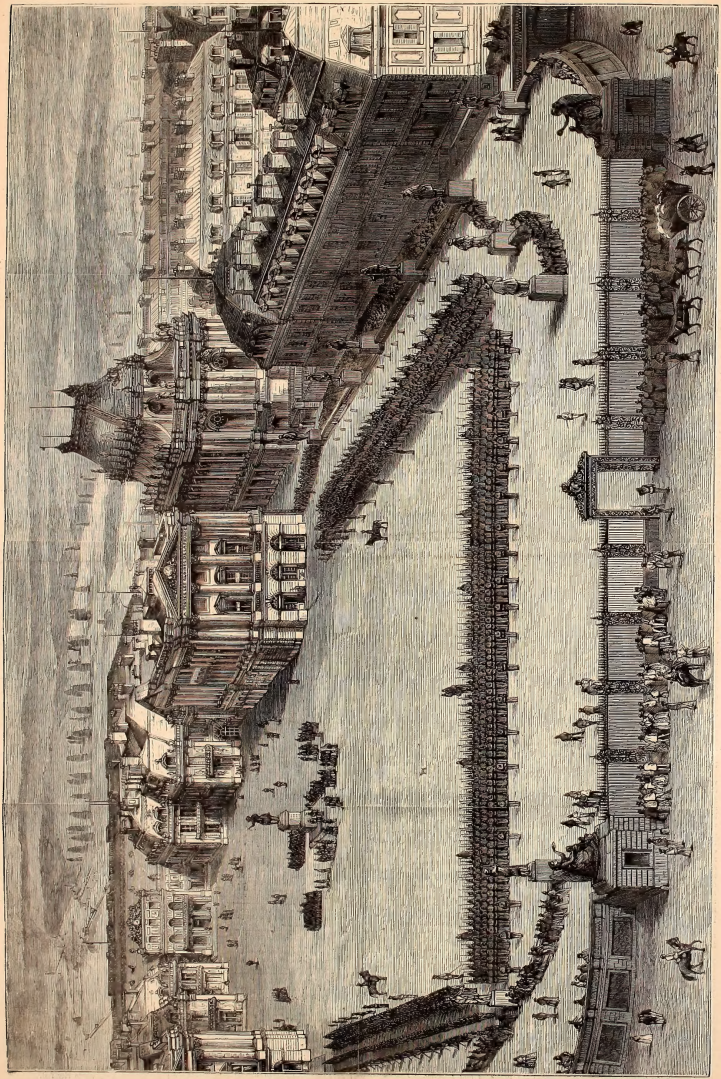
Josh Billings gives good advice to young wives. He says: "Don't undertake tew fix with your husband—by law; but if woss comes to a wussess let yure mother-in-law fix with ye."

A dentist, trying in vain to extract a decayed tooth from a lady's mouth, gave up the task with this apology. "The fact is, madam, it is impossible for any thing but to come from your mouth."

As Dr. Dwight once passed through a region of very poor land he said to a farmer, "I perceive your land have is not very productive." "Yes, Sir," said the farmer, "it is so poor that it can't raise even a mosquito." "Why, the more a man has of it the poorer he is."

A LONDON SKETCH.

"Oh, it was pitiful.
In a whole city full.
Home he had none."



THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES.—[See Page 762.]

SEDAN
DIE
WACHT AM RHEIN.

THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES.

The engraving on page 760, which gives a general view of this famous structure and its gardens, represents the town Prince distributing that coveted decoration of the German soldier, the Iron Cross, to fifty of his officers and men, who had especially distinguished themselves in the present war. The ceremony took place in the court-yard of the old palace, in which is a statue of Louis Quatorze, and commenced by a grand parade, the old inscription on the building, "Il fautre fa gloire de le faisance," standing out with bitter irony. The battalions were then drawn up in the court-yard in close columns, with the Prince and his staff in the centre. Then, amidst a respectful silence, the soldiers appearing on each side of the centre battalion, the fortunate recipients' names were called out one by one, each marching up to the Prince, receiving the decoration, and marching back again as mechanically as if it were an everyday occurrence. This ended, "Our Fritz" addressed a few words to his troops, and himself gave the signal for a cheer for King William, which was most enthusiastically given by the bands playing the national anthem. A cheer for the Prince himself concluded the ceremony.

"JEANNETTE AND JEAN."

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

EVA TRESILIAN was the prettiest girl in the small circle on which she shone. She lived in a little town in one of the southern counties of England, a town which combined the attractions of a garrison, a cathedral, and (being a sea-port) a splendid stretch of strand. Society there was not very fast, to be sure, but it had the great recommendation that, if not fast, it certainly was not loose. The amusements were mild. There were balls (a few), and dancing-parties (a great many), and picnics, in the summer. There were boating excursions, and bathing, and driving, and picnicking in the summer. In winter it tells of a dozen fourteen or fifteen years ago, when croquet had not yet been invented, when nappers were still extes, and when the young ladies, and even the gentlemen, at evening parties were expected to sing songs as a matter of course. In this society Eva Tresilian was the envy of every backward, fashion traveled so slowly down, that even the wife of a fashionable surgeon was an unusual contribution to the entertainment of an evening.

In this social circle, thus amusing itself, Eva Tresilian was, as I have said, the prettiest girl and the best singer. She sang, indeed, remarkably well, and it is a pity that croquet was not a flourishing game in her girlish days, for Eva could ankle were as gracefully and graceful. She was a romantic girl, too, and she raved about Wagner's "Lohengrin" when no one to the reading world, and often dreamed of being the Princess, only with a different moral to the story; and she delighted in Byron's "Corsair," and perhaps occasionally liked to fancy herself as Gulnare herself. She was, however, never only arose to her mind whenever her lover sat or did any thing which jarred upon her feelings, whenever he indulged in a momentary fit of jealousy, or looked grave and discontented if she danced too often with somebody else.

Will Heyworth was her lover—her fiancé, one might almost say, for all the town assumed that they were engaged, and would soon be married. Will Heyworth was a tall, strong, manly fellow, with a great beard; his father was the principal banker of the town, and Will would have a fine property some time or other; and so croquet himself a present chiefly in hunting, fishing, rowing, and making love to Eva Tresilian, whose head hardly reached his shoulder. The course of true love was running very smoothly indeed with this fortunate pair. Perhaps it was running too smoothly. Your artist soul, you know, must of fire, and child of the sun, usually takes more delight in Swiss torrent than in the Dutch canal; and Eva Tresilian delighted to believe that her nature was steeped in the atmosphere of art.

It was not a fortunate circumstance that brought to the garrison just about this time a certain celebrated regiment of the cavalry, to which belonged the Honorable Captain Hopeful Dartwell, younger son of the Earl of Stonehenge. Captain Dartwell was not a very young man by any means, although a younger son. He was not, perhaps, far off forty years of age; but he was nearly as tall as Will Heyworth, and he was, in a certain sense, a far more striking-looking man in appearance. While Will was fair and bright of complexion, Captain Dartwell was dark-haired and sallow. He had a light beard, which he wore well had when Guy Livingstone would call a cascade of black ringlets. Captain Dartwell, in that peculiar expression, part melancholy, part stern, part "used up" and Don Giovanni-like, which belongs to a certain class of Byronic military swell. Moreover, he had a wound on his forehead, won in some one of England's numerous frontier wars in Hindostan; and he had the reputation of having lived with wild companions of the highest and the lowest social degree, especially in London.

The moment Eva Tresilian looked first at the Honorable Captain Dartwell she felt an interest in him and admired him; the moment Will Heyworth saw the distinguished dragoon he took a strong dislike to him. This dislike grew deeper and deeper, as it became evident that Will was a person of quite secondary interest in the eyes of his social circle when the dark-mustached, stern-looking soldier, who was the son of an earl, and had looked on war, happened to stand near him.

When Eva first met the captain (at one of the most brilliant balls of the little town's season) she danced with him several times, and she found that Dartwell, like most cavalry men, was a superb waltzer. Then he had an air and manner at once proud and caressing, chivalric and lazy, courteous and blasé, which imposes immensely on girls. His slightest attention to her was offered in a style which seemed to give special meaning to it, seemed to mark it as something done for her and her only; and he ignored so calmly and grandly some of the most pretty and attractive girls in the room for attention and deference to Eva next little throbs of pride and delight flowed in her heart more often to her her more attentive he became. He would stand by her chair and talk with her in a low tone, and bending his tall figure over her shoulder, for half an hour together, superbly unheeding all of the other girls who were waiting and waiting in vain for the chance of exchanging half a dozen words with her. He told her of travels and adventures and battles, and Eva's heart told his tales, but with a careless, almost contemptuous manner, as if such things were every-day occurrences of life were unexciting, and hardly even interesting.

In fact, Eva was a little dazzled by the manner and the attentions of the Honorable Captain Dartwell. Will Heyworth became jealous and irritable, and probably made himself unreasonably ridiculous. Dartwell gave no outward sign of any particular emotion, but was evidently rather pleased to note the evidences of emotion, very different in their kind, which his presence and his ways created in those around him.

The balls were and months went on, and Dartwell's attentions to Eva Tresilian grew more and more distasteful to Will Heyworth. Yet there was hardly any thing in them of which open complaint could be made. Nothing but love-making could be seen; only poor Will felt that Eva was growing colder and colder to him while Dartwell remained in the town. At last there came news which ought to have gladdened the heart of Will Heyworth, but which did not. Captain Dartwell belonged was ordered off to the Crimea to take a part in the preparations for the coming siege. Alas! this very fact only tended to poor Will's further discomfiture, for it invested his rival with a certain halo of romance, and made him a new, touching, and pathetic interest in the remembrance of Miss Eva. Captain Dartwell was worth wished for were going to the wars—to fight against the Russians, the French, the Sardinians, any body—for there was always an interesting figure in Eva's mind, and purchase, even with his death, some of her tears!

A few days before the departure of the regiment there was quite a brilliant little party at the house of one of the officers' wives, and among those Eva was there, looking very romantic, sad, and beautiful; Will Heyworth was there, looking stern and out of temper, and Captain Dartwell was there, looking cool, composed, and stern, as usual, receiving adieus from a number of ladies, among whom Eva Tresilian was near. In the course of the night Eva was invited to sing, and Dartwell, as usual stood near her, full of the theme of the song, accompanying herself, the little "Jeanette and Jeannot" which was a favorite of the young soldier-lover who is going to the wars, and fears that he will never return. It is a touching song, full of so fighting men abroad, or weeping girls at home, and so forth; not a master-piece of music or poetry certainly, but having a certain pathos about the heart of it—not intangible, under certain circumstances, of very touching and moving power. Why on earth did Eva select that particular song for that particular occasion? Did she plunge into unconsciously? Did she intend to give to the interpretation which all the listeners put on it? Assuredly every one but Will Heyworth felt as the supporting of the girl's grief and love—grief and love which might not be repressed, and which must express itself in some way. Dartwell was not

VIOLINS.

IT has been sometimes said that the merit of a violin is not so much in its make as (1.) in the age, and (2.) the quality of vibration produced in he wood by incessant use. It may be answered, first, that no doubt age improves vibration, but ago will never make a good violin out of a bad one; witness the host of violins that were made in the time of Stradivarius by makers who must now either known as greatly inferior to his, or forgotten altogether. Again, that using a violin keeps it in good condition is no doubt true; but the fact, that much using does not will make it good, or, secondly, that a good one is not made to improve by much use, are two undeniable propositions; for, first, how many bad fiddles are there that have been scraped assiduously for ages, and are as bad as at the end, and, secondly—here is a remarkable and conclusive fact—there is a perfect Stradivarius (No. 17 in the collection of Count Cozio de Salabue, which until a few years ago had never been used at all. It is now in the possession of M. Vuillaume, who on being placed not long ago for the first time, proved, equal, if not superior, to the very finest violins by the great maker. It is the only one of his instruments which has come down to us in perfect preservation.

Thus it would appear that the secret of excellence lies neither in age nor use, but must be sought elsewhere.

The excellence of a violin depends, roughly speaking, upon two ranges of principles: (1.) the thickness, density, and collocation of the various woods. 2. On the nature and direction of the curves.

1. The front of a violin is of soft deal, the back and sides of maple. Now, it is well known that a piece of wood, like a string in tension, can be set in vibration, and will then yield a certain musical note; the pitch of which note will depend upon the length, thickness, and density of the wood; and that note will be accompanied by a certain number of sound-waves or vibrations. Now, when the back or front of a violin is covered with fine sand, and struck, or otherwise caused to vibrate, the sound will arrange itself in certain lines, corresponding to the wave of sound which generate the note belonging to the back or front, as the case may be. M. Savart maintains that after testing a great many of Stradivarius violins, in this way, he found that all the finest gave the same note, but that in no case was the note of the front the same as the note of the back. Further experiment showed that in the finest violins there was a whole note between the back and the front, and that any departure from this rule was accompanied with injury to the tone. There is probably a certain kind of grain in the wood of these remarks, although some suspicion has been thrown on the worth and even reality of Savart's experiments by some of our experienced makers; however, the following facts, stated necessarily in a considerable variety, seem to be relied upon:

For the front of the violin you must choose very light, soft, and porous wood—there is no fining better in this way than common deal. When dry, you cut a section, and look at it through the microscope, you will see it to be full of little hollows, once filled with sap, and the more of such cells there are, the more quickly will the wood vibrate to sound. For the back, then, we must take a table of harmony, or sounding board, or belly of our violin. But in proportion to the quickness will be the thinness and evenness of the material, and, if the back vibrated as quickly as the front, the sound would be very poor. Accordingly we take maple wood for the back. It is a harder wood, containing less sap, and consequently fewer hollow cells when dry. It therefore vibrates more slowly than deal, the effect of this is to detain the waves of sound vibrating from the front, and to make them take slower vibrations of the back in the hollow of the instrument. The ribs or sides of the violin, which are also made of maple, serve to confine the quickly vibrating belly with the slowly vibrating back, and hold them most firmly to together with full pulsation and body of sound. But we must not omit to mention a little bit of solid cubical wood-peg, which is stuck upright inside the violin, just under the bridge, and helps the bridge to support the upper spots by the strings. This insignificant little piece, connecting as it does the inside roof of the belly directly with the back, is so important as a medium to communicate and mix the vibrations that the French have called it the "soul of the violin." Indeed, by-the-by, a baby is born, becoming a sensible difference in the quality of the tone is produced, and a whole morning may be spent sometimes wasted in putting it up and shifting it about from one side to the other. The best possible advice to all amateurs is, when your instrument is up, leave it alone; but if it is evidently in the wrong place, don't attempt to alter it yourself, but have it set right by some first-rate violin doctor.

But we have not quite done with the vibratory qualities of the wood. Great skill must be exercised in the choice of woods. A piece is cut up a dozen maple-trees without finding a piece of wood so smooth and regular in grain, and of such even density as some of the Cremonese backs; and then, although deal is more porous than maple, yet all deal has not the same porousness, nor is all maple equally close-grained. Consequently, too pieces of deal of equal dimensions will not give the same note.

2. But we must not forget to say a word about the curves. The general shape of the violin has been fixed, after years of varied experiment. It is not shaped so for convenience (although its last most perfect shape happens to be also the most convenient), but because its final shape is acoustically proved to be the best. The most important curves are the longitudinal and latitudinal lines of the belly and the back. At first viols were made flat like guitars, then in all sorts of fanciful curves; the older ones are thick and bulgy, like pumpkins. The curve gradually subsided, until we get the exquisite wary lines of Stradavius. That curve is so graceful because it is the curve of nature. Set a string in vibration, and you will get the curve in the arc of a Stradavius back. And I am told that it is one of the most modern discoveries that this curve is the best for the belly of a violin, because it is the only one which is found perfectly to conduct the vibratory waves of sound.

But the sides or ribs also call for special notice. The height of these determines, of course, the air-bounds of the interior of the instrument. It is found by experiment that all the best violins contain about the same amount of air, and that any increased relation between the air-bounds capacity and the thickness of the wood is always found to be bad; any decrease of power in the air is found to injure the intensity of the sound. If there is too much air the deep tones are dull and heavy, the high notes thin and screamy; if too little air, the deep tones are harsh, and the first string loses its brilliancy.

Again, if the sounding-board is too thin, the sonority will be poor and weak; if too thick, the vibrations will be slow and dull. Or, as violin players say, the instrument will not "speak." Each thin sounding-board too much, or too little, is too flat, in either case the equilibrium of the mass of air will be disturbed, and the sound will be muffled and dead.

The shape and proportions of the two f's can not safely be departed from; no more than the model and the various incisions in the bridge. Immense numbers of holes, of all shapes and sizes, have been every possible experiment, position of bridge, before Stradavius fixed the pattern, which no good violin-maker has since ventured to alter or modify in the least degree.

THE PLEBISCITE IN ROME.

THE capture of Rome by the royal Italian army, on the 22d day of September, was followed on the 2d of October, by the Plebiscite, or universal voting of the population upon the question of their political union with the rest of Italy. Universal suffrage almost prevailed in all the municipal districts of the capital city, and in each of the five provinces—forming a territory about two-thirds as long and as broad as Belgium, but containing not more than 600,000 souls. It was therefore possible, with the assistance of the city districts, invited by the provisional government to execute the decree for taking this vote, to collect the votes of Rome almost throughout, to assemble under the banners of the different guilds the tradesmen and workmen, the lawyers, notaries, the sculptors and painters, the musicians, the jewelers, the cabinet-makers, the printers, the barbers, and the domestic servants (numerous in the Italian flag; and that they should march round to visit each district voting-place, where a tent was erected, with the national standard above it, and an urn was provided to deposit the voting-papers. On July 31st the Municipal Council of Rome City, on the right bank of the Tiber, which contains the Vatican, St. Peter's, the Castle of St. Angelo, and the Hospital of Santo Spirito, but not allowed a voting-place of its own, because the Italian government considered this right of self-rule would come to terms, that this district should remain under Papal sovereignty, and not be annexed to the Italian kingdom. But many of the inhabitants of the Leonine City, not belonging to the Papal household or to the Swiss regiment, or to the ecclesiastical institutions there, demanded of the provisional government that they should be allowed to come out and vote together with us on another part of Rome. It was therefore agreed that they should cross the Ponte Sisto, and the Ponte Sisto, and the Ponte Sisto, and

THE NOISE OF A SHELL.

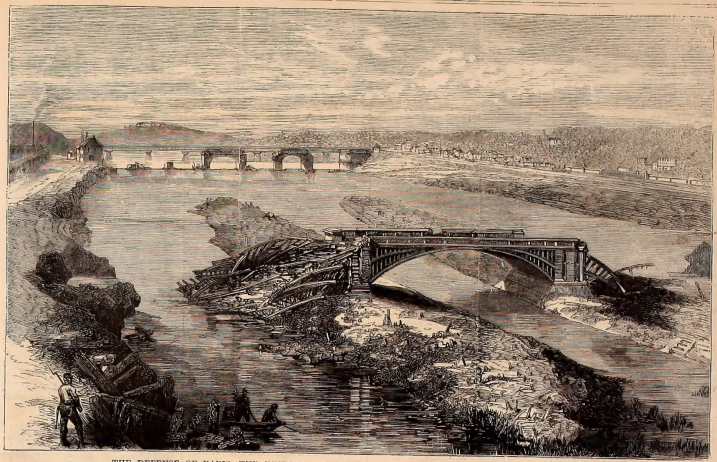
CORRESPONDENTS and artists who accompany armies to the field run full as many risks as those who are actually engaged in fighting. Their vocation compels them to seek the front in order to observe and record, with pen and pencil, the most stirring incidents of the day. The engraving on this page illustrates an artist's visit to the Château Meudon, where in happier times Prince NAPOLEON had collected those treasures of art for which he exhibited a keen zest in his younger days. We give the story in the artist's own words:

"I started on foot for the Château of Meudon, at present held as a Prussian outpost. My way lay through a wood. I passed old women breaking up and carrying off for kindling the branches of trees the French had felled and thrown across the road; boys climbing for sweet chestnuts, which, they told me, now formed a considerable portion of the peasant diet; and several loafers. I came to a picket, whose officer in command sent me with a soldier to his colonel in the château. We passed over a fosse defending a semi-piggledy into the wicker-work. Over one domicile the Sunday hat of the Prince, terribly crushed, and decorated with a peacock's feather, hung triumphant; and the hut was further decorated with a sign-board, on which the soldiers had drawn an elephant, and written 'The Elephant Tavern.' Over another hut stood a stuffed black swan, and this, of course, was the 'Black Swan circular earth-work which the Germans had thrown up in front of the château. Inside of the intrenchment the soldiers had built themselves a wonderful labyrinth of little hovels from gabions made in the adjoining woods. These were adorned most fantastically with the spoils of the château. Magnificent chairs with velvet cushions, and tables in white and gold, stood about. Gilded ornaments were stuck higgledy-Inn.'

"I passed into the château, over which an officer conducted me, and allowed me to peep through the windows that faced Paris and Fort Issy, which were all closely shut for fear of attracting the French fire. A shell had fallen just outside this morning at eight o'clock.

"In the fore-ground was the Prince's garden, cut now right across by a deep trench, its paths and lawn strewn with boards, barrows, and bivouac débris; but one could still tell that it had been a garden from the little oases of flower-beds which still dotted the desert. In the distance lay Paris, with its enceinte and engirdling forts, of which latter we are within range, as I found before long; for, returning to the Black Swan Inn, I sat down and began to make a sketch, the soldiers gathering round me, and I was working away when we heard a bang, a hissing sound overhead, and another bang close outside the earth-work. We all ran for the fascine huts, and when the alarm was over I returned to my sketching. Another bang; away we ran again. The shell burst this time a little short of us. Then we laughed, and I went back to work. The next shell would probably fall right in the middle of our encampment. The direction of the others had been excellent, and the French had only to hit the golden mean in distance to hit us also, in which case our fascine huts would have been but of little service to us. They did not hit it, however, though they fired several times, and each time we ran away to shelter ourselves under the huts."

AT THE PRUSSIAN BARRICADES—THE NOISE OF A SHELL.



THE DEFENSE OF PARIS—THE BRIDGES OF ASNIERES AND CLICHY, ACROSS THE SEINE, DESTROYED.

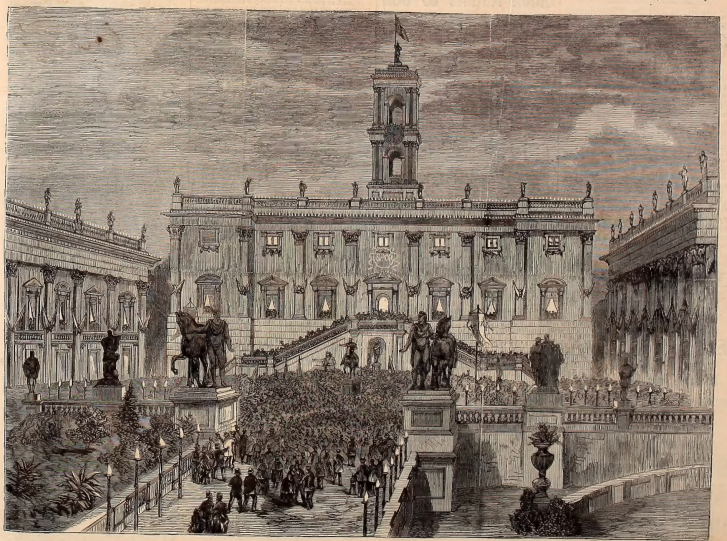
SEINE BRIDGES DESTROYED.

THE defense of Paris has rendered necessary the destruction of some of the finest and most expensive monuments of engineering skill in the vicinity of that city. Bridges, railway viaducts, roads, and embankments, on which years of labor and millions of capital have been expended, were blown up or otherwise destroyed in the attempt to retard the Prussian advance. The engraving on this page will give the reader some idea of the thoroughness with which this work was done. Had it been effectual in any degree the destruction would have been less to be regretted; but the Prussian commanders assert that their march was not delayed more than two or three hours by the obstacles thus placed in their way. Their engineers, supplied with every facility for construction, replaced the bridges, cleared away obstructions, and rebuilt the railroads, almost as fast as they were destroyed.



DECLARING THE RESULT OF THE PLEBISCITE AT ROME.—[SEE PAGE 768.]

THOMAS CARLYLE ON THE WAR.

THE Weimar Gazette publishes a few extracts from a letter written by Mr. Thomas Carlyle, with reference to the wa.. a which he says:

"Your anxieties about the war must have been of short duration; in fact, they must, after the first few days' practical experience, have been changed into bright hope, into a hope increasing in rapid geometrical progression till it obtained its present dimensions. So far as my reading goes there never was such a war, never such a collapse of shameless human vanity, of menacing, long-continued arrogance, into contemptible nothingness. How has fallow-land as it from the hammer of Thor, till it lies like a shapeless heap of ruins, wishing to itself, 'In the name of all the gods and all the devils, what is to become of us?'..... All Germany may now look forward to happier days in a political sense than it has seen since the Emperor Barbarossa left it. My (old-)final satisfaction in all this is great. I got England, I can say all the intelligent in England, heartily wish good fortune to brave old Germany in what it has accomplished—a real transformation into one nation, no longer the chaotic jumble which invited the intrusion of every ill-disposed neighbor, especially of that ill-disposed France which has inflicted on it such interminable mischief during the last four hundred years —wars heaped upon wars without real cause, except insatiable French ambition. All that, through God's grace, is now at an end. I have, in my time, seen nothing in Europe which has so much delighted me. As for the people, as your Goethe calls them, and, as I believe, a peaceful and a virtuous one. I only hope that Germany will send them the wisdom, patience, and pious discretion to turn to a right use all that has been achieved."

NOTICE and rend the Organ advertisement of the Messrs. SMITH, on last page of this paper. —[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"I HAVE used a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine for years, and it has never been a day out of repairs; have sewed the finest cambric and the heaviest overcoating; have used one needle over three years, and indeed never broke but one out of the original stock that I got with the machine, and that was my fault. "Wheeler & Wilson" are our politics for the ladies."— SARAH E. EMSWILER, Peru, Ind.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

LOW PRICES—NO RISK—FULL GUARANTEE. Five Price-List of Genuine NATIONAL WATCHES, which can be sent by Express to any part of the country, write to Howard & Co., 785 Broadway, New York, stating you saw this in Harper's Weekly.—[Com.]

WIDE-AWAKE YOUTH'S PAPER.—For publications editing, select and popular contributors, and sprightly, entertaining reading, the Youth's Companion, of Boston, has no superior among the youths' publications.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TIN-PREVENTS POISONING from LINED tubes. Lead water, and costs but little more than Lead Pipe. It is strong, pure, never needs repairing, is flexible, and as easily soldered. Circulars and sample of pipe sent free. Address THE COLWELLS, SHAW, & WILLARD MFG. CO., 127 Chambers Street, New York.

$55 Sewing Machines for $1.

By paying $1 00 cash and sending a small club of subscribers to that first-class popular family magazine, THE PHILOLOGICAL JOURNAL, you can receive a new GROVER & BAKER FAMILY SEWING MACHINE, price $58 00. Inclose stamp for particulars, or 25 cents for specimen number, with complete list of most liberal premiums. Address

S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

TO THE LADIES

WHO DESIRE TO USE THE

BEST SIX-CORD

Spool Cotton,

FOR

Hand or Machine

SEWING,

BUY

CLARK'S

O.N.T.,

and you will find it

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Cull and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 161 Chatham Square, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address P. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$10 to $25.—Genuine Gentle-Gold Watches. Address Gold Jobs Foreman, MT'y, 79 Nassau St., N.Y.

See what $5 will do!

BOOKS OF THE

GREAT PREMIUM LAND SALE

opened at 177 Broadway, on Monday, Nov. 14th.

PLANTATIONS, FARMS, VILLA SITES, HOMESTEADS, ORCHARDS, VINEYARDS, &c.

Healthy and Delightful Climate.

COUNTRY

HOMES, HEALTH, & HAPPINESS

WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL!

A Premium to every Shareholder. For particulars. Address

PREMIUM LAND SALE OFFICE,

P. O. Box 1439. 177 BROADWAY, New York.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS for VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large size, in volumes containing 200 to 250 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).

" 15. FIDELIO, with the Sole Overtures.

Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.

" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.

Jan. 1. MARTHA.

" 15. IL TROVATORE

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers in the States, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond Street, New York.

CARTWRIGHT & WARNER'S

PATENT MERINO

UNDER-VESTS,

DRAWERS,

AND

HOSIERY.

A LARGE VARIETY OF NEW STYLES,

AT

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Union Adams & Co.,

No. 637 Broadway.

BLEES'

Noiseless,

Lock-Stitch

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine, or send for specimen and circulars.

623 BROADWAY, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club will be organized in it, with full directions, making a large saving to customers and remunerative to club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

SELF-LIGHTING

KEROSENE LAMPS

Electricity utilized. No more need of Matches. Every kind of Kerosene Lamp now in use may be instantaneously lighted without the application of Fire or removing the glass chimney, by applying our Automatic Attachment. In use by R. H. CO.'s, Churches, and prominent Hotels, safe, sure, and cheap. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1 00 per dozen, by the AUTOMATIC LAMP LIGHTER WORKS, 232 Pearl St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material it costs, paying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens of type, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 32 Murray Street, New York.

ESTB. 1835. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' SAPOLIO,

For General

Household purposes

IS BETTER AND CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are opening

A MOST MAGNIFICENT ASSORTMENT

of

REAL LACE GOODS, consisting of

POINT LACE COLLARS, SETS,

HANDKERCHIEFS, BARBES, COIFFURES,

CAPES, PELERINES, JACKETS, AND SHAWLS.

Also,

A SUPERB LINE

OF

REAL BLACK THREAD LACE SHAWLS,

JACKETS, AND CAPES.

BLACK THREAD, BLACK GUIPURE, POINT GAZE, POINT APPLIQUE, AND VALENCIENNES TRIMMING LACES,

BY THE

LARGEST ASSORTMENT

ever offered

in this country.

These Goods, having been purchased at panic prices in Europe, will be offered, in many instances,

FIFTY PER CENT. BELOW FORMER COST.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

THE BEST INVESTMENT IN THE WORLD!

BEAUTIFUL BUILDING LOTS,

FROM $60 UPWARD,

PAYABLE $10 MONTHLY,

IN

LINDEN PARK, STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.,

Only 40 Minutes from New York City.

The Linden Park Lot Association offer to the public, at private sale,

900 SPLENDID BUILDING LOTS, surrounding and in the immediate vicinity of Linden Park Depot.

Over 700 Lots have been sold since last June.

Linden Park is the First Station on the Staten Island Railroad, only 9 miles from New York City.

The Lots offered for sale embrace the Second Subdivision of the well-known BURGHER FARM. The prices, according to location, range from $60 upward, payable $10 month, without interest.

Title perfect. Warranty Deeds. Immediate possession. Four new cottages will be donated to Lot Owners. The streets are graded. Lots staked and numbered as per map, and ready for immediate improvement. 30 cents saved daily will pay for a $100 Lot in 12 Months. For pamphlets, maps, price-lists, &c., apply to

LINDEN PARK LOT ASSOCIATION,

37 PARK ROW (World Building), N. Y.

All orders by mail will be promptly attended to.

PATENT

IMPROVED

REFLECTORS,

for

ILLUMINATING

CHURCHES,

HALLS,

THEATRES,

STORES,

AND

SHOW WINDOWS.

Increase the Light Your gold.

Send for Circular.

PETTIT BROS. & CO.,

283 Pearl St., N.Y.

MINER'S NEW YORK PUBLICATIONS!

THE RURAL AMERICAN, a large Illustrated Eight-page Weekly, the BEST Agricultural, Horticultural, and general Family Weekly in this country. Price, $2 50 in Clubs of Ten Subscribers.

"MINER'S WEEKLY," the BEST Illustrated Literary and Story Paper, for families not interested in Agriculture or Horticulture, that has ever been published. Price, $2 50 in Clubs of Ten.

MINER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, a large Illustrated Monthly, 32 columns, Publication of rare interest. Price, $1 50 per annum.

Club Agents wanted.—Large cash commission.—Seventy-five Dollars for 100 subscribers!—Splendid Monthly and Weekly Premiums for only twenty-five subscriptions!—One hundred other Premiums on equal terms.—Twenty years in the business.—Our Weeklies equal in contents to the $3 papers!—Subscribers for 1871 get papers for Half Year.—One Sample 10 cts., two 15 cts., or all 20 cts., with an elegant 50-ct. engraving Free! Or sample of any one paper, with premium, Free. Published in New York, with Editorial Office at New Brunswick, N. J., where letters are to be sent, addressed to T. R. MINER & CO.

Club Agents wanted.—Large cash commission.—Seventy-five Dollars for 100 subscribers!—Splendid Monthly and Weekly Premiums for only twenty-five subscriptions!—One hundred other Premiums on equal terms.—Twenty years in the business.—Our Weeklies equal in contents to the $3 papers!—Subscribers for 1871 get papers for Half Year.—One Sample 10 cts., two 15 cts., or all 20 cts., with an elegant 50-ct. engraving Free! Or sample of any one paper, with premium, Free. Published in New York, with Editorial Office at New Brunswick, N. J., where letters are to be sent, addressed to T. R. MINER & CO.

THE METRIC SYSTEM,

Considered with reference to its introduction into the United States,

With the Views of

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS & SEN JOHN HERSCHEL.

By CHARLES DAVIES, LL.D.

Price, $1 50, postpaid.

A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 & 113 William St., N. Y.

☞ On Receipt of One Dollar We will Mail to you the most acceptable gift to a Young Lady.

LORING'S BOX OF HOME NOTE PAPER, French or English, Stamped with her Initial.

Address LORING, Publisher,

36 School Street, Boston, Mass.

COBNS CURED WITHOUT PAIN FOR 25 CENTS, by the JAPANESE CORN FILE. Sold at all Druggists', Shoe, and Notion Stores. Sent, sealed on receipt of price. Agents wanted. Liberal Inducements. Depot, 24 Grand Street, New York.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

1871.

Now is the Time to Subscribe.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

FOR 1871.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and timely amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—The Albany Press.

Each number of Harper's publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

The best publication of its class in America; and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collection of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveller.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to literature, art, science, and instruction, in just the agreeable, compassionate, and interesting degree calculated to please every mother's wife and every heart will require every son, husband, and lover to be a subscriber. It is the model weekly.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter, mother or sweetheart. Better money was never paid. No paper published has so delighted the hearts of women. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the cost in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

☞ Neu Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1871, for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00

HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either THE MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, or six remittance; or, Six Copies for $20, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for THE MAGAZINE 24 cents a number; for the WEEKLY and BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will be entered to begin with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the first Number of the next current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the Subscription is to be sent by mail, both the old and new must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be restored without loss to the sender.

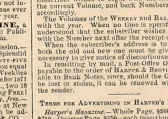
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $600; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $126—each insertion; or, for a less space, 80 cents a line.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, 75 cents per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



STEEL PENS.

American Branch of House,

91 JOHN ST., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PRESS, PHILOLOGICAL JOURNAL, and either of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $5. by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

To the Retail Merchants of the U.S.

Call for the WRIGHT MANUFACTURING CO.'S
ALPACA BRAIDS
in the following Celebrated Brands, and buy no other.
Stearns' Gold Band—warranted full 8 yards.
Stearns' X and XX—
Stearns' XXX—in Nos. 29, 40, 60, 72, 81, and 85.
The Finest and Best ever Made in this Country.
Wright Mfg. Co.'s Best Crown Alpaca—6 yards.
" " " Oriental Alpaca—
" " " Popular Nos. 29, 40, 55, 60, 72, 81, and 85.
" " " Mikado and Fancy Plaid Braids.
For Sale by all Dealers who keep the Best Quality.
A. W. STEARNS, Treasurer,
LAWRENCE, MASS.

Nasby's Paper.

THE TOLEDO BLADE.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the World, choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor, Agricultural Matters, Commercial and Financial Intelligence, Reports of Markets, &c. &c. Special Publishers' Department, an Agricultural Department, a Religious Department, and a Commercial Department, all prepared expressly for the BLADE, rendering it the most complete and perfect Family Newspaper published any where.

The Nasby Letters!

These inimitable Letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued in its columns during the year. Oppression, wrong, and corruption, wherever found, are exposed by the trenchant pen of the great humorist. "The Nasby Letters" are distinguished statesmen," "have done more toward the overthrow of the cause of slavery than any of the government, and have called forth more public plaudits among the people, than all the speeches published or ever made."

ORIGINAL STORIES.

The first week in March, 1871, we will commence the publication of a charming original story, written expressly for the BLADE, by one of the most popular writers in the country. The high reputation of the author warrants us in promising our readers a story of surpassing beauty and interest. Other stories by distinguished writers will be published during the year.

Remember that the BLADE is a truly National Newspaper—not a paper for those living in the State where it is issued, or the South alone, but for The Whole Country.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten or more, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club of ten.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and let some friend know by mail the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes published in HARPER'S BAZAR. Each pattern is in a single piece. These Patterns are designed by Mlle. Pocahontas, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy. Full directions and explanations for putting together and trimming each separate garment of the Pattern, to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

WAITEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ...No. 21
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT..... " 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS..... " 30
PUFFED-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS..... " 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT..... " 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 44
HIGH-WAISTED TRAINED SUIT..... " 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 49

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY CENTS each SUIT MEASURE. The same Pattern can scale ones be sold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Suits will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of the desired Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THEA-NECTAR
AS A TONIC
IS A PERFECT
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.

CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics, and for producing sleep. Price 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Send for Circular containing medical indorsements. T. DE WITT VARNUM, Proprietor, 21 Barclay St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class instruments, including Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, or will take from $4 to $10 monthly until paid.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.
Overcoats, $6.
Overcoats, $8.
Overcoats, $10.
Overcoats, $15.
Overcoats, $20.
Overcoats, $25.
Overcoats, $30.
Overcoats, $35.
Overcoats, $40.
Overcoats, $45.

FREEMAN & BURR'S
CLOTHING
WAREHOUSES.

FREEMAN & BURR'S stock is of unparalleled extent and variety. It embraces Suits, Overcoats, and Clothing of every description, for all ages, and all classes and occasions.

ORDERS BY LETTER.—The easy and accurate system for Self-Measure introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables parties in any part of the country to order Clothing from this establishment with certainty of receiving the most perfect fit attainable.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Samples of Goods, Price-List, and Fashion Sheet SENT FREE on application.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.
Winter Suits, $12.
Winter Suits, $15.
Winter Suits, $20.
Winter Suits, $30.
Winter Suits, $40.
Winter Suits, $50.
Boys' Suits, $6.
Boys' Suits, $8.
Boys' Suits, $12.
Boys' Suits, $18.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED
BY CONNOISSEURS
TO BE THE ONLY
GOOD Sauce,
and applicable to
EVERY VARIETY
OF
DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soup, Fish, Hot and Cold Meats, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations. LEA & PERRINS' Sauce

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 80 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

$3 Watch! $3 Watch!
THE GREAT EUROPEAN
Eureka Aluminum-Gold Watch Co.
HAVE APPOINTED
J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., JEWELERS,
561 Broadway, New York,
SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U. S.,

And have authorized them to sell their great EUREKA ALUMINUM-GOLD WATCH at $3 each, and to warrant each and every one to keep correct time for one year. Either will be guaranteed to be the best and cheapest time-keeper that is now in use in any part of the globe. They are of the same size, shape, and finish of Gold's size, and are beautifully closed. The cases are made of the best rolled gold, and the dials of Pure Aluminum Gold. It is the case color of Gold, which will not change in any climate. The Eureka Watch is so simple as to enable any one to set it correctly, but the Aluminum Gold being one-fourth lighter. The works are all made by machinery, the same as the best Swiss and American Watch. We pack the Watch safely in a small box and send it by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $3 00; fifty cents for packing and postage. A key is sent free with each Watch. Watches will be sent by Post-Office Money Order or in a Registered Letter. Address all orders and communications to

J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., Jewelers,
561 Broadway, New York.

"COMING TO THE PARSON,"

A Group of Stationy by John Gilbert, is now ready for delivery at this office.

This and other groups, with the Wedding Presents or Confirmation Gifts delivered, with all expenses charged only at my point cast of Chicago. Catalogues of 200 pages sent free. Orders will be sent west of Chicago by express, a discount allowed in compensation. Address for Illustrated Catalogue, JOHN ROGERS, Lock Box 1,013, Boston.

JOHN ROGERS, 212 Fifth Ave., New York.

A MUSICAL BOX for $2.

THE French great sensation: novelty, cheapness, and durability; highly polished case, metallic tongues, brilliant in tone, of the best construction, and will play any number of tunes. Agents wanted. Eight active agents are wanted in this city; permanent room table. Guaranteed of the best workmanship and performance. Illustrated circular free. No. 1, 3 tunes, $7. No. 8, 14 tunes, $8; No. 4, 24 tunes, $9; No. 5, 36 tunes, $10; No. 6, 48 tunes, $12. Send for illustrated catalogue, with list of tunes. Try none other. Address F. M. BIRCH & SON, 37 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED

AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through his Agents, some of the most valuable books and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the demand great, more Agents having the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business may address for further particulars, A. J. FIELD,
Care of HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 Pearl St., New York.

$9000
of the PATRONS' FUND of Fourth Series now ready for Distribution. For a List of the Numbers drawn, address THE WASHINGTON MEDALLION FEN CO., 11 College Place, N. Y.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS.
F. E. SUIRE & CO.
Wholesale Druggists,
N. W. COR. FOURTH & VINE STREETS,
CINCINNATI, OHIO.
New York Depot, . . 18 Dey St.

WINTER EMPLOYMENT
PERKINS & HOUSE'S PATENT
NON-EXPLOSIVE METALLIC KEROSENE LAMP

Is absolutely safe from explosion or breaking; burns no fluid but pure refined coal oil; gives more light, no odor, and costs less than gas.

It is perfectly simple, and the light is better than is produced by any other lamp."—W. S. Clark, President Massachusetts Agricultural College.

It is perfectly non-explosive, gives a brighter light and is more economical than gas."—Prof. Chas. A. Seely, H. Write, late Superintendent Public Schools, Chicago.

The appalling deaths and frem fiem glass impregnated lamps and fluids create a great demand for this lamp. It PAYS to sell it. The people like the lamp and will have it. Agents will find it the most profitable article ever offered for sale. Send for circular and terms to Montgomery & Co., Cleveland, O., or 27 Barclay Street, New York.

Wanted Agents
$75 to $250 per month, every where, and to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. The Machine will stitch, hem, fell, gather, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $25. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 in gold to any person who will produce a machine we cannot excel, under the same price. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

WESTERN Wanted
Local Agents Wanted.

I want a local agent in every town and county in the United States, to engage in the WESTERN WORLD. A Magnificent Premium Steel Engraving to every subscriber. From $1 to $5 per day can be made in any locality. Liberal cash commission allowed. Send stamp for Specimens and Price Circular.

JAMES R. ELLIOTT, Boston, Mass.

50,000 Boys and Girls

WANTED, one in every neighborhood, to act as agent for our Rubber Stamps. Do you want to earn a good, honest and useful article. Good pay in cash, and permanent employment for three months. Send stamp for particulars to

JOHN B. ALDEN & CO., Chicago, Ill.

$500 PER WEEK

Can be made by parties who are willing to work, without interfering with other business. Address JAMES ROOD & CO., 626 Broadway, N. Y.

$1500 A YEAR.

WANTED AGENTS to sell the Universal Family Sewing Machine, which is in long by 8 in height, of great capacity and durability; makes the elastic lock stitch. Price, complete, $15 00; sent C. O. D. Address Universal S. M. Co., 25 Broomfield St., Boston, Mass.

WANTED AGENTS
to sell the Universal Family Sewing Machine, which is in long by 8 in height, of great capacity and durability; makes the elastic lock stitch. Price, complete, $15 00; sent C. O. D. Address Universal S. M. Co., 25 Broomfield St., Boston, Mass.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Don't fail to send for circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. Spencer, Brattleboro, Vt.

$10 A DAY—
Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address C. E. RAND & CO., Detroit, Mich.

$25 A DAY!
40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. Address C. M. LININGTON, Mt. Vernon, Me.

WATCH FREE, and $30 a day ever, and no humbug. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE FISHERIES.
NEWS, SKINNER, LINES, Seines, Twines, sutable for Export, Home Trade, Lake, or Sea Fishing. Best sale to trade by PERKINS & HOUSE, 27 Barclay St., New York. 61 Commercial St., Boston. Samples and prices by mail.

OXYGENIZED AIR,
a cure for Scrofula, Catarrh, and Consumption. Send address for Pamphlet to Dr. C. BLOOD, Boston, Mass.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
Rev. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N. J.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE LAW THIRD EDITION, dated July 15, 1870, together with the Act Imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Instructions and Notes. Compiled by HENRY E. DAWSON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

LITERARY SELECTIONS for the Students of the Normal College for Young Ladies, of the City of New York. Printed by Authority of the Board of Education. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

WILSON'S INTERMEDIATE FIFTH READER: on the Original Plan of the School and Family Series. Containing, with the Principles of Elocution, Gymnastic Exercises, Prose, Oratory, as applied to both Prose and Poetry. The whole embracing the Science of Elocutionary Instruction. By MARCUS WILSON. 12mo, $1 40.

FRENCH'S MENTAL ARITHMETIC; combining a Complete System of Rapid Computation, with Correct Logic of the Solutions of Problems and the Analyses of Processes. By JOHN H. FRENCH, LL.D. 18mo, 50 cents.

HARPER'S SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. From An Anglo-Saxon Point of View. By DAVID B. SCOTT. Maps and Engravings. 18mo, $1 50.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON GRAMMAR. A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language in which its Forms are Illustrated by those of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Old English, Old Frisic, Old Norse, and Old High-German. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College; Author of "A Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "A Parser and Analyzer for Beginners," "An Anglo-Saxon Reader," &c. &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON READER; with Philological Notes, Brief Grammar, and a Vocabulary. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, and Author of "A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In two Volumes. Each Volume complete. Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He Was Right," &c. &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IT ONLY ROUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH OF THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VITIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Bayard's Heroine," "Rathboro," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A DANGEROUS GUEST. By the Author of "Gilbert Rugge," "Ursula's Love Story," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Arthur Hughes. In two Volumes, 12mo, Cloth. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $40 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful invention. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

AGENTS WANTED, in every section of the United States, to sell the History of the Battle between France and Prussia, by L. P. Brockett, M.D. Over 500 pages, profusely illustrated. Low priced. Sample sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1 50. Send for Circular. Address GAYLORD BROS. & CO., Bookseller, 10 Beekman Street, New York.

A HUMOROUS PHILOSOPHER! Photograph Album, holding 30 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 75 cents. 2 for $1. Catalogues and circulars free. Address C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

$30 PER WEEK.—Agents wanted in every town. Address, for particulars, C. W. ERNEST, Box 5,001, New York.

$60 A WEEK paid Agents in a new business. Address, with stamp, SHAW & CO., Chicago.

$240 PER MONTH to Agents. 15 entirely new articles, staple as flour. Samples free. S. M. LINDSLEY, 58 Nassau St., New York.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Don't fail to send for circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. Spencer, Brattleboro, Vt.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address C. E. RAND & CO., Detroit, Mich.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. Address C. M. LININGTON, Mt. Vernon, Me.

WATCH FREE, and $30 a day ever, and no humbug. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE FISHERIES.
NEWS, SEINES, LINES, Twines, suitable for Export, Home Trade, Lake, or Sea Fishing. Best sale to trade by PERKINS & HOUSE, 27 Barclay St., New York. 61 Commercial St., Boston. Samples and prices by mail.

OXYGENIZED AIR,
a cure for Scrofula, Catarrh, and Consumption. Send address for Pamphlet to Dr. C. BLOOD, Boston, Mass.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
Rev. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N. J.

ONCE MORE.

GRAND SACHEM. "There, my little man, you shall sit in your high chair once more, if you are a good boy, and mind me as you always have done. What will you have to play with? Your Stuffed Ballot Box or your Tammany Catechism?"

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

REMOVAL.

TIFFANY & CO.,

Having REMOVED to their new building,

Union Square, New York,

Now offer a New Stock of Fine Bronzes, Clocks, Mantel Sets, Paris Fancy Goods.

CHOICE

London & Vienna Leather Goods,

Selected Expressly for their Opening.

Diamonds & other Precious Stones.

WATCHES.

Also, NEW STYLES IN FINE JEWELRY AND ARTICLES OF STERLING SILVER-WARE, OF THEIR OWN MAKE, NOW FIRST EXHIBITED.

THE IMPROVED WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE

for stamina, utility, durability & beauty stands alone! For stitch, hemming, tucking, quilting, binding, gathering and sewing so simple a child can operate it. County in the United States where we have not already employed. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND A WATCH.

AND NOT WEAR IT OUT.

Ask your watchmaker for it. Sample sent by mail for 50 cents. J. S. BIRCH & CO., 9 Maiden Lane.

N.

Robes de Chambre AND House Coats, FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.

E. A NEWELL,

727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

New Improvements, prices reduced. Received highest honors that could be given by ONE THOUSAND PROMINENT MUSICIANS. Awarded MEDAL at PARIS EXPOSITION, over SEVENTY-FIVE others. Prices, $50 to $1000. ☞ A new Illustrated Circular just ready, and sent free. WAREROOMS, 596 Broadway, NEW YORK; 154 Tremont St., BOSTON.

THE FREEMASON FOR 1871.

The largest Masonic monthly in the world. Contains tidings from the Craft in all parts of the globe.

It is strictly cosmopolitan, and is the organ of the Craft every where, and not confined to any one State or locality.

Each member complete in itself.

Sample copies sent free.

Every Master Mason in good standing authorized to act as agent in sending subscriptions. A discount made to this agents if desired, and in all cases a copy sent free to such agents, if notified.

CLUB RATES.

Clubs of Ten to Twenty	$1 80
Clubs of Twenty to Fifty	1 75
Clubs of Fifty or more	1 25
Single Subscribers	2 00

Address GEO. FRANK GOULEY, St. Louis, Mo.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S

PURE CALIFORNIA BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy. Free from all adulterations and substitutes of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

Farnham, Gilbert, & Co., BANKERS,

No. 8 Wall Street, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the wonderful, makes the "lock stitch," (alike on both sides), not a ruffle nor rewarl. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHN G. CLARK & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; Nashua, N. H.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

AGENTS WANTED $222 A MONTH by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

NEW YORK.

Hatter and Furrier,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,

719 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.

LADIES' FINE FURS.

Seal Sacques, $75, $90, $100.

Astrakhan Sacques, $35, $45, $50.

IMPORTER OF

ENGLISH HATS FOR GENTLEMEN WEAR.

E VV AA NN S' S' S'

PRICES for the BEST-MADE FALL and WINTER CLOTHING in New York.

OVERCOATS.

$10, $13, $13 50, $15, $16, $18, $20, $22, $24, $27, $28.

REEFING JACKETS.

$6 00, $7 00, $8 00, $9 00, $10 00, $11 00, $12 00.

WINTER SUITS.

$14 00, $16 50, $18 00, $21 00, $23 00, $25, $27, $30.

PANTS.

Fashionable Stripes, $5 00, $7 00, $8, $8 50, $9, $9 50.

In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

"OUR POPULAR SHIRTS,"

MADE TO ORDER FROM BEST MATERIALS, AND WARRANTED TO FIT.

Sent by express, C. O. D., to any part of the country, at the following rates:

6	Shirts, Good Muslin and Linen Fronts	$6 00
6	" Better Muslin and Good Linen	7 50
6	" Masonville Muslin and Fine Linen	9 00
6	" Wamsutta Muslin and Very Fine Linen	12 00
6	" New York Mills and Better Linen	15 00

RICHARD MEARES,

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS,

68th Avenue & 19th St., N. Y.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S

CHALLENGE SAUCE

Pronounced by Connoisseurs TO BE

BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,

AND

SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.

For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.

Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

Engines, Tools, Machinery, &c.,

FOR SALE,

THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,

FOOT OF EAST 12TH ST., N. Y.

Commencing

ENGINES, PLANERS, LATHES,

SMITHS' AND MOULDER-MAKERS' TOOLS.

And Machinery and Patterns of the most approved kind, &c., &c., &c. Also,

6 HIGH-PRESSURE ENGINES, partly finished;

2 STEVENSON'S PATENT TURBINE WATER-WHEELS, 60-inch diameter; and

1 MARINE BEAM ENGINE, 60-in. by 10-ft. stroke.

JNO S. SCHULTZE,

Receiver of the Novelty Iron Works.

☞ Send for Catalogue.

New York, May 29, 1870.

MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICONS

Of every description, and the largest collection of Slides in the United States. Send for a Catalogue.

W. MITCHELL BALLANTYNE,

724 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

DOOLEY'S THE YEAST BEST POWDER

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.

PRINTING. DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Printing Machines of all kinds, from $11 to $200. Send for circular.

Printer Manuf'g Co., 14 Kilby St., Boston, Mass.

THE HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

contains in every number five complete stories, and a large amount of Household and Ornamental Literature. $50 each to be awarded for prize clubs. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

Messrs. S. D. & H. W. SMITH,

MANUFACTURERS OF

The American Organ, would inform the public that, while they are endeavoring with the best light they have to sustain the reputation of their instruments, and to make them in every way more attractive, they

DID NOT INVENT

the PIPES OF PAN—not even the REMOVABLE; nor did they serve an apprenticeship with TEMAS CARY, "instructor of every artificer in brass and iron."

They have, however, "voiced" organ reeds with a nicety that others have been glad to imitate, not equal, for a great many years, and long before any rival firm in this part of the world had puzzled over the process.

The fortunate person that has in late years "invented" the "voicing" of reeds, as has been absurdly claimed, must have accomplished a feat like that of the witty "ARTOCRAT," who, in speaking of picturesque and out-of-the-way nooks in Boston, says that he saw the original discoverer of Myrtle Street!

Although the Messrs. Smith have no

PATENTED NOVELTIES

to offer, they beg leave to state that they, many years ago, originated the "IMPROVED TUBE BOARD" and "RESONANT AIR CHAMBER," now pressed into service as "novelties" elsewhere.

The value of these improvements is now fully attested by the efforts of others to filch the credit.

Every essential element of the Reed Organ is now open to the use of every builder. There is no secret nor mystery—nothing but thorough, intelligent, artistic work. "Patented Improvements" are "apriages to catch woodcocks."

The American Organ contains all the valuable features known for combined in reed instruments.

Having the longest experience of any Eastern House, and possessing unsurpassed advantages for manufacture, the Messrs. Smith solicit the most rigid comparison in regard to Tone, Solidity of Construction, and External Elegance.

Desirous of meeting the popular demand for a Good Instrument at a Low Price, they have made a few New Styles, with all solid excellences, and in cases of

New and Tasteful Designs,

At prices ranging from $100 to $200.

☞ These instruments can not be surpassed by any of their class, either in quality or beauty.

 An elegantly illustrated Circular, containing descriptions and cuts of over 30 styles, will be sent, postpaid, on application.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO., 394 Bowery, N. Y.

150,000 Acres of Land For Sale.

The McGREGOR AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY offer 150,000 acres of land for sale, at $5 to $10 per acre, in lots of forty acres and upward, situated in the counties of Howard, Cerro Gordo, Kossuth, Hancock, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, and Lyon, in Northern Iowa, on the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul, McGregor, and Missouri River, and the Des Moines Valley Railroads. SOIL, rich, black loam. LANDS, high, rolling prairie, not subject to overflow. WATER abundant. TITLE from the U. S. Government. TERMS—7 per cent. per annum interest and 10 per cent. per annum of the principal; or, if the purchaser improves the land, no payments for two years is required except the taxes. CLIMATE, the best in the world.

For Maps, Pamphlets, or other information, apply to E. PALMER, Agent, Algona, Kossuth County, Iowa.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

100 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 ..... Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

Non-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, Fruit Culture, Household Affairs, Useful Arts, mailed Free.

DRICED AND ILLUSTRATED MANUALS on the Fine Arts, Industries sent free:

Part I.—Mechanical Instruments, 113 pages.

Part II.—Optical Instruments, 94 pages.

The following on receipt of 10 cents:

Part III.—Magic Lanterns and Stereopticons, 68 pages.

Part IV.—Philosophical Instruments, 94 pages.

JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia: 8 Dey St., New York, P. O. Box 4910.

8000 BOOKS is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents. A pamphlet on Catarrh free. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, No. 178 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

"THE LITERARY WORLD" is Six-teen Page Monthly Review of all leading New Books: Literary News: a complete Monthly List of American Publications. FIFTY CENTS PER YEAR. Sample Copies, Six Cents.

S. R. CROCKER, Publisher, 82 Bromfield St., Boston.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM PIPE GOODS.

Amber, Repairing and Boiling.

Retail: Store, 687 Broadway, N. Y., middle of the block.

Send for Circular.

SUPPLEMENT TO HARPER'S WEEKLY.

To accompany VOL. XV., No. 726.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 26, 1870. [Gratuitous.

THE DESTRUCTION OF ST. CLOUD.

THE destruction of the magnificent palace of St. Cloud by the French is referred to by the German papers as affording a justification for the impending bombardment of Paris. It occurred in this manner. On the 13th of October, at 1 P.M., a garrison of Mont Valerien began firing grenades at the palace. The building was immediately set on fire and burned to the ground, nothing being left but the bare walls. The Parisians were ordered to save the furniture, books, paintings, and historical relics for which the palace was so celebrated; but the bombardment being continued, notwithstanding the flames burst out on all sides, little was preserved.

Among the few things saved is the table on which the Emperor Napoleon III. signed the declaration of war against Prussia. Some furniture, books, and works of art which could be hastily snatched out of the conflagrating element were carried to one of the magnificent alleys at the back of the palace, where they remained a day or two, prior to removal to more spacious quarters. Had the destruction of an edifice so intimately associated with the history of France been the consequence of an attack on the part of the Prussians, they would have been charged with the crime of causing irreparable loss. As it is, the artillery men on Mont Valérien are alone responsible for what occurred.

The ruins were visited soon after the bombardment by the correspondent of the London Times. His account of their appearance is subjoined:

"After a long ride we entered the park of St. Cloud. The sentries in the avenue at once ceased hiding behind the huge trees. Turn sharp into side walk just as the vision of an earth-work, surmounted by a portion of a fort of the first house of Paris, comes in sight at the end of the avenue; ride in single file; get a view of what was the Lantern of Diogenes—it is now a heap of white rubbish. The French must have had exciting practice at the batteries, as it was the only new object, but the avenue made it a kind of white bull's-eye bounded by dark green. And there lies the memorial toy of Napoleon III.'s private study, the bronze model of the Colosseum, with its minute mass of shattered stones. Turn to the left, down a gentle slope. There are some people living under the trees; the tents—the first Prussian tents I have seen—of a strong infantry guard and a cavalry picket gleam through the dark trunks of the forest. It is all so quiet that we might be going to picnic. Here are the ruins in the wood, out on the grand avenue. Here are deep scores in the ground, holes, and furrows in the grass. These have a connection with the iron, deftly ornamented with brass knobs on the sides, cast on the ground in front of it. It is only a 100-pound shell which has not burst. See, there is another, and there. This must be a hot corner, right in the line of fire. The trunk of one of horsemen instantly quicken their pace. A shell—100-pounder—bursting here would be unpleasant. Another moment and there are fountains which do not play, garnished by statues, gardens, and terraces, with the broken pieces of water girt with trees—the Prince Imperial's play-ground. And then a basin with flights of steps and guarded by statues of nymphs. Was such a ruin! I could not believe it. All that remained of 42 suits of rooms for guests, for other rooms, stabling for 237 horses, and barracks for 2000 men," as the guide-book says, was a tall, gaunt, white wall—the wall opposite to the places where the fire and smoke rushed outside and licked the masonry as it had done never saw such a complete destruction. Bare walls and chimneys alone stood; the fire still smouldering, and a dazzling heat came from the heated mass inside; but so clean is the work that I could look right through the place and see Paris beyond in the opposite window-glass. Here was all that was left of the favorite retreat of the great Emperor—a palace that was unique in France for historical interest; the scene of the 18th Brumaire, of the inspection of the 14th of May, 1804, of the receipt of the Senatus Consultum of the 7th of November, 1852; where Henry III. was murdered, and Henry IV. and Louis died, where Peter the Great was received by the Regent, where Charles X. signed the fatal ordonnes, where the capitulation of Paris was signed in 1815, where Napoleon III. received Queen Victoria in 1855, where the declaration of war against Prussia was signed in 1870; decorated by the hands and works of Mignard, Le Moyne, Coypel, Boucher, David; rich in marble pieces of painting, tapestry, sculpture, art—a smoking Karnak of to-day. A few guns scored a few boots, some furniture, clocks, a fine bust of Napoleon, and the like, which were saved, at the hazard of their lives, by the Prussians. Count Seckendorff was sent off to ascertain if the picture of the Queen's arrival at Calais was saved. It is gone, and so are all the pictures. The books are stored in a gardener's house. They bear fleurs-de-lis, kingly crowns, imperial eagles, and bees and N's indifferently. I took up one. It was Vol. I. of Thiers' Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire, Paris, Furne, Jouvet et Cie., Libraires-Editeurs, Rue Saint-Andrédes-Arcs du 2 Décembre,' Chaix, Paris. Another near it was 'Pichot, Voyage en Terre de Moabi.' Most interesting of all, a copy of the Moniteur Universel, with the dispatches of Napoleon before Waterloo, his account of the defeat of the Prussians at Fleurus, and the dispatch after Waterloo.

"The officer in command at St. Cloud told me he had strict orders to let no one approach the ruins of the castle, for if a moving speck were seen the French fired at once, and sent showers of stones flying out of the hot walls. What a story, to be sure! I know of nothing like it. Castles and theatres seem to be built that they may be burned. There is no such deed, I think, recorded as the destruction of a palace by the people to whom it belonged merely because they fancied the enemy might be raising a battery behind it. The shell which fell through the Emperor's bed, about 11 o'clock, began the mischief. Smoke issued from the room, and a flight of bombs coming in quick succession rendered all successful effort to extinguish the flames, which in high wind soon became a furnace. Well, it be said that the Prussians burned the palace? I dare say thousands in Paris will believe they did. Meudon is now crumbling away. The French are naturally jealous of any communication building being erected if they thought it conspience's castle or a peasant's mill. I am told that a complete underground electric telegraph was discovered in one of the cellars at Versailles. Underground passages too have been discovered running from the interior of Paris into the open. The days and doings of Mrs. Radcliffe's heroes, and of the persons of the 'Castle of Otranto,' and of the 'Old English Baron' are revived in strange uses and associations. For days the unconscious French were sending messages which were 'tapped' by the Prussians, to no great use, as they were generally in cipher. There have been successful fishing in the Seine for telegraphic wires. Some codes of signals have also been discovered, impossible for me to say if it be the investment of a capital containing 2,000,000 of people by an army which is numerically inferior to the force of the besieging army. That is a reversal of all military principles."

THE PRUSSIANS IN STRASBURG.

MAJOR VON W——, a Prussian officer belonging to the army before Strasburg, was the first to enter that city after the capitulation. On the morning of the 27th of September he was ordered to report at eight o'clock to General Von Werder, in Strasburg. With an orderly and four men he made his way into the city without much difficulty, though the streets were full of threatening demonstrations, and soon reached the quarters of General Von W——, the text of the story is given in the Major's own words:

"Leaving two of my men to watch the door, I proceeded with the other two into the corridor. There was no sentinel, but a few subalterns and a groom. Turning to the latter, I asked, 'Wohnt Ulrich?' they politely answered, 'Le Général est dans sa chambre.' I begged to be announced, and, unattended by my two men, entered into his room. Presently one of the adjutants who had met me coming down the stairs, and who had my revolver which I still held in my hand, led me into the presence of General Ulrich. The next moment I found myself face to face with the famous commander who had so gallantly defended the place intrusted to his charge. He is a tall, seven years old, short, thick-set, with gray hair closely cropped, and mustache of the same hue. He has a round face, a kind expression, clear and dark, large, hazel eyes. He regarded me with evident surprise, and perhaps some suspicion, not knowing what to make of me. I duly saluted him, and, mentioning my name and rank, I explained that I was the bearer of a message for self to my superior officer in Strasburg at 8 A.M. The General replied that eleven o'clock was the hour fixed for the meeting of the officers, and that as far as he knew, neither General Von Mertens nor any other Prussian officer had been ordered Strasburg. 'Do you know, my brave commandant,' he continued, 'you are the first Prussian officer who has ever been in these rooms, and I am happy to make the acquaintance of one of the gallant Prussian army.' 'How can I serve you, did you get here?' No one is permitted to enter till eleven o'clock.' I replied that I was proud to have the honor of addressing a general whose gallantry we (the Prussians) had had so much occasion to admire. The General then made personal my hand, and there was a tear in his eye as, half averting his face, he motioned me to sit down on the sofa. He said, as I afterward learned, that certainly not inside the fortress, and as he had no hand left free for preparing for the melancholy ceremony of the morrow, he might as well sit down and smoke and chat together like soldiers. He praised our artillery, and the discipline and steadiness of our men, whom he was pleased to call the heroes of Europe. They had converted Strasburg into a heap of ruins, shattered mountains and bomb-proof erections, making it, in short, impossible for them to hold out against our fire. Then, taking a map of our parallels, on which every one of our guns was accurately marked, he continued: 'I am glad to perceive that the excellence of your cannon that beat me. You will have observed that the parallels on which are quite new; but the best of them is not equal to your worst. At the very outset of the siege I knew you would be victors in the end. I was up in the tower of the Cathedral to observe your movements, when I accidentally met one of you and my suit, opened fire on us. The first shot missed, the second glanced along the edge of the platform on which we stood, and the third force. Then I said to myself that I should not hold Strasburg long against such artillery. It was but yesterday one of your large bombs penetrated a house of six stories from top to bottom, and, falling through into the cellar, killed seventeen persons. We had about fifty killed per day —about 2000, I should say, during the whole siege. And, mon Dieu! what a number of wounded! All the hospitals are full of them. But now, my brave fellow, to breakfast. There is a beef-steak left for the commander of Strasburg. The rest of the city have had to content themselves with horse-flesh for the last fortnight.' Before sitting down to breakfast I requested the General to send messengers to the citadel and the Porte de Saverne to inquire for General Von Mertens. I also begged him to have some bread and wine given to my four brave companions outside, all which suggestions he kindly complied with. At this moment General Decasse and Colonel Gayot, Prussian officers on the staff, came in, and spoke to the commandant. One of my gunners outside availed himself of this opportunity to look in at the open window, and tell me that he and his comrades were on the alert, and would enter the room instead if they thought it necessary. We lunched with two other generals, one adjutant, and the Préfet, M. De Laboulie. Wine is a very common, and comforting, meal. As they all gave toasts, I thought I had better imitate their example, and proposed their happy reunion with their families. Upon which General Ulrich said he had not heard from his wife for five weeks. At last the orderlies he had sent in accordance with my request returned, reporting, 'No Prussians in Strasburg.' It was half past one o'clock by this time, and the General had to leave me. In a touching manner he bade adieu to the other officers, and, fastening on his sword, shook hands with me, saying, 'Pardon my leaving you so abruptly. I must go. I shall remember your name as that of an officer of your nation of a defeated adversary. I shall have much pleasure in making the acquaintance of your General-in-Chief.' With this my amiable entertainer quitted the room, leaving me to my own devices. What was I to do? It was clearly my duty to continue my search for General Von Mertens. Though not in Strasburg, he might be in it, he might have arrived by this time. Forward, then, again with my four men. When we departed from the house the streets were empty. We proceeded in the direction of the citadel, where I was most likely to find the object of my search. In the corridor I found a corner we were confronted by a French regiment of regular infantry, marching in the opposite direction to front. The officers saluted me. I halted with my men, and we resumed their courtesy. The regiments followed. They were fine, well-accoutred troops, marching in a sad, dejected manner. Behind these came a crowd of soldiers, less orderly and military in appearance. They had not received the order to halt, and kept on tiny confusion. Their officers ignored my presence. I was looking at the sorry spectacle presented by the two tumultuous mass, when suddenly one of the men came up to me, and, thrusting his fist into my face, said, 'Take that, you Prussian spy!' The same instant another came up and did the like, striking the butt end of his musket violently on the sole of my foot. I ordered my men to keep quiet, and told the fellows threatening me I was an officer, and that they were liable to be punished for outrages. Though evidently drunk, they desisted. On attempting, however, to pass on in the direction I was my route, I found myself again stopped by an enraged soldier, who, placing himself in my path, and lifting his fist, cried out, 'See you marching with which I have killed so many Prussians! His wife must be deliberately took aim at me. I heard my men behind me presenting their guns likewise, and the chances were that we should all be dead men in a few moments. As a last resource I explained, laughingly, 'My brave fellows, don't shoot! We are friends! We are sworn foes are not loaded!' There was an uncanny sparkle in his eye; but he turned round, and in another moment had his musket on the pavement. It was as though the others had but waited for this signal to do the same. Like roaring, raving maniacs, they smashed their weapons so that the fragments flew about. As far as I could see the infection had spread from rank to rank, each vying with his neighbor who could do it the most effectually. Then, as suddenly as they had resolvent it, even if they had so desired. One of them, addressing me in an excited, urgent voice, said, 'In Heaven's name withdraw with your soldiers; your life is in danger!' I cried, 'March, forward!' and, calling out to the Frenchmen, 'Adieu, mes braves!' rapidly crossed, and we got into a quiet side street, with the wild shouts of the increased suddenly ringing in our ears. Five minutes more and I was in the citadel. There, at length, I saw our belauged again. It was like a sweet vision. The citadel was occupied by a company of the Thirty-fourth: 17,200 men, consisting of Landwehr and Line, were laying down their arms at that moment outside the walls. Still no General Von Mertens. I was to be met, determined to march back to the Commandant, and, a Baden artillery officer with two men, joining me, set out, my men reassured by this important addition to our force. In the more frequented streets we passed through groups of people, some with arms, some, many ones, belts, etc. Four people, mostly women, were picking up the fragments of a musket about. As I crossed the bridge over the ill, a man told me that there were many Chassepots in the river, which I found had cast them. By one o'clock I reached the Commandeur again, and, seating myself in the courtyard, felt like the commandant of the place. At last, after a long delay, a small detachment of our infantry arrived, and took possession of the building. Gradually the streets filled with our troops, cavalry made their appearance, and the familiar tattoo of our drums resounded from all sides. At half past two General Von Mertens, very cordial, I must say I at first thought, rode into the courtyard of the Commandeur. I reported myself as having been engaged for some sixteen years. The General knew nothing whatever of my summons, and on my showing him the written order I had received, promised that the matter should be inquired into forthwith. In the mean time he was good enough to confirm me on my not having been shot, and to evidence his approval, appointed me Garrison-Major of Strasburg."

THE SATAN ROCKET.

M. L—— (says La France), the distinguished civil engineer and chemist, of the Rue de Londres, Paris, has invented a rocket which will be a formidable weapon of defence. He has intrusted it the Juste Satan. We have seen this rocket made, and we will endeavor to describe it to our readers. To the end of an ordinary rocket is attached a very slight receptacle of tin, having exactly the shape of a conical bullet. In this receptacle is arranged a chamber filled with a composition based, we believe, upon saltpetre of carbon, which composition, once lighted, gives out considerable heat. A fuse communicates from this chamber with the top of the rocket. The tin bullet is filled, just before being used, with petroleum oil. The lighted rocket rises in the air, and traversed the space necessary to arrive over a certain spot. Arrived above its object, the composition in the fuse, the composition in the chamber of the bullet takes light, bursts its envelope, and at the same time fires the petroleum, which falls like a sheet of flame, and continues burning. The sheet of flame falls at the rate of about 20 to twenty-four square metres, according to the size of the rocket. No. 1 throws one litre of petroleum, No. 2 two litres, and No. 3 three litres. They can be thrown a distance of six kilometres, and aimed with great precision. The composition by means of a slow match attached to each rocket, which maintains the elevation given to it at the time of its projection. Some interesting experiments were made with this weapon at St. Cloud on the 10th of last month. In less than five minutes a considerable piece of ground was covered with a sea of fire. A combustible, composed of petroleum and gun-cotton, is artillery presided over the experiments, and the general at their head was appalled by the terrible nature of the new engine. Should it be decided to retain the use of rifle upon the Prussian masses, burning every thing, setting light to the cartridges in the soldiers' pouches, even to the ammunition wagons of the artillery. Their rout would be complete. Nothing appears in its report to prevent it in the opinion we civilized nation could make use of these rockets except for exposals; and it would be only in case of the Prussians burning up with petroleum bombs, such as they used at Strasburg, that we should be entitled to retaliate with the new rocket. However this may be, the Committee of National Defense has given the inventor a large building on the Boulevard (formerly a girls' school), and has ordered the immediate manufacture, on a large scale, of Satan rockets. From day to day 200 workmen will be actively employed, and within a few days we shall have a sufficient stock to overwhelm utterly the Prussians in their own coin, if, as at Strasburg, they make use of unlawful weapons.

PHILOLOGY OF THE WAR.

MANY of the old tyums and departments of France have names which are somewhat curious. "Orleans' is a corruption of the name of Aurelian, by whom the city was rebuilt. In the town of Epinal there is the statue of a child trying to put out the fire in a house in fire, which is meant to symbolize the thorns and briers of the region in which the town was built. For the same reason the city called "Epine" has, upon a thorn. The word Alsace means the Elsa-place —the elsa meaning olsa, elder, having probably come to mean outsiders. Nancy is derived by some from Celtic nant, a valley, but others say it is from Nanthe nant, Alsatian, according to Forstemann, Metz and Mousson are traceable to the same root with the German Metz, cowards, while an analysis of Meziores shows it to be from German mez, food, and hors, warrior. The town will probably regard itself as decided on furnish, if not to become, warriors' food.

The names of prominent men on the Continent just now have sometimes suggestive meanings. Bismarck is from "bishop's march," i. e., mark for bonds, etc. Bismarck's wife is unfortunately Norse, from the old word kone, struggle; and she married two of Bismarck's sons from the same name. Moltke, oddly enough, is from Gothic molyan, Norse molla, English mould. Should we suppose that he robbed the graves, the old Scandinavian men the man who knows how to mould! The genius of christening would seem to have presided at the font also when Garibaldi was named. Garibaldi is substantially one with guerre (war is the same), and particularly with spear, which last means bold. So the Italian hero is "Bold-spear." It is very remarkable that the most distinguished military man on the French side should have Teutonic names. Such is the case with Bazaine and Garibaldi, but it is equally true of Trochu, Ulrich, and Bourbaki. Trochu is from Anglo-Saxon droppen, infantry; Ulrich from Old Norse ur, a buffalo; while Bourbaki is from bear, bear, and Old Norse bogna, to contend. It is natural that the names just come to us out of old times should bear traces of the perpetual war amidst which they were given.

An English philologist, Mr. Robert Ferguson, has contended that Bonaparte is an old Frankish name, come back after long exile to its native land. The case, according to him, stands thus: Bonifacer in the seventh and Bonifacer in the ninth century appear as Frankish names. In that part of Italy which was subdued by the Franks I find the present Italian name, Bonifacci. From the same part of Italy come also the Bonapartes. Still the name may be German, for the Lombards, who held that part of Italy before the Franks, were also Germans, and the name seems radically identical with the American name Bowknight, which Mr. Bowditch has shown to be from Anglo-Saxon bold, famous, and bona, slayer. Wherefore Bonaparte may mean, not as commonly thought, a man of bon or good parts, but a famous slayer.

About the name of the King of Prussia there is no doubt. Wilhelm means the helmet of Odin. In the Northern mythology the god Odin appeared at the creation of the world, in conjunction with Vili and Ve, beings whom Thorpe boldly to be personifications of "divine agency." The name Vili (Old Norse) is the Anglo-Saxon Wilfa, English Will, meaning, according to Grimm, the force and spirit which set will in motion. Vili became a title of Odin as the supreme will. And helmet is of obscure origin, thought by some to be related to the light (Helios) which flashed from it. Wilhelm was the name given to the sixth Odin Woden—the mythical Odin—in the genealogy of the kings of the East Angles. King Wilhelm, therefore, in believing, as is said, in the divine right of kings, is but true to the old belief represented in his name, which traces his helmet to the Will of Vili, the god of Valhalla.

THE SIEGE OF PARIS.

ONE of the principal obstacles to peace between France and Prussia is the want of a stable and authorized French government with which a treaty could be concluded. In order to obviate this difficulty, it was proposed to arrange for an armistice which would give the French people the opportunity to elect an Assembly. The negotiations were conducted on the part of the French by M. Thiers, fresh from his unsuccessful journey to Russia, Vienna, London, and Florence in search of allies. The veteran statesman was submitted to an audience with King William at Versailles on the 1st of November, and subsequently, on the 3d and 4th, with Count Bismarck. At the first interview with the Count M. Thiers exhibited his authorization from the Paris government to arrange an armistice on the basis proposed by Lord Granville, namely, the duration of the armistice to be twenty-five days, the inhabitants of Paris to have the liberty to take in food during this interval, and free elections to be held in all the departments. Count Bismarck replied that it was all very well as far as it went, but an authorization from the Tours government was also necessary. M. Thiers said M. Gambetta and his colleagues would not disavow an agreement made by the Paris government, and supported by General Trochu and the army of Paris. But he would undertake at once to communicate with Tours, and obtain a formal authorization in addition to the informal powers already received. Count Bismarck insisted on the necessity of convoking an Assembly, to speak with authority in the name of the country. He said he was willing to suspend active hostilities for this purpose, but until all had been arranged the siege operations would have full course.

At the second interview Count Bismarck waived the point of the Tours government's authorization, and discussed the conditions of the armistice. He proposed that Paris should receive daily one day's food on the scale of present rations, and both belligerents proceed on their material preparations, the Germans to continue to occupy the whole territory now held by them, to cause to make forced requisitions, and to be allowed to bring forward all their stores and war material without interruption. M. Thiers agreed to these points, and asked, "Will Alsace and Lorraine be permitted to send deputies to the Assembly?" Count Bismarck replied in the negative, but at length intimated that he might consent.

King William, however, refused his assent both to the revictualing of Paris and the participation of Alsace and Lorraine in the election. The negotiations were therefore broken off. M. Thiers returned to Paris, and the siege of Paris goes on with undiminished vigor.

The accurate map of that city and the girdle of outlying forts printed on this page will give our readers some idea of the magnitude of the task undertaken by the investing army. Probably no city in the world is better protected by artificial means than the French capital, or is more capable of prolonged defense, if not reduced by starvation, or compelled to surrender by internal dissensions; yet the history of all sieges proves that, unless relieved by a victory in the field, outside the fortifications, the strongest fortress ever constructed must in time yield to the investing force.

The detached forts about Paris are seventeen in number, of which the strongest is that of Mont Valérien. It stands upon the west side of Paris, upon a hill behind Suresnes and Puteaux, on the left bank of the Seine, directly opposite the Bois de Boulogne. The fort is built in a pentagon, with sides of from 380 to 440 yards in length. The conical top of the hill on which it is situated comes up in the centre, towering over every thing, and serves as a gigantic natural parados, or traverse. There is on the top of the cone a plateau, which is surrounded by an earthen parapet. Beside this there are bomb-proof barracks. The fort consists of bastions joined by curtains. There are high cavaliers in the bastions, and small re-entering places of arms opposite the centre of each front. There is a masonry counterscarp and a covered way on four of the fronts. There are redoubts in the re-entering places of arms. There are seventy-six heavy guns and a battery of mitrailleuses on its ramparts, and a garrison of 1500 Gardes Mobiles and 700 sailors. Some of the guns have a calibre of 9½ inches. The other forts round Paris have each four or five fronts, of from 325 to 330 yards in length. They have a bastioned trace. In general, the dimensions are as follow: escarp, 33 feet; counterscarp, 20 feet to 24 feet high; ditch, 78 feet wide. Some have loopholed walls on the top of the escarp. They have covered ways, tenailles, opposite the entrances and re-entering places of arms. They are well supplied with casemates, whose embrasures open on to the ditch. Some have advanced works, and even important outworks. The armament of these forts consists, in great measure, of 80-pounder guns. The garrisons consist of Gardes Mobiles and sailors. In many cases neighboring spurs are occupied by strong earth-works, which look into adjoining hollows which could not be searched by the fire of the forts.

According to published statements the Prussian siege-train comprises, besides many guns of inferior calibre, the famous 9½-ton gun, calibre 8.25 inches, projectile 220-pound shell; the 14-ton gun, calibre 9.25 inches, projectile 337-pound shell, containing a bursting charge of 15 pounds of powder. Both the above are breech-loaders. The extreme range of these guns, with an elevation of 35 degrees, is said to be 8300 yards, or rather less than five and a half miles. The heaviest breech-loading rifle-guns mounted by the French at Paris are: 5-ton gun, calibre 6.3 inches, projectile 70-pound shell; 8-ton gun, calibre 7.5 inches, projectile 115-pound shell; 14-ton gun, calibre 9.45 inches, projectile 220-pound shell; 21½-ton gun, calibre 10.63 inches, projectile 480-pound shell. It would be interesting to know in what proportion these guns exist on the two sides; but this is one of those secrets which good generals preserve. It is not likely that either French or Germans have added considerably to the number of their heavy guns since the war began, as the larger ones are of slow construction. According to a Berlin letter, 25,000 tons of ammunition

PARIS AND

Paris. The been actual doubt, the re increase.

WAR NOT

The difficu scarcity of pa journals will shifts. Some silk paper; o margin cut o possible, are occasionally re which prior t papas, is not note-paper, w

...ish army before ...quantity to have ...although, no ...ermans, and will ...

...CIDENTS.

...RS
...mention and the ...ose of the Paris ...d in a variety of ...ever, printed on ...h the title and ...chen as light as ...ss print, and ne...

The Gaulois, ...ponsible of four ...d a sheet of ...feather. It is not printed on both sides, nor, indeed, is it printed at all. It is lithographed, and consists of four short and narrow columns, filled with writing so minute that to read it would be a severe trial for one's eyes. Two numbers of it lie before us, each containing a "journal of the siege." They impart no information which has not already been supplied from other sources, but as curiosities of journalism they are of considerable interest.

BOMBAST.

La Liberté of October 17 says: "In three weeks from this date no bomb will have reached the heart of Paris; in three weeks Bazaine will be free; in three weeks Garibaldi will be master of the Vosges; in three weeks the Prussian army will be crushed under the forts, decimated by hunger and disease, or scattered in the provinces and annihilated." The Liberté adds: "Paris has issued from behind her shield of stone. She has burst into fragments the girdle of steel which bound her. On all sides the Prussians retreat. The lion is scattering the herd of buffaloes. The Prussians have entered. Let us close the frontiers that they may never depart."

THE GERMAN TROOPS BEFORE PARIS.

In their external appearance, says a writer in the Cologne Gazette, the German troops before Paris show scarcely any trace of the hotties and marches which they have gone through. Advantage has been taken of the lull which has interposed to put in good order the whole materiel of the army. The Würtembergers and Bavarians are less particular in this respect than the Prussians, and on taking up their quarters any where they think first of eating and drinking, and then of cleaning their weapons, uniforms, and horses, whereas with the Prussians the latter is the first duty. The Bavarians have many slightly indisposed and fatigued soldiers, and contribute more inmates to the hospitals than the Prussians, owing to their faulty management. The Saxons have been quite equal to the Prussians since they have been under control of the Confederation, and have wonderfully improved since 1866. The activity of the regimental tailors, shoemakers, and locksmiths since the investment of Paris began, and the vigilance of the authorities as to the neatness and order of the troops, are evident at the reviews of the various divisions by the King. The regiments are almost as trim as on parade in garrison towns. The horses of the artillery and most of the cavalry are in good and often in brilliant condition, especially those of the cavalry reserve. Only in three regiments which have had much outpost or patrol service, or which have lyre smacked and marched a great deal, are seen ill-conditioned horses. Of the 20,000 horses captured at Sedan and elsewhere, the best have been picked out and supplied to the artillery and cavalry. Those include many capital Norman horses for the cavalry, and heavy animals for the artillery. The Barbary horses of the African troops, excellent as they are, are deemed too small for the Prussian cavalry. The strength of the regiments is better by about one-third than that at the beginning of September. Although in the battles near and before Metz many regiments were reduced to a half, and some to nearly a third of their numbers, the losses included a proportionately very large number of slightly wounded. Most of the wounded were struck by Chassepots from long distances, so that the force of the bullets was much spent, and many of them broke no bones, but buried themselves in flesh. The wounds caused by the Austrian bullets and grenades in 1866 were, on the average, much more serious. During the last few weeks, therefore, many soldiers, and a relatively much larger number of officers, who were wounded at Weissenburg, Wœrth, and before Metz have rejoined the ranks. Many officers, indeed, have their arm in a sling, or a plaster on the face, or use a crutch, but their zeal induces them to render what service they can. The lack of superior officers which was felt in August and September, when young sub-lieutenants had frequently to command companies and second-class captains battalions, has almost disappeared. Most of the regiments have been reinforced, and it is a pleasure to see young, intelligent, muscular volunteers, burning with patriotism and warlike spirit. On off days most of the Prussian troops are vigorously drilled for some hours, and it is a singular spectacle to see recruits practicing a very strict parade march in the splendid court and broad alleys of Versailles.

NEW ARTICLE OF DIET.

A new article of diet has appeared in the Paris markets—ass's flesh—which is selling at 80 centimes per kilogramme. Recently, at M. Jules Favre's, there were three cutlets for seven persons. Nobody would touch them, and they remained for the servants, while every body made an onslaught on a hum, which quickly disappeared. Fresh-water fish and vegetables are abundant, but prices are rising daily.

ST. CLOUD AND STRASBURG.

The German papers can not help continuing the partial rescue of the St. Cloud library with the indifference which allowed the Strasburg collection to be annihilated by the flames. It is urged that the French authorities, knowing Strasburg would be attacked, might have stored away the library and picture-gallery in cellars, and preserved these invaluable treasures the same way as so many chairs, tables, and other everyday articles outlived the siege. It is also asserted, on the testimony of officers who have inquired into the subject, that part of the library might have been saved, even after the building had caught fire, but that no effort was made. On the contrary, there seems to have been a certain satisfaction at the Germans destroying what they set such store by. It must be owned there is some difference between this conduct and that of the Prussian soldiers rushing into the flames at St. Cloud and fetching the enemy's pictures out of a conflagration unnecessarily caused by the enemy himself.

THE IMPERIAL NOVEL.

The following is a translation of the outline of a novel, recently found among the secret papers at the Tuileries, in the handwriting of the ex-Emperor:

"M. Benoit, a worthy grocer of the Rue de la Lune, set out in 1817 for America. After having invested in the country which lies between the Hudson and Mississippi rivers he returned to France in the April of 1868, having spent nearly nineteen years abroad. He had heard the distant echoes of all that had been going on in France since 1848, without thoroughly realizing the changes that had been brought about. Some French refugees had told him that France had been groaning under the yoke of despotism, and that he would find his native country, to which he was about to return, degraded and impoverished, although ill fated he been so prosperous when he quitted it in the time of Louis Philippe. Our friend Benoit lands accordingly at Brest a passenger by the mail steamer. He enters the roadstead full of prejudices, preconceived impressions. He asks of the first sea-faring man he meets, 'Mon, ami, how does vessels which are so black and ugly when contrasted with the magnificent ships which I left behind?' The answer is, 'Why, these are armor-clad ships, the invention of the Emperor. They are covered with iron, and can not be injured by cannon-balls, and that transformation has destroyed up to a certain point the naval supremacy of England.' 'It may be so,' is the rejoinder, 'but I regret our old vessels with masts and sails—the ships of poetry.' (On the margin opposite this I have ere these words, "passports suppressed.") "He sees near the Manche the crowd going up to the elections. He is astonished to hear of universal suffrage, and astonished also at the railways which spread over France, and the electric telegraph. He arrives in Paris. Its embellishment. The city boundary extended to the fortifications. He buys various articles, and finds them cheaper than they were, thanks to the commercial treaty, even cheaper, etc. He thinks that many authors are in prison. An error. No énervés, nervous, bilious prisoners, no colic, no preventive imprisonment. Acceleration of lawsuits. Privateering suppressed. Savings-banks for old age. The asylums of Vincennes. The coalition. Police du roulage abolished. Regulations abolished. Industry set free under lighter, pay increased, medal founded, retiring allowance augmented. Reserve increasing the strength of the army, reliefs six times a week. Arrest for debt. Brokers; a shop-keeper who sent out a clerk to sell or buy merchandise arrested. General councils.

A NIGHT TELEGRAPH.

A new nocturnal military telegraph has been invented by a Hungarian officer, and sold to the Prussian War Department. By means of this telegraph, which consists of rockets of different colors, a communication can be established in the night between armies stationed at a distance of twenty miles from each other. It would enable Bazaine, for instance, to have continual contact with the commandant of Thionville. Each rocket represents six words, and no other combination of words can thus be conveyed by fifty rockets. The key to this telegraph, which may be altered so as to render it unintelligible to the enemy, contains all the words used in strategy and tactics.

LIVING ON THE COUNTRY.

How requisitions are conducted by the Germans—especially in the Bavarian districts—may be judged from a report of Major Schmetzow, from Chevreuil, near St. Cyr:

"We summon the mayor and municipality, and inform them in writing what they have to furnish. As I have an excellent knowledge how to oil the commuses in the department, the authorities are astonished to see when I make out the warrant demands as to their herds of cattle, population, etc., and address the head officials by their names. The little experience in my bundle furnishes me with data for all this without any great trouble. One mayor had to deliver sixty sacks of oats. He swore hard and fast that it was impossible. Without listening to him further I inserted in addition two bullocks and a sheep. It was not my intention to take these. An hour afterward I received the oats. I am the warmest friend of the authorities for waiving the bullocks and sheep. In communes, however, where five or more requisitions are made, I prefer to take away cattle from the people is an unpleasant part of the soldier's duty."

RAILWAY HOSTAGES.

The railway at Epernay having been torn up by the French on the 11th ult., wrecking a train of sick German soldiers who were on board, three being killed and twenty injured, the French authorities have been required to appoint hostages of wealth and rank, who will accompany every train in the front carriage. In case of destruction of the line, and accident to a train, these persons will forfeit their lives. Several gentlemen including a count residing in the vicinity of the outrage, have been arrested, but it will be almost impossible to discover the offenders.

A PEN FOR BISMARCK.

Paris is not yet taken, but the pen with which Count Bismarck is to sign the treaty of peace is already prepared. Herr Bissinger, of Pforzheim, has manufactured out of massive gold an imitation of an ordinary steel pen-holder. The quill itself is polished, in order that it may be more conveniently handled, but the whole closely resembles a real quill, every fibre being represented, while the back of the feather is thickly studded with brilliants, and bears the count's coronet and Bismarck's monogram are engraved. Besides the engraving and polishing, hundreds were engaged on it for five weeks. The gold employed is of 18 carats, and that part in which the brilliants are set is of 24 carats.

GERMAN IDEAS OF FRENCHMEN.

A German writer in the Cologne Gazette comments on the impossibility of reasoning with the French. "They know that it is all in vain with them, and console themselves with the belief that in five years they will recover themselves from the final, but in the same breath they protest that they are not conquered, and are deceiving themselves as the last with the absurdest reports of victories. The "genius of the defence of Strasbourg" is invoked by Gambetta. A postal, but in fact, experts by barricades to repel a million practised soldiers, and by a mob of Mobiles and Franc-tireurs to annihilate the armies of the provinces. The townspeople and peasants, with their excitable temperament, are to be turned by bubbles and drummers to deeds of so-called heroism, and while a handful of the enemy fall victims, the localities implicated are punished by destruction or contributions. Emissaries and proclamations are sent about, inciting a guerilla war, directing people to assume to-day the franc-tireur's blouse, to-morrow the peasant's smock, so that they are to blame if peasants' coats of arms are fusilled. The barricades and obstructions placed in the roads are not, however, defended; and behind the ready-to-destroy bridges and tunnels, which are shattered to pieces, there stood not one more to defend the passage of the Moselle by the enemy on a bridge of boats. Will the well-to-do effeminate Paris tradesman or the artisan display more bravery than the army? Will he not throw away his musket as soon as the first shells fall in the city, like the people of the large provincial towns? To talk of dying under the ruins of Paris is the very fudge which has talked France into destruction. Treachery, numbers, espionage—these, according to the Paris prates, are the means by which the Germans have "intrigued" themselves up to Paris. Even intelligent people in Paris are not free. There are intelligent people to be found in Germany who can be induced to confess "Germany is much stronger than we, and we must therefore be conquered." If asked why France declared war, they reply, "It was not we who wished for it." "Looking down on the Champs Elysées," they exclaim, "I imagine that our heaviest shots will fall on the Place de la Concorde, the Place de la Bourse, or, at any rate, on the Champ de Mars. When I stand under the forts of Issy and Vanves, especially the Mont Valérien and Mont Gravelosse, I fancy that a couple of thousand of our brave fellows will take these heights and these interests, as easily as the capture of Weissenburg, Saarbrück, Gorze, and Gravelotte, and as they have already taken Bicêtre, Meudon, and Bicêtre. I am no strategist, but I believe Mont Valérien and St. Denis will give us little trouble. Our artillery-men have already selected the points from which the greatest havoc can be made. The engineer officers can, therefore, be made. The engineer officers can, therefore, count long, and if the war should still be protracted, and the Germans be obliged to establish themselves for the winter, the question is not yet spoken, will also be wasted." He concludes by remarking that freebooters and marauders are not deserved villages, taking away whatever has been left and concealing it in the woods, and that there is a danger of Paris, in the event of its remaining it, becoming the prey of bands of marauders.

AMAZONS TO THE RESCUE.

"You will hardly believe," says a letter from Paris, sent out by Ballon, "that the Paris ladies can be seriously regarded when I tell you that it is proposed to raise ten battalions of amazons, and to call them—to call them—what? But, indeed, it is because the people are thoroughly in earnest that they go into a ludicrous extreme. Well, and, why do not see the folly of it. There were placards all over Paris last night, announcing the formation and formation of the ten battalions of Amazons, describing what their dress would be, their accoutrements, their duties, etc. Each of the first battalion is a course of formation; the others are as yet in the air. The Amazons are a provincial contingent, so-called in the name of Belly. How long M. Belly—Felix Belly—will be allowed to exercise them in such a name I perhaps they will soon want a colonel of their own sex to lead them on to glory; or I should rather say a major, for the grade of colonel is as yet unknown in the citizen army. In the mean time M. Belly is to do its work. The battalion, of course, is to have black nether garments, with an orange stripe, cut, I believe (but this is not in the announcement), after the Zouave fashion; they are to have a black woolen blouse with a hood; they are to have a black belt with an orange buckle or shade; they are to have a shoulder-belt with cartridge-box attached; and they are to be armed with a light rifle, good for 200 yards. Each battalion is to have eight companies 150 strong. Their duty will be to defend the ramparts and the barricades and they demand the pay of a franc and a half a day, allowed to all the other battalions of the National Guard." They are in earnest; they mean business, and no doubt they will find enough to do. I must say this for the Parisians, that, while some seemed bewildered as they read the green placards announcing what the Provisional Republican of Paris intend, staring in amazement as if they could not believe their eyes, the greater number were consumed with laughter."

FAMOUS CAPITULATIONS.

There are moments in the first full flush and vigor of youth when sorrow seems to us but a dream, and death an impossibility. Even in the latter, in the midst of pain and trouble, looking back from a sick-bed, or from the edge of some great calamity or misfortune, to the past golden period of victorious youth and hope, the stricken man sighs and wonders at the change that has come upon him. An equal surprise at feeling must accompany the capitulation of a great army.

Yesterday its soldiers were shouting in harvest gateways, polishing brass, grinding steel, piling powder-wagons, admiring new canteen, commissariat wagons, shoeing horses, and calculating plumes and epaulets. An ocean of bayonets—one hundred thousand brave men—who can turn their course? who can bar their way? Fire and steel are powerless before them, and the enemy seems to melt away from them. Multiply a will bold, a live, or a tiger by one hundred thousand, and you have then but a faint approximation to the rush, the leap, the force of such an army. Yet modern war is but a mathematical problem after all. Throw your army as an arrow along the base of a given triangle while your opponent is laboriously trying to wind down the other to get at you, and you will pass your sword through his heart before he even sees it glitter. Such is the reason we now find that it was in the time of that great master player, the late Napoleon, who then but a little approximation to the rush, the leap, the force of such an army. Yet modern war is but a mathematical problem after all. Throw your army as an arrow along the base of a given triangle while your opponent is laboriously trying to wind down the other to get at you, and you will pass your sword through his heart before he even sees it glitter. Such is the reason we now find that it was in the time of that great master player, the late Napoleon, who then but a little handful of men on the equal ranks of pieces; the knights leap, the bishops sidle, the castles sweep the field, the pawns move timidly; the game appears equal. Suddenly the Philidor—the Morphy—mover a piece, and the enemy's game is broken up. There is a dead lock, his army becomes entangled in a deadly defile, his queen falls by her husband's very side. Checkmate! The king is checked. The monarch and all his army are cooped in a corner, and in deadly danger. A feeble move more, and he moves not again. That position of things in chess is called checkmate; in war, capitulation.

And what a capitulation that of Philidor—the Morphy—mover a piece, and the enemy's game is broken up. There is a dead lock, his army becomes entangled in a deadly defile, his queen falls by her husband's very side. Checkmate! The king is checked. The monarch and all his army are cooped in a corner, and in deadly danger. A feeble move more, and he moves not again. That position of things in chess is called checkmate; in war, capitulation.

And what a capitulation that of Mulack's army at Sedan on the 2d of September last! On that day, so fatal to France, after that defeat, worse than ten Pavias and six Waterloos, there were surrendered to the Prussian invaders eighty-three thousand French rank and file, five hundred and fifty cannon, and ten thousand horses. It was a defeat worse than Cannæ, and as overwhelming as that of Sarmizegetusa. Since Pavia no French monarch had ever been taken in siege or battle. No modern European nation has ever received so crushing a blow.

It is only by analysis and historical comparison that it is possible fully to appreciate the enormous importance of this event.

The great capitulations recorded in history have generally followed the break-up and humiliation of some once great, but then effete or exhausted nation; but, occasionally, as in the case of the Caudine Forks, they have aroused all the energy of the defeated nation, and have been followed by swift and complete revenge. The disaster of the Caudine Forks was one of those early reverses (321 B.C.) which tested the Romans to steel, and made them the invincible conquerors they soon after became. Three days, the historian says, was a terrible people, the Kabyles of Italy, who, living in natural fortresses on the highest points of the north of Naples, boarded their corn and wine among their bench wools and ravines, despising the feeble folk of Latium and Campania, who had made no effort for the eagles of the children of Romulus. The consuls commanding, according to Valerius and Arnold, broke out almost immediately before the death of Alexander the Great, who, in subduing the great descendant of Hercules, was but arming as prisoner to the obscure nation of whom he had probably hardly heard by the name. So it befell this campaign the Romans, determined to subdue all neighboring nations, invaded Samnium from the Latin frontier or south side of the Apennines. To drive the Romans into the dangerous defiles that lead from the plain of Capua to Benevento on the high valleys of the Apennines, Caius Pontius of Telesia, the Samnite general, spread a report that his army had marched into Apulia. The Romans at once drove straight at the mountain passes. At Caudium, a group according to Livy, between Arienzo and Arpaia, through which runs the present road from Naples to Benevento, the Samnites had legions and a force of auxiliaries (probably), at least seventeen thousand men, when all told, found themselves in the defiles. The Samnites had surrounded them; they were in a trap from which there was no issue. Every path on the hills was blocked and guarded; the Samnites repelled the desperate, maddened rushes of the first despair. Then winter set in, and the end was near. The Romans, after many hopeless fights and great butchery, laid down their swords, gave up as hostages, and agreed to surrender every foot of Samnite territory. The captive Romans had to "Put us to the sword at once, sell us as slaves, or keep us as prisoners till we are ransomed by our friends, but do not insult your living or dead, from all unworthy insults."

The young general, a man not without Greek culture, having, indeed, it is said, known Plato, was generous. He required only that the Roman army should pass under the usual degrading ceremony, pass under the yoke. Through a gateway of spears the Roman army passed, every man of it, man naked all but his kilt. Even the consuls were stripped of their paludamenta, or war-cloaks. To all other Italian nations proved civilization and generous; he ordered wagons for the sick and wounded, and gave the deputies money enough to last them till they came within sight of home.

The Samnite men stole into the discomfited city at nightfall, and would neither speak nor be comforted. The great-hearted, proud people were deeply wounded in their disgrace; all citizens put on mourning, the knights and senators took off their golden rings, stripped their togas of the purple borders which marked their rank, and all festivals and ceremonies were suspended till they could atone in a way of better success.

The Romans sent to Rome for reinforcements, levied troops,

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 727.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

UHLANS TRACKING THE COURSE OF A BALLOON FROM PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 770.]

TRACKING A BALLOON.

THE Prussians are naturally anxious to put a stop to the "balloon posts" which defy their attempts to isolate Paris from communication with the rest of France, and put in requisition every means for their capture. At the head-quarters of the German staff men are constantly on the look-out with telescopes, and the instant a balloon is descried rising over Paris notice is telegraphed throughout the camp; and parties of cavalry are dispatched in chase, in the hope of making a capture when it descends. They sometimes ride a long distance into the open, but in their eagerness, and even panetrate districts as yet unoccupied by the Prussians. The effect on our living representations of the ever-exciting pursuits, and reminds one forcibly of ancient hawking-expeditions. Nor are these sights unfrequent in Paris. Not a day passes without a balloon being officially announced as having started, and the instant it is seen a gun is fired to announce the fact. It would be impossible, except by sheer luck, to hit so uncertain a target; and the two balloons that far captured came down inside the Prussian lines.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1870.

☞ The splendid WAR SUPPLEMENT given with our last Number of the Weekly is followed this week by one of similar character, containing TWO FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS, referring to the Defense of Paris; a stirring Poem on the War, by Christian G. Bunsett; a touching Story of Irish Peasant Life; and a variety of other interesting literary matter.

☞ *It is unnecessary to announce to our readers that arrangements have been made with the distinguished author of the "Scientific Record," in the* HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, for a new Department in HARPER'S WEEKLY, to be entitled,

Scientific Intelligence,

to commence in the next Number of the Paper. It will contain early notices of the most important discoveries throughout the world, but especially in the United States, in the way of SOLENTIFIC EXPLORATIONS, discoveries in ASTRONOMY AND NATURAL HISTORY, and other interesting items of scientific progress. The Publishers believe this Department will prove a very interesting and important feature in the WEEKLY.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscriptions to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending to their names as early as convenient previous to the FIRST issue of the New Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

THE criticism of the Administration by the Republican journals is naturally misinterpreted by the Democratic press. The Republican party contains the largest portion of the people who do not blindly follow leaders, and whose party allegiance, founded upon principle, is observant and discriminating. Those, therefore, who believe with us that, under the circumstances of the country, continued Republican ascendency is essential to the national welfare, will endeavor to connect their counsels to be unwise in the national Administration, knowing that the condition of continued Republican power is the approval of the intelligence of the people.

The present difficulty is the apathy of the Republican party. Its organization, as the late elections show, is virtually unbroken, and the just national suspicion of the Democratic party, founded upon its past history and its present attitude and spirit, is plainly undisturbed. But the Republican position is one of passive resistance merely, and its immense power in that attitude shows how great its real force would be if fully developed. That development is the immediate problem, and if Congress and the Administration are sagacious it is not even a difficult problem. The first step, of course, is to ascertain the reason of the apathy. And is it not evident?

There are a great many Republicans who ask: "What is the difference between the two parties? What principle divides them?" And there are others who declare that both are equally corrupt, and that the members of the Republican are little better than those of their adversaries. There are still others who, with the Chicago Tribune, insist that all the old questions are settled, and that there is really no present issue but what is called reform. Those who ask the first question do not care to vote, or they vote indifferently as personal feeling dictates. The difference, they reason, they might be asked why, if the parties are divided by no principle, they might not be wisely divided by their general character and the doctrine of chances? But, practically, the man who feels that both parties are alike is utterly pathetic, and votes either way. But the second class is of the same kind, and they both swell "the stay-at-home vote."

The third are merely allies of the Democracy, and they have yet to show their reasons for believing that a sincere revenue reform would be carried by that party. The Chicago Tribune, indeed, proposes to form a new party. But that is, possibly, only upon the theory that both of the present parties dissolve. And even supposing there were many Republicans who would follow that journal out of their party, does it suggest that in pressure of Republican disintegration the Democratic party would disband? It certainly would not; and the World, therefore, says, not that there must be a new party, but that the Chicago Tribune and its friends must join the Democracy.

The fact is the cause of Republican apathy is the feeling that there is no serious difference between the parties, it is because that difference is covered by Republican management and the remedy lies in making the difference plain. The great peril of our political situation is that the present is overlooked. The Democratic efforts to elect a free-trade or a protective Congress when money will decide the contest? Why talk about the tariff when the test is the autumn when the roots are rotten in the spring?

The first and most imperative duty of every American citizen, before any other financial reform, is to stay the corruption, which will baffle any Administration, and which produces the apathy of which we speak. That is now the position of parties upon this point?

The national law to protect the purity of Congressional elections, against which the Democratic party threw its whole force, is a step in the true direction—a step taken by the Republican party. If that were followed by a wide and searching reform of the whole system of the civil service, abolishing the deplorable habit of selling the public offices at auction, and making the system a mere party machine, and if all chief appointments were conspicuously made in accordance, there would be a powerful and astounding response from the better sentiment, which is the controlling sentiment, of the country. If the character of the party, the known and influential counselors of the President was such as the whole country honored for honesty and independence, a thousand minor points of administration would be pardoned. The national faith in ABRAHAM LINCOLN was not founded upon his supposed sagacity, but upon his proved honesty. Nobody doubts the equal honesty of President GRANT, but there is not an element of doubt in the counsel he believed to be influential with him.

The country does not expect a reform of electoral corruption from the Democratic party, which has developed it, and which is identified with it, any more than it expects a reform of the civil service from secretaryships. But it does not yet see that the Republican party has undertaken it as a distinct and distinguishing duty. As a general and profound is the disgust with the corruption of politics in every department, that we believe nothing would so powerfully tend to unite the party with enthusiasm as an urgent recommendation by the President in his message of a thorough reform of the civil service, and the immediate stringency of legislation for the security of the polls, with a practice showing how sincere is his desire that the reform upon the subject. No passage in MR. MUNDELLA'S recent address in New York was received with more hearty applause than his statement that the lowest officer of the customs. The President may confidently appeal to the better sentiment of the whole party, for it is the unity of that sentiment which is the danger of the party. And when once the Republican President has strongly pronounced for civil service reform, we should like to see how many Republicans would desert to the Democratic party under cover of a pure revenue reform.

It is not, certainly, that we would oppose the one to the other. As we said last week, a simple financial system would be adopted, and tested with reference to the actual situation and necessities of the country. Upon such principles let us have a revenue reform which will please no party, and if it be impracticable to obtain all that some Republicans may wish, shall the party therefore be lost? Or will it be wise deliberately to barter a lost day in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. But there are a great many other pressing questions to be considered in the government of society. To protect other rights which may seem to him more valuable, a man will watch his own pennies to buy in a dearer and to sell in a cheaper market. And to bring into power the Democratic party, for its present spirit, leadership, and policy, because it vaguely promises revenue reform, would be the deliberate betrayal of the country.

THE RUSSIAN NOTE.

THE position taken by Russia in regard to the treaty of 1856 is clearly stated and refuted in the letter of Lord Granville. The Russian claim is, that when any power which is a party to a solemn treaty of mutual guaranty conceives that any part of the treaty has been violated, it may, without consultation with its co-signers, denounce and withdrawal from the compact. This is, as Lord Granville says, "the entire destruction of treaties in their essence," because in a joint treaty each power surrenders a portion of its free agency. Obviously, if any signer is dissatisfied, it should call attention to the difficulty; and if the other signers are unable to remove it, or deny its existence, the injured party must seek his own remedy. This is of course because a state can be supposed to compromise its sovereignty. The objection raised by Lord Granville is not an assertion that a power is absolutely bound by a joint treaty if the co-signers do not release it, but that it owes to comity a less peremptory course than Russia has chosen to pursue. Indeed, there is a strong presumption against such action as the Russian, because it implies a doubt whether its objections to the treaty are so evident as to command assent. Indirection is always suspicious. And in the condition of Europe the suspicion that Russia has some ulterior purpose is unavoidable.

What the ulterior purpose be it is not easy to foresee. A general European war would be a calamity so deplorable that the good sense of every country and of capital and labor to the last that it may be avoided. It is true enough that progress is usually made through blood. It is certainly true that there is immense suffering and injustice among the people of Europe. But it is not the less true that war is an evil so enormous, and a remedy so terrible, that it is often questionable whether the advantage gained compensates for it; and it is the highest of duties in every public opinion against an unjust or unnecessary war. There are two questions raised by the Russian circular. The first is, whether the treaty has been violated; and then, if it has been or not, whether it is wise for the powers to go to war if Russia withdraws. The plea of Russia is that the several powers have not respected the terms of the treaty in regard to the Black Sea, and that her shores are exposed. That this is a sufficient cause for war, which, like her complaint of the situation of the Danubian provinces, should be referred to the co-signers, whom it has asked to be referred, shall the co-signers go to war? Certainly war could not be justified until every other means of adjustment had been exhausted. The public opinion of the world, to which BISMARCK so constantly appeals, should be invoked against any power or alliance which irregularly takes up arms. A nation which begins war so wholly in the wrong as France was when the present war began is at a fearful disadvantage, as FRANCE has found.

The situation in Europe is evidently critical. If there is a war we shall have an indirect interest in it; for, as England must be engaged, she will be more disposed to settle the differences between us without much further delay. It is certainly desirable that at such a moment the United States should have a firm and able minister in London, and that the policy of the Government upon the main question with England should be known to the country. It is a subject upon which the State Department should have the support of public sentiment, that the British Government and people should know precisely what the Administration and expect—a point upon which they declare that we do not inform them. The extreme mystery which for many years has enveloped negotiations may wisely be disregarded. But in all our claims and arguments let us be very careful not to plant ourselves upon precedents which we decry, nor be content with a conduct which we have already denounced in other nations.

ODIOUS PERSONALITIES.

WHEN the election in New York was over Governor HOFFMAN made a speech. It was a celebration of the victory and beneficent acts of the Democratic Legislature, a fierce denunciation of the Congressional laws to protect honest election, an exhortation to universal love and harmony, and a deprecation of the excessive personality of the campaign. In the recital of the good services of the Legislature we find congratulations that the registry law, one of the defenses of honest elections, has been repealed; but we do not find any allusion to the most notorious of all the acts of the Legislature, an act which became law only by the signature of the controlling Governor—the Erie bill. But as that is the especial official achievement of Governor HOFFMAN, he possibly felt unwilling to refer to his own praise. Let us, therefore, imagine how he might have alluded to it, had not modesty forbade:

"Fellow-citizens, gentlemen, that I was made Governor by my friend MR. TWEED, and his associates, and by means of the frauds of which I shall presently call 'a cry,' but which were proved by the committee appointed by Congress. You will each believe that I am, therefore, in the situation toward and by honor of friend MR. TWEED, who is a director of the celebrated Erie Railway, and a friend of the honest MR. FISK, a gentleman who, at MR. TWEED'S ratification meeting, entirely eclipsed our comrade and supernumerary Governor, the candidate of '68, MR. HONORIUS SEYMOUR, for whose memory I invoke three cheers from your honest throats with a will. I beg you to remember, gentlemen, that my friend MR. TWEED controls Tammany Hall, and my friend MR. FISK controls, as he distinctly stated, twenty-five thousand voters. Now, if I wish to succeed my excellent and supersannuated friend, MR. SEYMOUR, as a candidate for the Presidency in 1872, is it surprising? Having proved the power of MR. TWEED at the polls, is it not essential that I should depend upon him for assistance; and when that patriot and his honest friend MR. FISK said to me that they wanted to control the property of other people for three years longer than the term for which they had been appointed, should I not have been a fool to forfeit their favor by refusing my assent?

"It is true that the Governor is instructed with the veto power for exactly such an exigency. It is true that the bill was the most wanton overthrow of the most sacred rights of property. It is true that it gave monster owners of the stock helplessly into the hands of certain men. But, gentlemen, every body knows the character of those men. Every body KNOWS that they would be instinctively selected from the whole community for positions of trust and responsibility. And more than that, gentlemen, every body knows that I wish to be a candidate in 1872, and that I should never have been heard again if I had not signed the bill. I trust, therefore, that this great and honorable act of mine will not be forgotten by you, nor by the country, and that we shall hear no more of these odious personalities about candidates. Of course, if my friend MR. TWEED and his associates think that a liberal distribution of the most wretched libels upon a counterpetiter, as well as a 'good cause,' is the secret to my success in an election, I acquiesce, because nothing is so clear to me as honor and constitutional right. But I trust, for the sake of decency, that nobody will ever again allude to my part in the passage of the Erie bill. Gentlemen, to whom, as to me, justice is the most precious word in the vocabulary of a free people, and since he shrunk from the effort—and not unnaturally—it is only fair that others should attempt the conquest upon the subject. And he and his friends may be sure that the country will be instructed.

BISHOP SIMPSON AND THE WOMAN QUESTION.

AT a late meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church Bishop SIMPSON made an admirable and interesting speech. The bishop is a man of clear perceptions and of moral independence; and it was pleasant to see how sweetly and temperately he expressed views with which many of his hearers might not sympathize, but which were very decided and mature upon his part. In every clergyman, in his experience he has shown him the peculiar difficulties of the position of women in our social system; and not by any means, but from the force of habit-ness, and through thoughtlessness, they are apt to fall into the position of drudges or of dolls. There has been, as was natural, a deep interest in the minds of the best men and women, and the movement for an enlarged female education, which began in England more than half a century ago, was the first striking sign of it. SYDNEY SMITH, one of the most conservative of men, strongly advocated the movement, carefully stating the limits which he imposed upon it. "I stand in doubt of any thing that comes up against," says Bishop SIMPSON, "but if God has been inclining the hearts of the community to educate their daughters; so the common schools have been opened, and the doors of colleges have been opened, to admit young women, and they are going to compete with their brothers, and God is evidently commanding that women shall do more than they have done in the past."

The necessity to the better education of women was as bitter, and supported by the same arguments, as that which every demand of reform has met on equal opposition in early encounters. NAPOLEON'S phrase, Les carrières ouvert aux talents—or, the tools to those who can use them—expresses the motto of progress of thought and civilization. That a human being shall not be forbidden to do whatever innocent thing God, or the taste, or the natural bent, dictates, calls him to do, is a proposition which will hardly be disputed. But an application of it is not always to practice in certain directions is always stoutly resisted. DEAN SWIFT gravely scales the reasons why women should not be taught. His words are full of mockery, but they are substantially the arguments which were seriously urged and controverted by SYDNEY SMITH. But now the excellent canon would have suddenly turned off a period of polished contempt at the Methodist dissenters, whom he never spared, if he had heard Bishop SIMPSON saying, "Certainly, MR. SMITH, I agree with you, and upon your own grounds, and therefore"—in the words of his speech the other evening—"for more than a score of years I have believed the opinions I express. I did not think the full reformation of society would come until woman received the ballot."

The bishop, however, carefully excuses himself from all responsibility for the opinions of some who believe with him. He thinks that woman "steps out of her sphere" when she contends for the overthrow of institutions that give stability to society. "I have no sympathy with woman when she says that the Bible is unnecessary, or when desiring to lessen the marriage tie." The speech is very interesting and significant as showing how widely and surely the conviction which the bishop expresses is extending. The follies of many of the advocates of every reform are deprecated more sincerely by its friends than by any one else; and not the least of the practical perplexities of the social movement is the disposition to insist upon individual vagaries as the essential elements of the faith. There was a great man very pretty thirty years ago who seriously thought that the anti-slavery movement was only a desperate attempt of a few long-haired and large-eyed eccentrics to make themselves notorious. And certainly there is nothing more exquisitely comical than many of the incidents of those days. But those who, somewhat earlier, in England, thought that Puritanism was only canting through the nose, were quite as ridiculous as any Zeal-in-the-land Boy. Will the good sense of the next century smile in the same way at those of to-day who think that the bishop wastes his sympathy upon a few weak, restless women craving notoriety?

THE KING OF SPAIN.

THE disturbance of the old order in Europe is shown by nothing more plain than the election of a king of Spain. The representatives chosen by universal suffrage select an Italian prince to take the place of the banished queen, without the least regard to kinship, and seeking only a royal descent. In the days when monarchy really flourished, and kings were not popularly supposed to be mere ceremonies, when a revolution displaced the reigning house the successor was sought in the family line. The true Tory requires that the regal descent shall be as unbroken as the priestly, and that the sanctity of the oil that have the blood of the monarch of centuries ago flowing in his veins. When JAMES the Second was expelled from England, and the "glorious revolution" was accomplished, it was the husband of his daughter who was called to his throne. But the Duke of Aosta is as much a stranger to Spain as MAXIMILIAN was to Mexico. He is elected because it is decided that Spain must have a monarchy, that it is essential that no feuds be perpetuated by preferring any Spanish line.

The situation in Spain is certainly remarkable. The revolution that overthrew the old monarchy and exiled the queen, two years ago, was universal. The country was at the lowest moral and political point. The silver of the court were notorious. The people were almost wholly unable to control, and the whole system of government was so rotten that it fell without even a struggle or a word. The task of those who had led the revolution was incalculably vast. But they maintained order, and appealed to the people. The people freely elected a congress which has had fiery debates, but which appointed a regency that has also maintained itself. After constant regal candidacies and intrigues of every kind, a king has been elected. Of the 334 deputies to the Cortes entitled to vote, 311 voted, and the Duke of Aosta received 191 votes, the republic 60, and the rest were divided among five candidates, the highest number being 27 for the Duke of Montpensier. It is certainly creditable to the candidates that they have left the country tranquil, and that an election, evidently free, has resulted in a decisive vote. The most threatening peril was anarchy, and that seems, thus far at least, to be avoided. But when a king is elected in a country of Spain, nothing can be foreseen. Should nothing prevent the coronation of the young king, and the beginning of his reign, the friends of the friendly will undoubtedly reappear as ministers, and exercise, under more stable forms, the authority which they had held for two years.

There is one point upon which Spain and civilization are to be congratulated, and that is that the ecclesiastical system of the country will probably be relaxed. Indeed, under all the agitation upon the continent of Europe, there is a very visible tendency toward emancipation from the ecclesiastical tyranny. In France, under LOUIS NAPOLEON, it was becoming bravier and bravier. The only thing before the beginning of the war, the liberal Catholics had been beaten by the priestly party, and a total reaction was impending. The folly of the French empire was a partial release of Belgium from the sad consequences of this success, and the war against the Italian temporal reaction has been overthrown. Meanwhile the Papal temporal authority is destroyed in Italy, and the great truth is emphasized by events, that nothing is so disastrous to human progress and the development of civilization as the political supremacy of the ecclesiastical body. It is a truth which we can observe in this country by the absence of that supremacy hitherto. If our progress has been prodigious and beneficent, it is because it has been free from the interference of the spirit which has so long degraded Europe. And we have a right to hope for better days for Spain, when we see that it is being emancipated from that debasing influence.

A FRIENDLY CRITIC.

IN his admirable address at the Cooper Institute MR. MENDELSA praised very warmly much that he had seen in this country; and it made some valuable criticisms. Thus he said that in general our system of education was the best in the world, but that it needed one thing to make it perfect, and that is, that education should be made compulsory. This remark was received with applause by the audience, and it is one to which the people of the country must soon be accustomed. The coincidence of the universal Prussian system, and the very general advance of Prussia to the leadership of Europe, is too significant not to be remarked. The fact that in this country electoral corruption is most prevalent among the most ignorant class is one that suggests to us the remedy. Indeed, the chief danger to our system appears to us intelligent public opinion, and that is impossible without education. To maintain that opinion, and constantly to elevate it, the State must not only provide education for every child, but it must insist that every child be educated.

There is one point in this connection to which we have often called attention, and that is the resolution of one of the religious sects of the country to insist, not only upon separate public schools, with the intention of throwing it under ecclesiastical control. Nothing could be so fatal to the system with a public fund. But it will be steadily pursued, and not without chances of success. It is a design frankly proclaimed and defended. The leaders of the party openly wish only that each sect should have its share of the school money, because education should be religious, which they now only pretend to be. Now, to resist this school policy, we must have an enlightened public opinion. But we can have that only by keeping open all the doors of schools are suffered to become sectarian or ecclesiastical. Moreover, as the Protestant sects profess to be so strongly opposed to sectarian action as the Roman Catholics are—as they are divided by a thousand theological differences—it is only by such action that they can maintain their principle and spirit from which that system springs, can best be maintained, is by the same enlightened policy.

The condition of that enlightened opinion, which is the true American conservatism, is education; and it is the highest duty, therefore, to insist that the people shall be educated. Look at the Prussian of to-day, and at that of the time of Frederick the Great. The latter was called despotism. But the vital difference between them is that to-day there is a public opinion, which then was not; and it is that public opinion every thing is really referred. Bismarck is a Tory of the blue blood. But he understands that he can go no further than public opinion every thing is really referred. Bismarck is a Tory of the blue blood. But he understands that he can go no further than public opinion every thing is really referred. Bismarck is a Tory of the blue blood. But he is a painful fact—and one that should be startling to the friends of a national system of education that it shall cease to be a fact—that we are no longer the most generally educated people in the world. The public opinion which was established by the Bureau of Education show some very disagreeable facts upon this subject. And among the most disagreeable facts which should devote itself this is certainly one of the chief—to devise some method of compelling the people to learn. The safety of the system and Union by making the most ample educational provision; while in each State where this provision is made it should be the first duty and duty of compelling every child to take advantage of it should be stringently inculcated.

"I should be sorry," said MR. MENDELSA, "if I did not frankly tell you that North Germany and Switzerland excel you in the thoroughness and universality of their systems, and this, I believe, is entirely owing to the fact that in those countries the parent has not the right to deprive the child of the excellent training which the state has provided. When the parent fails in his duty the state stands in loco parentis; and this is what you chiefly need to perfect your educational system."

TOURS NEWS.

IF very large headings were history, the Germans would seem to be in mortal peril in France. But it must be the same people described with elaborate detail the triumphant escape of the CHILDE HAROLDS from the Turks, who informs us that MOLTKE is frightened, that BISMARCK is astonished, that every body who understands the situation perceives it is great peril, and that the unhappy KING WILLIAM would hurry back to Berlin if he could; but, as an escort unfortunately could not be spared, he must stay in France and await his doom. This is the Tours style of news. It is the growth of the same spirit and good sense which in Paris first called the story of the surrender of METZ a lie, and when it was established denounced it as treason. The German army is not conquered, nor is the moral tone of France restored, because a superior force of the French has beaten a German force. The French success at Orleans seemed greater because of the uninterrupted series of German triumphs. But the dispatch from Versailles which announced the victory of the French, but stated it somewhat more moderately, ceased, like all the German official accounts, to be true, which can not be said of the French reports, which always seem to be inspired by GAMBETTA.

Indeed, in considering the situation in France, it is impossible not to feel more and more deeply the terrible misfortune which was wrought by the empire. The republic was proclaimed on the 1st of September. M. GAMBETTA confidently asserts that the republic is invincible. We are invited by many eloquent appeals to sympathize with the French republic. What is the French republic? Where is it? Tours is a Committee of Defense, which, with great propriety, and from the necessity of the case, has assumed the functions of the Government. But a few French gentlemen are not a French republic. There has been no appeal to the people, no ratification by the people. The French cities would undoubtedly give large majorities for the republic. But the mass of the general population, led by the priests, would probably pronounce as strongly against it. It is a needless confusion to speak of a self-appointed committee as the republic, because they call all their proclamations with a vote a republique. We are not censuring them. They did the best that the circumstances allowed. But it is undoubtedly an error to suppose that France is republican.

It was the policy of LOUIS NAPOLEON to depend upon the rural population of France, and to keep it as ignorant as possible by putting education into the hands of the priests. His Minister of Education, DUBUY, made valuable reports and excellent suggestions. His array of statistics was mainly interesting and improving. But while there was a great apparent activity in that direction, what may be called free education steadily declined, the result was disintegration of the nation, which is shown upon every hand, is revealed also by the decline of the higher corporate schools. France was no longer the university of the world. The young surgeons and physicians from other countries go to Vienna and have gone there for ten years. The chemists studied at Giessen and Berlin. The art of France had become showy and elaborately mechanical. Its music was OFFENBACH'S—fit music for the society it entertained. In every department France declined, like under one empire, but how badly only the catastrophe revealed.

At this moment it is doubtful whether the truest and most patriotic Frenchmen are not the Orleanists. But the services of its leaders were declined by the Committee of Defense. Meanwhile the demoralization of the empire has been so terrible, and the tone of the present authorities is so hollow and rhetorical, that the chance of an unhappy country at last in the deepest gloom. Even if a great reverse should occur, and the Germans be driven from the country, it is impossible to foretell of whose advantage the victory would be turned.

NOTES.

WE are glad to learn that the fair now in progress in the armories of the Seventh Regiment, and Broadway, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the relief of French soldiers wounded in the German service, promises to be no less successful than the fair held recently by the Germans. It has been well attended every day since the opening, and the tasteful and attractive display of articles for sale has induced a very liberal outlay on the part of the visitors. At a time when the whole of Europe appears to be preparing for war, every effort to alleviate the sufferings of the sick and wounded are encouraging to the friends of humanity. Americans are the friends of France in these war, and contribute with equal liberality to the relief of French and Germans.

PAUL ROSENEKE, whose magnificent silhouettes illustrations to SHAKESPEARE'S "Midsummer Night's Dream" are well known to our readers, has lately employed his extraordinary talent as a new field—that of illustrating children's books. His pictures for a little volume called "Puck's Nightly Pranks," published by ROBERTS BROTHERS, are both graceful and amusing, and will give quite as much pleasure to "children of a larger growth" as to the children of the nursery.

"MOTHER GOOSE in her New Dress" is the title of a very attractive edition of the popular old nursery rhymes, illustrated by a daughter of the Chief Justice of the United States. The book was originally prepared as a birthday present to a granddaughter, and therefore has the air of a book of publication; but the young and gifted artist was happily persuaded to allow the public to share the pleasure which GRACE GOATES, to share the pleasure which was intended only for intimate friends. The drawings show a delicate fancy and happy sense of humor.

FREEDOM of the press, as understood in England and America, makes slow progress in continental Europe. Even so enlightened a statesman as COUNT BISMARCK has so little conception of it that he foils into the mistake of remonstrating with the Belgian government for allowing Belgian editors to comment unfavorably on Prussian affairs. It is not surprising that some of the Southern German states, where the press is comparatively free, hesitate to accede to Prussia's demand that in the United German Empire legislation regarding newspapers and public meetings should belong to the Imperial Parliament.

DURING the last war between France and Austria the German clergy preached crusade against French fashions—crinoline coming in for the larger share of their denunciations. This year the anti-French sentiment breaks out in a petition on the part of the Berlin clergy for the prohibition of OFFENBACH'S operettas and the French dances.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE MILITARY SITUATION IN FRANCE.

THE French victory over the army of General VON DER TANN appears to have been less important than at first reported, the only real advantage gained by the French being the recognition of Orleans. WILLIAM has telegraphed to QUEEN AUGUSTA that on the 11th December the combined forces of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg and General VON DER TANN defeated the French near Beaune. The town had was captured, and occupied by the Prussians. The latest dispatches from Versailles state that the Duke of Mecklenburg and General VON DER TANN are falling back upon Dijon. The same dispatch says it is thought General MANTEUFFEL will relieve Belfort. According to a dream dispatch a German attack on Evreux, about forty miles south of Rouen, was repulsed. There has been a good deal of activity in the operations in the North, but no decisive engagement has occurred. The bombardment of Montmédy is now confined to the French fortifications. On Wednesday, December 7th, the Germans withdrew from the besieged place by two companies of the Seventy-first Regiment, and every one was made prisoner.

Letters from Tours state that the country resents with activity the disorder in supply system, and all the unoccupied districts are actively engaged in preparing war material. The Army of the Loire is reported nearly ready for sale. Prussian dispatches continuing valuable information have been found at Orleans by the French.

It is reported that England has renewed her proposal to the Government of Tours to guarantee a pecuniary loan, the raising of the frontier fortresses, and the security of Alsace and Lorraine, the power however future French governments to repudiate any of the conditions by way of compensation.

Contradictory reports are received concerning the evacuation of Metz by German troops before Paris. One stand they are said to be drying by thousands of sickness and hunger. The Germans are in possession of Camp Mile; on the other they are said to be in excellent health and spirits, and not at all anxious for the war to end.

A NEW COMPLICATION.

The situation in Europe has suddenly and unexpectedly received a new complication by the announcement of Russia for the abrogation of the treaty of 1856. The Czar addressed a circular to the powers, which declares that Russia considers herself released from the obligations of European treaties, and among them the treaty of 1856, which by the treaty of 1856 has forbidden, declares that Russia is unable to see why she should observe the treaty of 1856 while other powers violate others, and accordingly disowns the obligation to limit her armaments on the Black Sea, and declares Turkey to the equal participation in the privileges claimed. The circular concludes with the words "This is not a Russian question," and says Russia only desires increased development. The circular has been received by the Russian government, arranging the question at issue by a conference.

The circular of Prince GORTSCHAKOFF was officially dressed to the British ambassador at St. Petersburg, and by him received the complaint made by Russia that the treaty has been violated to her prejudice, and stated by saying that it was impossible for the British government to give any sanction to the course undertaken by Prince GORTSCHAKOFF. The Earl of Earl GRANVILLE are shared in by Austria and France, each of which has been violated by Russia, and will refuse to adopt the same policy. Russia has replied to Earl GRANVILLE that a conciliatory tone will remain firm in the position originally adopted. She denies the violation of the treaty, and declares that the concentration of the Russian fleet is to her advantage; declares that a congress is impracticable at present, but will not be opposed to a conference. Gladstone say hostile intentions or desire to disregard any of the stipulations of the treaty of Paris but those which are generally admitted to be unjust and oppressive against Turkey and express her intention to act upon the previous notification in regard to the Black Sea.

The Russian circular has been well received in the Mediterranean to observe Russian movements. A Russian squadron has been provided gun-boats is said to be already in the Black Sea.

LATEST FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Duke of Aosta, second son of the King of Italy, was elected King of Spain by the Cortes on the 16th of November. The proclamation of the result of the election was received in Spain with the greatest disturbances, and the military precautions were found necessary.

The British government has replied to the German proposal for the neutralization of the Black Sea, that the consent of the other powers must be obtained.

A British gun-boat is to be stationed at New Chaay, on the Mekong river. Affairs at Siam are still said in an unsatisfactory condition. Minister Low advises the misunderstanding between Cambodia and governments exist.

Contradictory reports are received concerning the condition of Metz. One report from Tours is that the condemned they are said to be dying by thousands of sickness and hunger. The Germans are in possession of Camp Mile; on the other they are said to be in excellent health and spirits, and not at all anxious for the war to end.

A NEW COMPLICATION.

The situation in Europe has suddenly and unexpectedly received a new complication by the announcement of Russia for the abrogation of the treaty of 1856. The Czar addressed a circular to the powers, which declares that Russia considers herself released from the obligations of European treaties, and among them the treaty of 1856, which by the treaty of 1856 has forbidden, declares that Russia is unable to see why she should observe the treaty of 1856 while other powers violate others, and accordingly disowns the obligation to limit her armaments on the Black Sea, and declares Turkey to the equal participation in the privileges claimed. The circular concludes with the words "This is not a Russian question," and says Russia only desires increased development. The circular has been received by the Russian government, arranging the question at issue by a conference.

The circular of Prince GORTSCHAKOFF was officially dressed to the British ambassador at St. Petersburg, and by him received the complaint made by Russia that the treaty has been violated to her prejudice, and stated by saying that it was impossible for the British government to give any sanction to the course undertaken by Prince GORTSCHAKOFF. The Earl of Earl GRANVILLE are shared in by Austria and France, each of which has been violated by Russia, and will refuse to adopt the same policy. Russia has replied to Earl GRANVILLE that a conciliatory tone will remain firm in the position originally adopted. She denies the violation of the treaty, and declares that the concentration of the Russian fleet is to her advantage; declares that a congress is impracticable at present, but will not be opposed to a conference. Gladstone say hostile intentions or desire to disregard any of the stipulations of the treaty of Paris but those which are generally admitted to be unjust and oppressive against Turkey and express her intention to act upon the previous notification in regard to the Black Sea.

The Russian circular has been well received in the Mediterranean to observe Russian movements. A Russian squadron has been provided gun-boats is said to be already in the Black Sea.

LATEST FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Duke of Aosta, second son of the King of Italy, was elected King of Spain by the Cortes on the 16th of November. The proclamation of the result of the election was received in Spain with the greatest disturbances, and the military precautions were found necessary.

The British government has replied to the German proposal for the neutralization of the Black Sea, that the consent of the other powers must be obtained.

A British gun-boat is to be stationed at New Chaay, on the Mekong river. Affairs at Siam are still said in an unsatisfactory condition. Minister Low advises the misunderstanding between Cambodia and governments exist.

The Protestant chapel at Fulstein has been destroyed by fire, but there was no violence done to persons.

The visit of Mr. Seward to Japan is described as the event of last month. The first interview ever accorded to a private individual by the Mikado was granted to Mr. Seward.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE forthcoming report of the Postmaster-General of the United States will show that the total number of letters carried during the fiscal year ending the year was 18,259,918 (an increase of 3,939,378 or 18 44-100 per cent. over the year 1869), and the number of letters mailed exchanged were $1,964,864, or 806,613 less than the previous year, owing to the abolishment of the Great Britain and other countries from January 1, 1870. The total cost of the service, including incidental expenses, was $1,107,976. Twelve postal conventions were made during the year, in all of which reduced rates of postage were agreed upon.

The annual report of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, now in press, presents, among other interesting facts, the following: The total imports into the United States during the year for the past fiscal year.

During the late hurricane in the West Indies several vessels were wrecked on the Salt Bank, Bahamas, of which the crews and cargoes were totally lost, no one surviving to tell the tale of disaster.

The Republican majority at the late election in Louisiana was 38,000, and the full delegation of Republican Congressmen was elected.

The Solicitor-General has decided that the proprietors of vessels running along the coast or on the lakes are entitled to the same rights and privileges as vessels plying in the foreign trade, as like express carriers.

The total amount of the receipts and expenditures of the United States government for all purposes, from its organization, March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1870, was $1,467,160,186 36.

THE PARIS RAMPARTS—TURNING OUT FOR DUTY.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

NON-COMBATANTS TRYING TO LEAVE METZ.—[SEE PAGE 779.]

THE COAST OF DONEGAL—SCENE OF THE WRECK OF THE "CAMBRIA."

THE DONEGAL COAST.

It is probable that we now know all we ever shall know concerning the loss of the steamship Cambria on the Donegal coast, whose rugged and dangerous character is shown in the sketch on this page. The one witness who survived the wreck was in his berth when the vessel struck, and can only speak to what took place afterward—of the lowering of the four boats, the overturning of that in which he had obtained a place, his half-unconscious clinging to the gunwale, the finding the dead body of a woman under the seats, and his weary hours of drifting until his final rescue. Bits of wreck, casks, and dead bodies washed on shore tell the rest of the tale, and whether the disaster was unavoidable or due to neglect is left to conjecture; but, in justice to the captain, it should be added that he had already given ample proofs of seamanship. In a former voyage his screw shaft had broken, and it was necessary to secure the loose screw, which was hanging against the stern, and threatening to beat a hole in the vessel. Slung by ropes, the captain superintended this difficult operation, a gale blowing at the time, and brought his vessel into port in safety. He was less fortunate this time, but the known danger of the coast and the violence of the weather are sufficient to account for the sad catastrophe.

This Donegal coast is rugged and rocky, with jutting headlands and dangerous islands. Inishtrahull Island, where the Cambria struck and went down, is a dangerous spot, and is marked with a light to warn mariners to give it a wide berth. Glen Head Point, not far distant, is another ugly place. It was here the Sydney lately foundered, nineteen out of a crew of twenty-one being drowned. The cliff here is about 800 feet in height, and right and left, as far as the eye can reach, from Sligo on the one hand to the Bloody Foreland on the other, stretches the long line of stern, picturesque, cruel rocks. A few miles south of this point is another headland, the "Slieb Ling," or Mountain of Flags, rising sheer up from the sea a height of 1972 feet. The position as well as the character of this coast makes it extremely dangerous for vessels from America.

A PRUSSIAN OUTPOST.

THE picturesque engraving below shows how the Prussians contrive to make themselves comfortable in France. A party of jolly fellows, having emptied a number of large wine-vats—we may take it for granted that the contents were not wasted—cut them in two and used them as guard-houses. The effect at night, as shown in the illustration, was most singular and striking. The ruddy glare of the bivouac fires illuminating these curious extemporized shelters, and the stacked muskets, with the spiked helmets hung upon them, made an effect that would delight a painter's heart. One almost envies these jolly comrades their picturesque and comfortable shelter.

AN ADVANCED PRUSSIAN POST.

THE FOUNTAIN OF TEARS.

Ir you go over desert and mountain,
For into the country of sorrow,
To-day and to-night and tomorrow,
And maybe for months and for years,
You shall come, with a heart that is bursting
For trouble and toiling and thirsting—
You shall certainly come to the fountain
At length—to the Fountain of Tears.

Very peaceful the place is, and sobby
For grievous lamenting and sighing,
And those who come living or dying
Alike find their hopes and their fears;
Pall of supreme-like shadows the place is,
And statues that cover their tears;
But out of the gloom springs the holy
And beautiful Fountain of Tears.

And it flows, and it flows, with a motion
So gentle and lovely and listless,
And murmurs a tune resistless
To fill each with stillness and peace—
You shall surely, without a word spoken,
Kneel down there and know your heart broken,
And yield to the long-aching emotion
That day by the Fountain of Tears.

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Corbyn's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

WITCHERY.

Carew of Crompton was really dead, men said, "at last," not that he had been ailing long, or was an old man, but that he had eventually succumbed to one of those deadly fevers to which he had so often voluntarily exposed himself. On the occasion which had been fatal to him he had started from home one frosty morning at the gallop, with a cigar in his mouth, the reins on his horse's neck, and both his hands in his pockets, and had been pitched off and broken his neck within half a mile of his own door. His daughter, who had dispatched the news to Mrs. Basil, had been riding by his side at the very moment. "He was a good friend to me," was the laconic remark that poor Parson Whymper had added to the bare intelligence.

To judge by the regretful excitement in the Midlands, Carew might have been a good friend to every body. The news was at once telegraphed to town, and appeared in the morning papers. The public interest in his mad freaks had of late years grown somewhat flat—his extravagances were, perforce, on a less splendid scale—but his death revived it. "So that mad Carew has killed himself, after all," was the observation which many overheard that evening, as acquaintance met acquaintance on their homeward way from business. "Well, he's had his whack of most things," was the reply of the philosophers: "He has not left much to grumble at, for his daughter inherits, I reckon," of the cynics. "He was a decent good fellow at bottom, I believe," remarked those who were secretly desirous of earning the same eulogium for themselves; "He was altogether wrong at top," answered the others.

Solomon Cee came home to his new abode in such a state of elation that it could hardly communicate to his wife. Mrs. Basil happened to be with her in the drawing-room, but he only acknowledged her presence by a hasty nod. "Well, what d'ye think, Carew of Crompton, that was your father's husband and mine?" Solomon never said "ours" with reference to property—"has broken his neck at last!"

Of course the very name of Carew was a sore subject between man and wife, on account of Richard Tucker's connection with him; but it assured Solomon's purpose on this occasion to ignore that circumstance. It would be necessary for some time to come to allude to the Crompton property more or less, and it was just as well to begin at once; it was also rather embarrassing to do so in the presence of a third person.

"Yes, Solomon, I knew Mr. Carew was dead," said Harry, gravely. The next instant she turned scarlet with the consciousness of her thoughtless indiscretion.

"Oh, granted her husband, annoyed at what he deemed her silky manner, when he himself was so grossly unskilled in the art of dissembling, and also displeased to find his news anticipated, "you've been buying an evening paper, have you? Then you have more information than I know what to do with, it seems to me."

Harry was thankfully conscious of this imputation in silence, when Mrs. Basil's soft voice was heard. "No, Sir; it was I who told your good lady. I had a letter from Parson Whymper by the afternoon's post."

"The devil you did!" cried Solomon, turning sharply upon her. "How came that about?"

"I was housekeeper at Crompton, Sir, in old Mrs. Carew's time, for some years, and one of the servants wrote to let me know of the accident."

"Housekeeper, were you?" said Solomon, with interest. "That must have been a good place, with deused good pickings, eh?"

"Solomon, Solomon," remonstrated his wife, in a low voice. "Mrs. Basil is quite a lady. Don't you see that you offend her?"

It is more than probable that, under ordinary circumstances, Mr. Cee would have resented this rebuke with choleric vehemence; but he had his reasons for being good-humored in the present instance. "You must excuse my country manners, Mrs. Basil," said he. "As my wife will tell you, I must always have my joke. I meant no offense. So you were housekeeper at Crompton, were you? Well, now, that's exactly for Mrs. Cee's father and I myself, as you heard me saying, have had a great deal to do with Carew. You know him well, of course?"

"Yes, Sir; I did."

"And the place too, of course. That was a fine one, was it not? Plenty of pictures and looking-glasses, and things?"

"It was very richly furnished."

It was curious to mark the difference of manner between questioner and respondent. Solomon, small as reticent and reserved, was Greek quite voluble. Mrs. Basil, on the other hand, naturally so open and expansive, seemed to reply with difficulty. She was weighing every word.

"The estate, I suppose, was out of your beat; you did not know much to do with that?"

"I used to walk in the park, Sir, most days."

"Ay; but the property was entailed. My friend who writes you to-day don't say any thing about that, I suppose—whether any of it is to be sold or not, for instance?"

"The report—of course, being a servant, she can only speak from hearsay—is that Mr. Carew's affairs are in a sad state. Every thing, I believe, is to be sold at once. The whole estate is said to be—I don't know if I use the right term—mortgaged."

"Just so," rejoined Solomon; "yes, yes. That is, no doubt." There was a slight pause; Mrs. Basil contrived, and was about to leave the room. "Stop a bit, ma'am," said Solomon. "My wife tells me that you are a lone woman—a widow. Perhaps you'd like to take a bit of dinner with us to-day?"

Harry began to think her husband was intoxicated. He did get occasionally, and under any particularly good stroke of business was in course of progress, and on such occasions his manners were unusually affable; but she had never seen him half so gracious as at present. Hospitality, though he did sometimes exercise a lavish agent or a broker home to dinner, was by no means his strong point. Mrs. Basil looked doubtfully at the dress, which, though neat, was by no means well-made and ill-like, and murmured something about its being almost the dinner-hour, and there being "no time."

"Oh, never mind your gown" (which, by-the-by, Solomon pronounced "gaown"); "we're quite plain people ourselves, as my wife will tell you. I've shall have to ask you to sit. Where's Charley? That boy's always late."

But at that very moment the young gentleman in question entered the room at the same time as did the servant with the announcement that dinner was on the table.

The astonishment of the domestic at seeing her mistress taken down to the dining-room by the new lodger was only exceeded by that of Charley, as with his mother on his arm, he followed the strangely-assorted pair. "I knew she was a witch," he murmured, "with her human skull and her Joanna Southcott; but this beats all. Margery's dead, at Corbin."

"Hush, hush!" whispered his mother, for Charley's high spirits were apt to overflow, and jarred her when exhibited in his father's presence: "they have found they have a common acquaintance in the late Mrs. Carew."

"Father didn't know Swelenborg, did he?" answered the young man, shyly. "Because, if he knew him as he has black coat on the stairs. She can make any body do it, as I was telling you, Mother, when you had been to Soho since the morning); "I shall be the next victim, no doubt. It's no use saying to myself, 'Thou shalt not marry a housekeeper.' Her charms are too powerful for the flesh. Ah, Mother, I see she'll be mine."

Mr. Charles was right in that particular of his diagnosis of their new guest. Mrs. Basil did treat that deceitful formula, which I fear we never committed to pronounce, in spite of her husband's unconventional mode of introducing her to audience. She sat opposite to Charley, and more than once, when he looked up suddenly, he caught her gazed earnestly upon him. Those wondrous eyes of hers yet shone forth bright as ever like chests of steel. He had noticed that though her brow had many a wrinkle, they were the footprints of thought and care, rather than of years.

The conversation, as was natural where the company are of such various degrees, was each other, turned upon the topics of the day, and the objects in the room, some of which, as we know, were sufficiently remarkable. "Where's the request Mrs. Basil once more narrated the story of the child; and then continued, with a sudden tongue, the biography of poor Joanna. Up stairs, she said, she had one of that lady's "seals"—passed from Joanna herself—which she would bestow as a present upon the young gentleman opposite. A typical human delighted Charley, and won the approbation of his father—not the less so, perhaps, since he saw it annoyed his wife.

Poor Harry was a simple well-meaning woman in her way, and, had the circumstances of her life been less complicated, would have earned the reputation of a good creature and steadfast friend—good, that is, for her own sex only; for all the places most suitable to our dispositions; the restive are often compelled to run in harness, and the quiet low-born goers, who would never come restrain, are left without guide, and with no course marked out for them. Such it was with Mrs. Cee. The situation in which Fate had placed her it was altogether beyond her powers to fill. She knew that Basil was rapidly ingratiating herself with her husband, and so far was furthering their common plan; but, notwithstanding its supreme importance, she shrank from the means that were bidding fair to accomplish her own end. She shuddered at her husband's vulgar ejaculations of assent and approval, at her son's thoughtlessness; at this woman's sparkling and audacious talk. She suspected no purposeless, and yet was so full of design and craft. She had feared her and shrank from her at Gethin, and she feared her now. And yet how necessary was her assistance! Of her own self she was well aware that she could do nothing to avert that coming peril from her husband and her son, the shadow of which had darkened all her married life, and was now deepening into blackest doom. It was absolutely necessary that Mrs. Basil should obtain the confidence of Solomon, and perhaps of Charley also, and yet this unlooked-for and swift success of hers was far from welcome to poor Harry. It seemed almost second that there was truth in what her son had spoken in jest—that there was witchcraft in it.

Solomon was talking earnestly to Mrs. Basil in low tones, while Charley looked toward his mother with inquiring eyebrows, and a comic expression, which seemed to say, "She's got him, you see; I did see a black cat on the stairs."

If she could have overheard her husband's talk, it would have been inexplicable to her.

"Then you think this sale at Crompton will take place directly after the funeral?"

"I should certainly imagine so—yes."

"There is something—you needn't tell my wife, because I wish it to be a surprise for her—that I should like to buy at it; something I have long had my eye on."

"Some piece of furniture, I suppose. Well, you must be prepared to give a good sum, I fear. From the contents of the thing—the repetition, I mean, of poor Mr. Carew—it is likely things will fetch more than their price."

"Perhaps so. But I should like to know, as soon as possible, when the sale comes off. From your connection with the place, you will be able to get news of this before the general public—I mean the exact date."

"No doubt. I will write to-morrow, and bet that the information may be sent me."

"I should feel much obliged if you would, Mrs. Basil."

"I'll write this very night. You wish to know the day on which the sale of the furniture may be fixed?"

"Yes; and of all the other things: of the estates so to speak, for instance; there may be some land that may prove a good investment. Don't make a fuss about it, but say you have a friend who is interested. The catalogue of effects, with the dates appointed for the sale of each, will, of course, be sent down there. I want to have an early copy."

"That is very simple," said Mrs. Basil, making a memorandum in her pocket-book: "you shall be among the very first to get one, Mr. Cee—you may rely on that."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

OVER THE ROOF.

Richard Yorke is still at Lingmoor; and though but a few thousands intervene between him and freedom—or perhaps partly because of it—prison life is growing insupportable. It is the last week but one, "a long term," as all "old hands" will tell you, which is the most trying. Impatience then becomes a positive agony, as the limit of suffering is neared; and just as, after a tedious and dangerous illness, the convalescent is more than ever at risk a relapse in his feverish desire to be well, so a prisoner will often make some wild endeavors to escape, even if he did but wait a little—a span of time compared with that in which he has lain captive—his sentence does seem to consist of themselves to let him pass in safety. But there are other reasons (though he does not suspect them) for the step which are pressing (he feels) to madness if he remain quiescent. He has quarreled with all about him, and has suffered for it; and he is now menaced with severe things. Solitude, and his brooding ire, have long transformed him into a cruel tyrant; and every obedience have become impossible for him. He kicks, as it were, against a chevaux de frise of steel. He has been punished on bread and water, and grown thin and fierce. He has been put, and not for nothing, into the dark cell for hours, by stool, as usual, and has come forth a more reckless devil than he went in.

His worst foe is the prison surgeon. That cross-grained official has taken a strong antipathy to him, which is more than reciprocated, and every time he enters his cell sets foot, though unconscious of the fact, on the very threshold of death. He is the keeper of those who is almost a madman; but the latter is sane on one point yet—he knows to whom his vengeance is owing—and while this knowledge lasts his loser foe is safe from him—safe, that is, as regards any personal violence. The fact which would compel this long-suffering victim—in years scarce a middle-aged man, in appearance a great deal older—at the oldest within these prison walls—to give his passion way, and slay him. Richard Yorke should take pains, and his warder himself has prophesied would happen, it will be so; and all Richard's hoarded hate would be spent at once, since it would have no heir. There has been flogging in the prison—an unusual punishment, and only inflicted for a great offenses, or for continued contumacy and bad conduct. A conspiracy was discovered, and the ringleaders received their punishment in lashes each, in presence of all the inmates of the jail. It was a punishment perhaps severer than need necessary, but sickening enough to witness. Richard's warder stood beside him, and while the cat was descending on one wretch's naked back, observed in a grim whisper: "Do you take warning, my man; for if you are reported again, the governor says you are to have a dose of the same medicine."

The warder spoke truth or not, Richard believed him. It was more than probable that he would be reported, and by the surgeon if the latter officer was not. In a revlevemouth's time there were three hundred and sixty-five opportunities, ten times told, of its being fulfilled. If such a sentence was ever passed upon him, as it was almost sure to be, Richard was well resolved that it should not be carried out; rather should this man die, and he himself, his slayer, be hung for it. His desire for vengeance upon those who had blasted his young life so cruelly was as strong as ever—was stronger, perhaps, but he knew that he could never bear the lash. Somehow or other, therefore, at all risks, he must escape from Lingmoor.

Robert Balfour was to be set free in a few days, his conduct, though not good, having averted that mark of remission. Richard was not envious of him, yet the contrast of their two positions made him perhaps more desperate and reckless. Of late months the old man had been admitted to certain privileges accorded to such as have almost worked out their time, or who are otherwise recommended for them. He had been employed as "a cleaner," then as "a special"—in which position he was permitted to work out of doors without an attendant warder, and even (in his particular case, for he was growing very old and feeble) to have leave of absence for an hour or two. On some occasions it was his duty to bring round the prisoners' meals; and to these he saw Richard, and could even exchange a word or two with him alone. This happened upon the afternoon of the day when the public flogging had taken place.

"Balfour," said Richard, earnestly, "will you do me a favor?"

"Yes, lad, any thing," replied the old man, softly. The word "lad" seemed so inapplicable to that gray-headed, cowed, broken wreck, which he had known so young and comely, that the misuse of it touched the speaker. "You know I will."

"Even though you should run a risk, said Richard, within a day or two of your freedom?"

"Ay; for your sake, I would do that and more."

"God bless you, if there be a God!" answered those haggard lips. "Ask leave to go to the village to-morrow, and get me a file."

"Hush!—the warder."

The conversation thus interrupted was resumed in whispers.

"Here is the file," said Balfour; "hide it in your mattress. But, lad, you will not attempt to use it. I pray you be patient. It is only a twelvemonth now."

Richard shook his head, with a ghastly smile. "I must try," said he.

"Nay, you will be retaken and flogged—lad; think of that."

"I shall never be retaken, Balfour, at least alive."

It was easy enough to read in Richard's face the corroboration of his words.

"Have you any plan?" asked the old man, disconsolately.

"I have. From my window here I see an open shed, with a coil of rope in it. I shall file my bars, and get that rope to-night; climb back to my window, and then over the roof. I can reach the distance from outside. I feel sure I can reach the ground with my hands, and so drop upon the window-ledge, then let myself down into the exercising-yard upon the west side."

"You have thought about this, my lad—free high, lad."

"There is a spout in the north corner which will help me up; and if I reach the top without a broken neck, I make fast my rope, and slide down to the moor. Then comes the question how dark it is—and it will be pitch-dark, I reckon—I can make through Wood. No power on earth shall stop me. If you told the warder yonder of my plan this moment, I should still escape from him, and most certainly from you. To look at him and read the resolute despair in his white face were to have no doubt of that."

"But must be must be, sighed the old man. "But for my sake, lad—for mine, who love you as my own son—show more than patient till to-morrow. This is my last day at Lingmoor. To-morrow I shall be free. If you but ought to wait till the west yard, and throw a rope over the north corner, close by the spout, I could get more easily down that on my side, and if you do but lay hold of it, the rest is easy. Your scheme, as it now stands, is impossible. No warder expects it. Wait, good, for less a man reduced as you are;" and he repeated significantly the lizard's thrusdom text.

"You are the best of friends, Balfour—indeed, the only man that ever was my friend." Richard spoke truly: only an unfortunate that was so strange to him. "At midnight then, to-morrow, I shall be at the spout. If not an hour from that time, if all goes well, I shall be at the spot appointed. If I fail, you will remember my plans?"

"Yes, yes; but you will not fail. Keep a good heart, lad. Think of your wife, as he hurried away at an approaching footstep.

But, in reality, Balfour had no hope. His experience of life, and his knowledge of the difficulties to be surmounted in the prescribed escape, forbade any expectation of Richard's success, even in the matter of getting outside the prison walls; and, supposing that was effected, the wood remained. He had to be looked for further but slow starvation or death from cold and exposure, and most probably the last. Still Balfour's help was promised, and would be given; the old cracksman had many faults and vices, but he was not one to desert a friend at a pinch, and Richard Yorke was really dear to him.

As for Richard, notwithstanding the seasonableness of the other's offer, and although he had not the slightest intention of making use of such aid he could never effect his object, no sooner than he felt sickest that he regretted that he had possed his word to put off the attempt another day. Suppose he should transgress some prison regulation between this and then, or be reported by his hostile attendant without having committed a transgression! There were thirty-six hours of such perilous delay before him, and his impatience was already at fever-heat. By standing on his metal wash-stand, and peering through his bars, he could see that the coil of rope still lay in its accustomed place that afternoon, but would it remain there till to-morrow night? The very act of thus climbing to his window, which he could not resist, was a suspicious thing, and if by any chance he should be found in possession of the file—then all was over. He was fully determined only to part with life by the file itself. For once, the picture of Trevethick and his son-in-law (for he had heard about before he left Cross Key of Harry's marriage with his rival), unsuspecting, complacent, and exposed to the full force of his revenge, failed to rise before gloating thoughts; they were fixed as ever there, but on the means and not upon the end—the means by which the ingenious and daring enterprise. He feared the warder should read that forbidden word "Escape" in his eager eyes, or on his restless lips. A change of cell or a sudden examination of his bed-furniture—no uncommon occurrence—would prove his ruin. He took the file out of his mattress, and placed it in his breast: let that man beware who followed in there!

At last the long night, which should have found him free, passed by, and the next weary day. The anticipated time had come.

It was past midnight, and not a sound was heard in the vast prison; there was no noise but a few stars shone on him as he worked at the iron bars; the nose of his file was muffled —he had rubbed it with some of his own coat now and then he paused and listened. He half fancied he could hear the distant tramp of the patrols, who, musket in hand, watched the walls of Lingmoor from the roofs of its four stone towers; but he was only fancying it, as there was no one else but they was stirring. Years ago he had gauged those bars, and calculated that but a few hours must be seen through to give his body room to pass; but that was when he was young and plump and vigorous. He was vigorous now—he fretted within him seemed to give him the strength of ten—but he was an old man to look at, and the flesh had left his bones. So much the better: there were only two bars to file instead of three. Finding the upper one would be twitted in his blanket into a rope, fastened it to the broken bars, and so, by its aid, slipped noiselessly into the yard.

That portion of the prison was low, and consisted but of two stories: under the window was immediately beneath his own, but, as he knew, it was not used for prisoners. Still, he trembled as he slipped past it. Fortunately, he had been pushed through to clasp his limbs, or a voice had given the alarm, as he passed the watchful patrols! But his feet touched ground in safety. His eyes, accustomed for long years to observe the darkness, could distinguish that the shed and to the coil of rope. He seized it as the shipwrecked mariner clutches that which is thrown him from the shore to drag him through the roaring breakers, and then, winding it about his waist, he retraced his steps. The ascent to his cell window was comparatively easy; but to stand upon its narrow ledge, and, clutching the parapet with his fingers, to raise himself by thereby, was a task that few, without the hope of liberty to spur them, could have accomplished. Three times he failed; without something more of purchase for his hold, he felt the thing was beyond his powers. The strength of a giant, he was the stone coping? If, by a sudden spring, he could catch the other side of it, he might succeed; but if he missed, his hands would slide from the smooth surface, his feet could not regain their stand-point, and he would fall backward twenty feet or so upon the stone courtyard.

There was nothing for it but to run the risk. He gathered his strength together, shut his eyes, and made a vigorous upward spring—caught a firm gripe, and, after a hard struggle, with chest or gained it; then he drew himself slowly up, and lay down in the gutter of the roof to gather breath and look about him. The prison was built like the four sides of a square, and, as he peered, with the high wall circling round it, did closely resemble that image. Nearly the whole of the building could have been seen, had it been light enough, from his present position; but, as it was, only the west wing was distinguishable, with its guardian tower standing blackly up against its dark back-ground of wintry night sky. He could not make out the sentry on the top of the now and then, when his circuit brought him nearest to his lofting-place, he could hear his measured foot-fall.

Like a creeping thing, for he scarce used hand or foot at all, Richard slowly crawled along the sloping roof, then swiftly over the vertex, while the patrol was at the other extremity of his round, and then once more, motionless and almost breathless, he by down behind the western parapet. The perpendicular into which it was his object to drop, was just below him: but it was necessary to find some object to which to fasten his rope; and here he perceived how futile would have been his plan of escape without assistance from without: for here, having slid down it, he must needs leave his rope tied to a neighboring chimney, which was not length enough to cut off, and be of any service afterward for the descent of the external wall, nigh sixty feet in height. If Balfour failed him, it was gone, indeed, clear to him that his whole design must fail. Yonder towering wall, higher even than his own present elevated position, could never be scaled by foot and hand, with only the help of a spoon-rope, he doubted whether, even if he found the promised rope in position, he could even make use of that; for, though agile, he had none of the sailor's cunning.

He made fast the coil which he had with him, however, and watching his opportunity, slid off the parapet into space. Such a fall seems easy enough to read of; but to slide without noise down a loose and swinging rope for so great a distance is no slight-task to one unused to such gymnastics; and besides he had to check himself at intervals (which took the skin off from his hands, although at the time he did not feel it), as his head suddenly struck the wall with a heavy dull thud. He accomplished this in safety, and once more paused, like the sailor upon the iron yard, while the warder passed, whose form he could now even make out, it was so unmistakably narrow him; then he slipped the yard with a swift but anxious step to its north corner, and peered about in the gloom for the rope. Alas! no rope was there, smooth and ineffectual enough as a means of exit, but no rope.

His heart died within him; his hands trembled with anxiety and trepidation as they felt in vain for it along the smooth cold wall. Richard's brain began to reel. He leaned his trembling brow against the cold iron of the fence, and endeavored to collect his scattered ideas. He was sure of Balfour; he felt certain that nothing but sudden and dangerous illness would have prevented him from keeping his promise. But perhaps he had not been able to obtain a rope; such things were prohibited articles even in the neighborhood of Lingmoor Prison, and might even not be procurable. Yet had such been the case, Balfour could not have deliberated that form of assistance. He was of opinion that the rope must be there, then; so, it must have been thrown over by means of a stone, or weight of some kind. In that case, if the stone had rolled after reaching the ground, the rope might not be hanging like a plumb-line from the wall, but at an angle, and, if so, it was possible that, when he began to move, then, in a parallel line from the wall, still feeling right and left, and on the third trial he found the stretched-out hand a string—a string-line such as a boy uses for his kite; and his heart leaped at the ineffable joy of such means to effect his purpose from him with despair. But presently pulling on the string, he found it was tied to it in hand, and pulling softly on, more string, and then an end of thin but wire-strong cord, and then more cord. He was certain of all way, that this rope was knotted at intervals of every foot, so as to afford a hand-hold.

After many yards of this had been hauled in he found resistance: the end of it was evidently fast on the other side. He pulled more, and found the bottom of the iron spout, and beneath an iron clasp, that prevented its being pulled off, he found a knot. It was a perilous bridge even then, and supposing the watcher with his round had not been there, as he was certain enough of him; but it led from prison walls to liberty, and Richard felt himself master of it. He crossed it, drawing himself to it. Hand over hand, foot after foot, he dragged himself with infinite but slowly upward; but a heavier task was the power to watch the patrol, and secure the most favorable moment for crossing the roof, as he had done on the side of the roof. As ill luck would have it, just as the sentry came to the northward portion of his beat, Richard found himself vaguely visible against the sky, though the very summit of the wall. The next instant the bell resounded in the night air—"Who's there?" had glided rapidly down upon the other side. The sentry's gun was at his shoulder, and the sharp report rang through the silent night as just as the convict reached the ground. The starlight was just sufficient to enable him to sequently swore (and truly), to see the man was hit; he staggered and fell backward against the wall, and was lost in the surrounding gloom.

At the same moment all the prison seemed to wake to light and life, and the whole place became but its hoarse notes of warning as the sentry gave

CHAPTER XXXIX.

NEWS FROM LINGMOOR.

MRS. BASIL kept her word with her lodger, and (thanks to the chaplain) gave into his hand a catalogue of the great Crompton sale some days at least before the details of it were made public; on the receipt of which Solomon at once left town. His absence was felt to be a relief by all parties. The work of translating herself with his hard, coarse nature, independently of the personal loathing she felt for him, had rendered him, on Richard's account, was very hard, and rest was grateful to her. Mrs. Coe had always seen at ease with business-men her husband from his home. Charley hailed his departure, since he could now enjoy the society of Agnes without stint.

He was, as usual, at Soho one morning, when Harry, sitting alone at the window, engaged in needle-work, was alarmed by a shrill shriek. Mrs. Basil, in the parlor. She had heard the front-door closed but a minute before, and the thought that she was never wholly alone in the house flashed upon it with terrible distinctness —the Avenger had returned! It was the first time the recollection was one of thankfulness that neither Charley nor Solomon was at home. Then, pale and trembling, she stole out to the landing of the stairs, and listened intently. Not a sound was to be heard save the throbs of her own fluttering breast. The cook and the waiting-maid, who alone composed the domestic staff, had apparently not heard the noise; for the former was singing loudly in the kitchen, as it was her wont when she had been "put out," as she phrased it, some dozen times per diem. It was frightful to think that in yonder parlor her once-loved Richard might even then be closeted with his mother, dead to her appeals for mercy, resolute for revenge, and only demanding where his enemies might be found: it was better to face him than to picture him thus. That his sudden appearance had terrified Mrs. Basil into a fit she had little doubt from that shriek and fall; and, indeed, she was now so still within there that she might be dead. The fear for her suffering, however, was not uppermost. Indeed, as has been said, she did not entertain any apprehension of personal violence at the hands of her son-in-law, in spite of Mrs. Basil's assurance to the contrary, she had some hope of reconciling him to his cut purpose by her prayers and tears. Step by step, and clinging to the hand-rail for support, for her limbs seemed to fail her, she descended the stairs, stood a moment in the passage, listening like a frightened hare, and then opened the parlor door. There was no one within it: yes, upon the hearth-rug lay the motionless form of Mrs. Basil, as she had fallen on her face; and, rushing forward, Harry knelt down beside her, and strove to lift her from the floor. Some instinct seemed to forbid her to call for assistance.

"What is it? what is it?" gasped the old woman, looking wildly up in the other's face.

"You have been unwell, dear madam. I am afraid you have had a shocking fit; but, thank Heaven, you are better now."

Harry was truly grateful first, that her original fear had proved to be unfounded; secondly, that Mrs. Basil was alive. She had contrived to place her in a sitting-posture, and was back against the heavy arm-chair; and now she brought a carafe of water from the side-board, and sprinkled it on her face and hands.

"Let me call Mary, and we will get you up to your own room as soon as you feel equal to the effort."

Mrs. Basil's eyes had closed again. Her face was white as death, and that of a corpse. The shock her head with vehemence. "The door—lock the door!" she murmured.

Harry was in consternation, for she began to fear that her companion was wandering in her mind. "Mary, Mary!" she cried, "Get me some wine. Oh, why did I ever wake to weary life again!"

"What has troubled you? Can any new misfortune have happened to us?" inquired Harry, wistfully.

"Is your concern," answered the old woman, with sudden fierceness; "to me—yes. Do you not know better?" Then, relapsing to one long lament the relief. "Twenty years ago that would have been my death-blow, but now I am old and weak. Like the man who lived on poisons, nothing kills. Read it—read it."

The letter was still under the envelope inmeuse, with "On her Majesty's Service" stamped upon it, and out of deference to the sentry counted, with an air as follows:

"MADAM,—I am instructed by the Governor of this jail to acquaint you with the sad news that your son, Richard Yorke, is no more. What would have been your proper duty, by night, and took refuge in an adjoining wood. His body was discovered early four days after, and an inquest held upon it, when a verdict was returned in accordance with the facts. I am, Madam, your obedient servant,

"THOMAS SPARKES (for the Governor).

"I am instructed to inclose a locket with miniature, which was found upon deceased on his arrival here. The rest of his property will be forwarded by rail."

This locket contained the little picture of Harry painted by Richard himself, and which, though he had contrived to secrete while at Cross Key, had been taken from him at Lingmoor.

Harry's breast was agitated by conflicting emotions: it was not unnatural that a mother's love could be no murder done—gave her a sense of intense relief, which could scarcely be called selfish. But that affection was but transient, and a passionate burst of sorrow succeeded it. The only man she had ever loved—except her husband—the most precious memories—had died, then, thus miserably, after miserably years of unavailing repentance and sorrow. She saw him with her mind's eye once more as when he had clasped her in his arms for the last time, and his ruined fortunes when he had raised his kisses on her lips beside the Wishing Well, and his youth and beauty and passion, after nine-teen years of loveless wedlock were swept away, and left her as she saw herself in the little group, her husband's portrait, and which was now his legacy. His memories and vows of vengeance against the lovers were all forgotten: her own mother's heart was loyal to him whom she had owned its lord, and once more filled with love.

"Oh, Richard, Richard, my dear love," cried she: "God knows I would have died to save you!"

"Come here, Harry—come here," whispered Mrs. Basil, "and let me kiss you. I would have died to save you, too; but the fountain of my tears has long been dry. I thought you would have been glad that you and your son were dead, and that retribution was averted from the man, your husband; but I now see I did you wrong. Your love is touched—you remember him as he was before the taint of crime was on him."

"Yes, yes, I remember him, Harry passionately. "He never meant to wrong my father of a shilling."

"Well said, dear Harry; well said. He was himself a wronged—a murdered man. Imprisoned for nineteen years, and then to perish thus! And yet men talk of Heaven's justice! My boy—my boy!"

The two women were silent for a while—the one gazing with dry eyes but tender yearning face upon the other, as she rocked herself to and fro, and shook with stifled sobs.

"Dear Harry, you must not desert me now," pleaded the former, pitifully: "I am very old, and this has broken me. He was my all—my only one on earth—and he is dead. I shall not trouble you long. We two, child, were the only ones that loved him, and we love him still. Let me cling to you, Harry, since it is but for a little while; and let us talk of him together, when we are alone, and think of what he was. So bright, so gay, so—Oh, my boy! my boy!"

The tears rolled to the latter's eyes at last. Hard Fate was softened for a while toward its life-long victim; and side by side sat the two bereaved women, each striving to comfort the other, after woman's fashion, by pointing in its weakness alone that dead Hope which both deplored. Begotten of their common sorrow, Love sprang up between them, and on one side confidence, and on the other forgiveness. Harry, for the first time, poured the story of her courtship, her marriage, and the estrangement between them to dead which it would seem to have destroyed. The fatal letter lay open on Harry's lap, but the envelope had fallen to the floor. Stooping to pick it up, she found something still within it—a piece folded slips from a local newspaper, with an account of the inquest, the details of which the governor's clerk had, perhaps humanely, preferred to communicate in that form, to be read or not as the mother's feelings might dictate to her. Upon the women read it together, not aloud, for neither had the voice for that. With most of the evidence there recounted we have become familiar. It appeared that Richard, No. 421 had long been in a desponding, brooding state; but, as only a mere statement, without the experience of his term of punishment, his attempt to escape was almost unaccountable, and certainly unpardonable. He committed the act in sending ever him. The opinion of the authorities was expressed that he had been insane during midnight. The method of obtaining his freedom showed indeed considerable cunning, but also an unaccountable want of consideration for safety. The height of the prisoner was known, and his proportionate reach of arm; and it seemed impossible that he could have succeeded in reaching the parapet above his cell windows: in that attempt he must have risked certain death. His descent from the roof was explained by the presence of the rope. The latter, however, could not have been entrusted to the external wall were, of course, evident enough, since the rope was there at last; but the means of getting it to it some there? The prisoner must have been aided by some one outside the walls. The warder who heard the shot which subsequently proved fatal had seen but one man; but the night was dark, and the assisting affair had passed unnoticed. Indeed, the convict had only fully shown himself when at the top of the wall, and the marker by the shot was not certain that the figure he saw there being given, pursuit was at once attempted; but, under cover of the night, the prisoner had gained Bergen Wood. The next morning his footsteps were traced so far, and it was proved that he was unaccompanied. A search was placed round the wood, and the place itself thoroughly searched, but no trace of the fugitive could be found. The report of the results who were made use of on such occasions, that the convict had not been in the wood, unless under in any hamlet in the neighborhood; the quest was therefore relinquished. The body was found on the three weeks afterward was No. 421 discovered. It was supposed that the unhappy fugitive had died of the exposure on the very night of his escape, for the body was so decomposed that it could never have been identified but for its convict clothes; the nights had been wet and tempestuous, and it lay in an unsheltered part of the wood, though within a few yards of a road and been once humanity. The bullet that had been the cause of death was, however, detected in the body.

What an end to the high-spirited, handsome boy that had been Harry's all in all! Gone, the joy of his betrothed! What wonder that they should have shed tears of it with bowed-down sat over the bald head and the gaps with only too easily imagined horrors! Each kept hold of the other's hand, though at times in spite of and bond between them, and sat close to one another in silence. Presently Harry rose, and, with a low sound of sobbing, left the house-door.

"That is Solomon," cried she.

"Impossible!" answered Mrs. Basil. "He told me himself that he should stop for the last day's sale, and to-day is but the fifth."

"Hush! hush!"

Yes, it was certainly Solomon's voice in the passages, and was followed by the sharp tones of his hard a male companion with him.

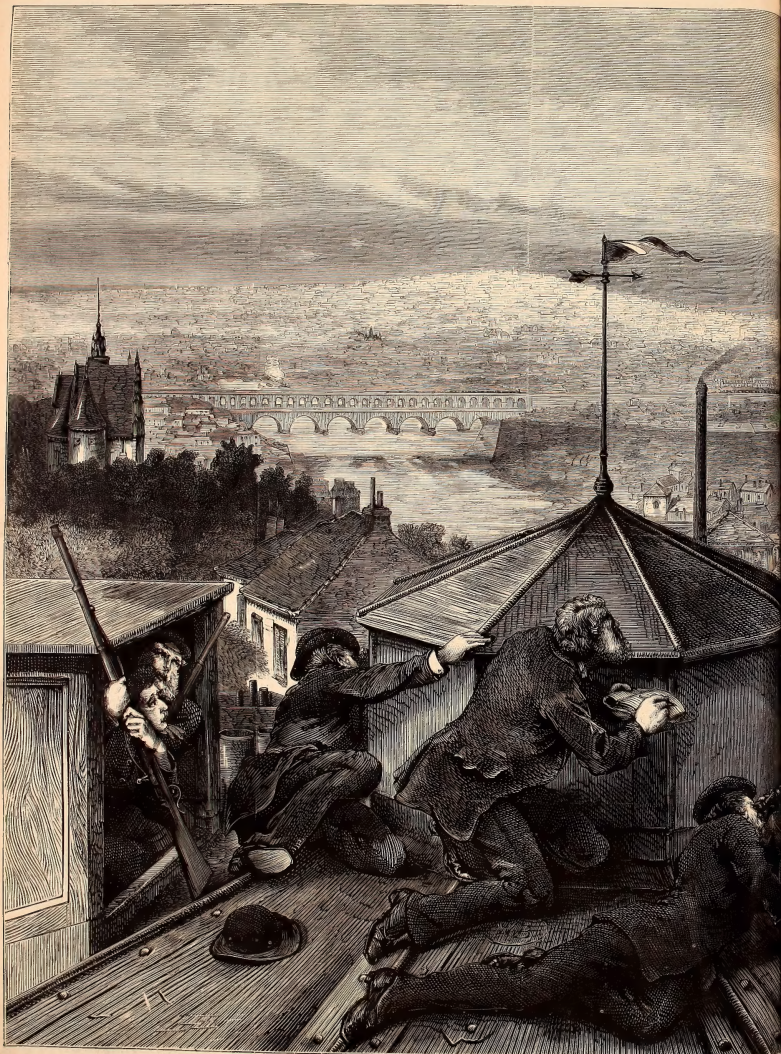
Harry seized the letter, with its inclosures, and hid them in her bosom, which, full of grief for his victim, seemed to spare her husband's perpetrator. Mrs. Basil, hastily rallied her impatiently, as was his wont, from the foot of the stairs.

"Harry, come down; I have brought a gentleman home with me. Let's have something to eat at once, will you?"

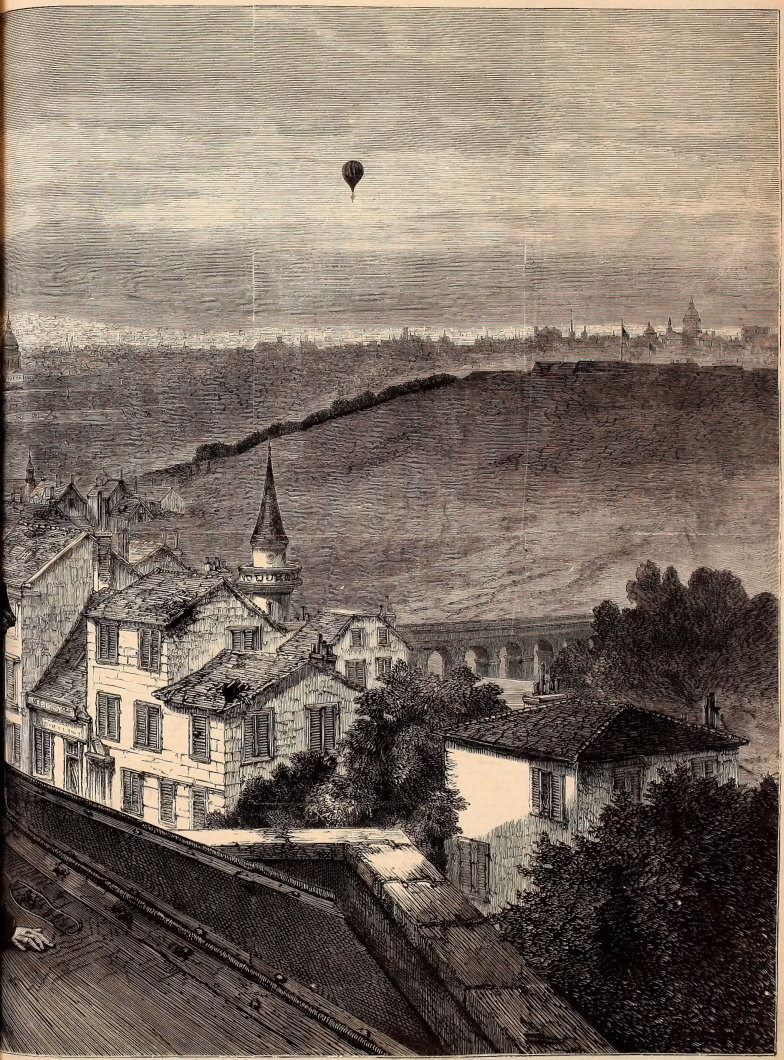
"Answer him—answer him!" gasped Harry. She could not speak; her tongue seemed paralyzed.

Mrs. Basil rose at once, walked with steady step to the door, and said, "Here I am, Solomon," Mr. Coe. I am glad you are come home, for she is far from well, and I was getting quite nervous about her."

"She must be ill," grumbled Solomon, "not to be able to say 'Here,' when I am breaking a blood-vessel with holloing to her in the attics. Come in here, Sir." This to his companion—a man considerably his senior, thin and spare, was stood peering curiously at the landlady. "I am sorry to see you unwell, Mrs. Basil. I have brought a friend to stay with us for a day or two. Mr. Robert Balfour—Mrs. Coe."



AN ARTIST AT WORK—MAKING A HASTY SKETCH FROM AN ADVAN



ED PRUSSIAN POST BEFORE THE WALLS OF PARIS.—[See Page 778.]

THANKSGIVING.

[A figure in quaint costume—half Puritan, half Cavalier—enters with the turkey of a Yankee family party in New York, and thus sets forth himself:]

I'm that penthouse little wight
Who, one cold November night,
In the Puritan forefathers' gloomy times,
Stole upon them unawares,
Smoothed the wrinkles of their cares,
And rang out the long-forbidden Christmas chimes.

How each gloomy brow unbent!
What magnetic thrills were sent
Through the iron of each grimly sternest soul!
How old England's merry face,
Touched with memory's tender grace,
Through New England's chilly fogs live sunlight stole!

Tempting visions of mistletoe
Danced before the solemn eyes;
Plum-pudding proved a serious stumbling-block;
The antiquated world arch
Mocked their puritanic starch;
Phantom holly beamed down from Plymouth Rock.

Ah! those dreary times are gone!
All day nearly-work is done;
They are gathered (ot us hope) to dreamless rest.
Now our Christmas chime sing clear,
And we dance in the New Year,
But Yankees still must love Thanksgiving best.

'Tis the festival of toil,
Of the harvest's gathered spoil;
It owns the shadow of the primal curse.
So best! In this our land
Thrift looks benignantly to the hand,
And Labor is of both the sturdy nurse.

So I fear not to come
To this stately city home
As herald of my brother, Santa Claus.
He has no vision mild
Of Bethlehem's Holy Child—
I bear in either hand the palm and cross.

AN ARTIST BEFORE PARIS.

AN adventurous artist, in company with two English officers, recently made an excursion to the extreme front of the Prussian lines before Paris, the result of which appears in the double-page engraving which we lay before our readers this week. It was his intention to the proper officers the artist was politely furnished with a patrol for guidance and protection, and the party set out, descending the valley below the chateau toward the Seine, stooping and running past an exposed place and dodging behind trees. Fifteen-grounds trampled out of all shape—dismal villas, deserted, sacked, starting roofs all their bare empty windows, as though they wondered what would happen next—cabbage-gardens and potato-fields that had been turned over and prodded and bereft of their produce, marked the country through which their journey. Finding the door of one of these villas invitingly open, the party ascended to the roof, and lying flat upon the tiles and peering round the corner of the sky-light, found Paris spread before them. For five square miles about half a mile distant, the Seine within a stone's-throw—one pontoon bridge was broken in the middle; beyond this was another; and beyond, over which a train was slowly crawling. Between this and a fourth bridge were the gun-boats. Beyond lay Paris. There was the dome of the Invalides, the twin towers of Notre Dame, the tall spire of St. Sulpice—public buildings, and towers every one, and a mass of roofs, with the indications of the well-known streets and gardens and plazas, all apparently lying so near at hand that it seemed to the spectators as though they were actually within the fortifications. At the top of the picture appears a balloon, which, we believe, afterward fell within the Prussian lines, and supplied the besiegers with a file of Paris papers.

It was a dangerous post to occupy, for the French outposts are very sharp, and will almost fire at the tip of your finger if it is exposed; so the engineer was, of course, to have very close, the escort in particular, as his "lightning-conductor" would have been a sure mark for the enemy's Chassepots had the sun, as it threw its glow over the bronze-tops of the beleaguered city, glared upon that shining beacon which the Prussian soldier bears upon his helmet. No such accident happened, however, and the adventurous landscape painters seem to have brought off the scratch some initials on the lands, thus proving that there was a veritable Jack Ball among them. As the evening closed in they descended from their observatory, and returned to the Prussian lines in safety.

POLLY'S PIES.

A THANKSGIVING EPISODE.

THE clock struck three: and like a punctual Fate, Polly, shawl in hand, flung wide the oven door. For hours had that tempting odor been born at work, unseen of mortal eye, and the fragrance, compounded of spice, and richness of crusted loaf, and savory fowl, which now floated forth and filled the kitchen, told the result. For Polly, the house contained only a precious whiff, and a stir and bustle overhead announced that some one there appreciated the signal, and knew that baking was done.

In and out trawled the busy shovel till the tenor depth, where yet a red glow lingered, was reached, gave up its last treasure, and Polly, making a fan of her apron, stood before the table to inspect the result. There they were, ranged in order due, the loaves brown and white, the rolls, the crackling pork and beans, the "Indian cake," that difficult dainty, over whose precarious fortunes she had watched till midnight—the two-and-twenty pies, gold, brown, and cranberry red, toothsome mince and translucent apple, flecked here and there with spicy parts or.an-mouthed and gaping for the friendly jam; and in the midst, in disk of yellow enchin-ware towering above the rest, the rotund centre piece, to whose composition had gone such wealth of cream, of celery, of fatted pullets, as is not often met with outside the limits of the Pursall farm. With something of the feelings of a general at the head of his battalion Polly reviewed her forces, noting here and there a specially crisp edging, and the exact degree of portioning out and that to Uncle Nathan or Aunt Sapphira, and then to grace to-morrow's dinner: for "to-morrow" was New England's special day—that "great day of the feast"—in behalf of which reasons or excuses for any proclamation, and neighbors to vie in friendly zeal of housewifery and kind remembrance of those who have no pies? Of their own.

"Yes," said Polly, half aloud, "that will be the best for the larger children's parties. The crust is a little too brown, but they won't mind that, and it's so big. Then old Aunt Pigott shall have that, and that one I'll keep."

An approaching footstep cut short the soliloquy, and, looking round, she caught a rather special pie, and hurried it into the table drawer. Next moment her mother entered.

"Well, Polly?"

"Yes, mother, Come and look at them."

They made a pleasant picture, that mother and daughter, as they stood side by side before the long ironing-table. Mrs. Pursall was tall and erect, the very model of a farmer's wife. Strong, sweet, with face unfurrowed by the wheels of that light wain, Care and Worry, that drive so heavily over female good looks in our country, and smile undimmed and bright, it was easy to divine how the honest husband, these thirty years before, had passed through that door on her wedding morning, to be from henceforth her joy and comfort, all within. And beside her stood the vision reserved in early youth, the same coral lip and blue, the same clear cheek, the same capable hands; for Mrs. Pursall was a noted housewife, and Polly inherited the faculty all round. It was with a little heart-beat that she now watched her mother's critical survey, and a sense of relief at the approval.

"First-rate, dear; I never saw better. And what a lot of them! Some are to send away, I suppose?"

"Oh yes, indeed; it would take us a month to eat them all. Mrs. Pursall's nuts and apples to one. I picked out for ourselves—for to-morrow and Sunday, you know. And the others are for the Forest folks—all that end with Nat, and the Bolgers, and so on. Don't you think I was lucky in my cake?"

"Indeed you were, and it's a trying cake, too. Suppose you treat a couple of the loaves for tomorrow's dinner, and put the remainder in the station. You must be sure and wrap them up well. Had you any help to-day, or came in the evening besides the Watsons and Jim?"

"No, ma'am—that is—yes," began Polly, flushing and stammering. "I didn't ask; but when Phil Ralston was here in the summer he said he should like to help me, and I told him we'd be happy to see him. That was what I meant, mother."

"Well," replied Mrs. Pursall, too intent upon the pies to detect the weak points of the lucid explanation, "I'm glad you had help, and Phil's a boy he's forgot all about it. But Philip is always welcome, my how."

Polly said nothing, for her secret soul she did not believe Phil had forgotten.

How distinctly she remembered about that promise! All through the short vacation, so vaguely alluded to as "in the summer," they had been planning and talking and laughing over it, till of a mignonnette seed to twenty minutes' conversation; "botanising" (Heaven save the mark!) Polly barely knew the difference between a pistil and a pistil); dawdling at the gate under the apple-trees, all, when she came to think of them, above the pink, and Mrs. Pursall's voice addressed them from an upper window on the subject of "damp;" "tempers," and "when he leaves the grange of the same authority, in wet grass or evenings to sit down." Such remarks, and kind and similar pursuits had made it a time of enchantment. Phil was an old playmate and neighbor; nobody thought about it, they had grown together, but Polly thought a great deal. And now he was gone, and when she remembered that he had stolen away half an hour before training time, and surprised her in the cool well-room, and kissed her, and said, he would come and help, coped in a white apron, making pies—all unconscious of his promise, Polly's face crimsoned in bold relief from others; for, lingering there outside the window, words had been half said, half looked, which could never forget. Suddenly, at the time half frightened, she had pretended not to understand them. And at home! there they were! Look, Polly, just coming in.'

For a moment all was there before Polly's eyes. There was Phil's manly face and frank smile, and Ralston's white head passing up the aisle, followed by his daughter, a dear old woman who lived with him and kept his house; then Phil, and by his side a lady. With unnatural fire in her blue eyes and crimson on the stranger, noting the clear olive cheek, the graceful undulating walk, the dress, which, even to Polly's inexperience, seemed something rich and foreign. That, then, was Phil's wife, the woman he preferred to all others! And with the sudden power of thought Polly felt that she hated her. All the sweet, warm pulses of her nature seemed turned into bitterness and fire.

"She looks old for Phil, doesn't she?" whispered the other girl.

She did, but how beautiful! And still, as the service went on, what a mockery it all seemed—the prayer in which she did not join, the sermon which spoke of people as thankful and happy! And the rose with the dewdrops, she had kept all the time something jungled in her ears the whole church, "Phil is married! Phil is married!" till it seemed as if she could not bear it. Long afterward, when she was happy again, that wretched morning would come back to her as visions of fever to returning health; little things she was unconscious of noticing—a late canker-worm walking up Mary Jane Oake's bonnet-string; the scrap of newspaper left on Deacon Brewster's fire from his morning shaving, and on which could be plainly read, "Lost and Strayed," with the after clew of "a heifer" just below. She remembered the exact position in which Phil stood as he held the hymn-book open for his—his wife's—to be half turned and glanced at the gallery. That was too much; Polly drew tight the green curtain, and looked no more.

"You're pale to-day," whispered the friendly gossip in the rear, "or else your hat isn't becoming."

This roused her pride. Bad as it was to be jilted, it would be worse to be jilted ill. So her lips till they were red, and (taking advantage of the hymn) prayer, I am sorry to inflict on upon her cheeks a series of furtive pinches, which restored their bloom. Coming down stairs with the rest, she saw, she was sure, Phil lingering as if to speak. Cruel, insulting, she would not see! Leaning on Aimee's arm—Heaven knows, all bloom and animation, she brushed past. "Polly," he had exclaimed; then paused. Tears are sometimes more expressive as faces. Polly's said, distinctly as back could, "Don't speak to me." Phil looked after them a moment, then, suppressing a low whistle, he plunged his hands into his pockets, and took the opposite direction. Polly's room, retreating, he sorry to have done so. "She didn't see me," he said to himself; "that was it. Well, I'll go over this evening." And all events, and that was not it means."

Oh, what a miserable day it was! All the little, carefully prepared-for pleasures were as so many goads and stings to poor Polly. The turkey was "done" to a chip; Aimee's merriment hurt her. And there were all the relations to be seen to—Uncle Nathan, and Uncle Jacob, Cousin Jane with her family, and the new baby. But for all her heartache the little maid was true to herself. Only Aunt Pursall, with mother's instinct, divined that something was the matter. 'To the rest Polly's manner was the same as usual, if over shy thing, and gayer with that deep flush on her cheeks, and the saucy tongue which, barbed with sarcasm, was directed in a smart answer to all and each.

At last the long dinner ended, amidst praises loud and high. The fire was replenished, the candles lit, evening and a general romp set in. Then, when Aunt Polly could shut away for a moment unperceived. She has "found a thing to do," as Mr. Browning says.

Upstairs, in the dark pantry, she felt about. Yes, there it was. Just so she had seen it carried out from the kitchen for Phil. With tight-set lips she carried the dish through the hall to the back-door, where Jowler, a faithful friend and companion of a breed, was wont to be on a convenient door-mat.

"Jowler—Jowler—poor fellow," she said, "here's something for you," and she held out to him Phil's pie!

The next dog awakened by daintier morsel! It was not a very fierce vengeance that, but somehow it seemed to Polly's feelings, and for was a certain tragic quality in her manner as she stood looking on at the demolishment which would have satisfied an unintentional murderer as definitely comic. As the last crumb vanished, however—the last twirl of the "—" edition—Polly herself asserted itself. She put her hand in childish fashion against the door, and, with the empty plate in the other hand, began to run—a slim, miserable crying, with a little dumb moan running through it like a child's.

At the end of that somebody passing up the walk came upon her—somebody who in his haste to be home, had come out and leaped the garden fence in his way. A tall, brown-haired fellow, with merry, kind eyes, in which wonderment changed to love at this satisfactory spectacle.

"Hallo!" he began; "why it's—bless my soul! Polly! Why, Polly—what is the matter, dear?"

At the sound of the voice started, as if stung, Polly, her face a little scream, a terrified, retorting herself, would have dashed past him into the house, but he caught her and held her.

"What is the meaning of this?" said Phil.

"You here, and crying, on Thanksgiving night with your wife! How we were going to be happy! Tell me what it is, Polly darling? Can't I help you? Aren't you glad to see me?"

"Philip Ralston!" said Polly, too furious to weigh her words, "you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"Why?"

"Why? You ask me that? Because"—suddenly remembering what she implied—"because —you have no right to speak to me—to any body —but that way more, and you are not you are married!"

"I?" ejaculated Philip; "and who says I am married?"

"I'm not married," went on Phil, "who ever says so. And I only recognize how much I love you, and poor Will mistakenly kept up by the voyage and a pistol-ball one of her relations sent after him. So I didn't let Mabel know, for fear of worrying him; and when Will got better we all came up together. That's the story, Polly; but I did think you trusted me a little." "Oh, I did, I do," sobbing; "and I was miserable, Phil."

"So this was the cause of Polly's tears," went on teasing Phil, availing himself, man-like, of the opportunity; "and that was the reason she turned her back this morning. Then Polly does care for me a little—a very little?"

"A very little," responded Polly, with a faint gleam of humor from under her wet lashes.

"Enough to put some confidence in my word when I assure her that I shall never marry never—unless somebody I know, somebody who has proved very faithless, and hurt me not a little to-day, should learn to believe me—but like me well enough"—squeezing a little brown hand as he spoke—"to take me for a husband herself? What do you say, dear?" for the pretty rosy face had vanished into the sleeve of his coat, and for all questioning no answer came save a low but a little, sweet, half gurgling, half sobbing, "Forgive me, Phil."

Phil did not prove obdurate. Before long the face came out of its hiding-place, and, leaning on his arm, Polly stood a happy moment to look at the rising moon, and taste the consciousness of bliss. Jowler stretched himself luxuriously, yawned, then leaping up, his master and Polly's shoulder, he gave vent to one loud, solitary bark of benediction perhaps, or rising to self-congratulation that this consummation devoutly to be wished did not happen sooner, to the detriment of his dinner. A few days after Phil drew Polly into the shelter of the warmed and lighted hall, and the door was shut.

There is another "young Mrs. Ralston" now, whose pastry is said by the good housewives in the neighborhood to "beat all." Her delicate dainty ways are very like our Polly's; but she always answers her husband (whose name is Phil) that, if she should live half a century, she shall never, never make, or be ever taste, a pie one-half so good as that which he ate on the morning ten minutes late one Thanksgiving evening. And he says— But no matter what he says.

TRYING TO LEAVE METZ.

SOMEWHAT before the surrender of Metz a large party of wealthy and influential French citizens set out of the beleaguered city, and pass through the Prussian lines. The scene, as depicted in the second illustration on page 772, is thus described by an eye-witness:

"We saw a number of people coming from Metz, who were civilians desirous of getting away from the blockaded fortress, and a number of Prussians which all can understand must be the fate of those left within it. The group who came along the road consisted of men, women, children, all carrying bundles; and a woman came on in advance with a pot-hook suspended on a stick as a flag of truce. But the Prussians, who had determined that they would not allow any more of the citizens to leave the place, had also had notified to those in command that all parties attempting to escape would be fired upon, now kept their word, and the pickets opened fire on the gas, as the group approached, to fire upon them. We could distinctly see the party on foot upon the road. One man, who made himself unfortunately too conspicuous, was observed to fall. The group wavered; the foremost figure, with the white flag, still advanced; but at last she looked round, and perceived that the other companions were flying; upon which she understood her situation, and followed them back. We could observe crowds of others hastening to the scene forward if these had succeeded; but soon they disappeared. Those people who wanted to leave Metz were evidently not of the poorest class. The woman in front was a peasant, but many, by their dress, seemed to be of the middle class; they, and the children, all had bundles and bags, or sacks. The poor woman who was struck seemed afterward to be dead, for a solider came round to where we were to report to his officer that he had killed a man. The solider began to reload his needle-gun, and pulled a packet of cartridges out of his pocket; but before he could get to the bottom, where they were, he had to pull out a dove. The soldiers here trap the doves which have come out from Metz for food. The bird which this man had caught and kept along with his powder and shot represented a most curious association of the emblems of love and hate, of peace and war."

ON THE PARIS RAMPARTS.

THE Parisian National Guard have been reviewing their "baptism of bucklings and fatlings," as they will probably be soon receiving their christening of fire, on the walls of their capital. And truly these bucklings are not in the habit, as it is by no means agreeable for men who all their lives have been comfortably and, in many cases, luxuriously housed to do twenty-four hours' duty in the cold and rain, with perhaps not even a leaky tent to sleep in. Yet it is what thousands of the hitherto indolent, pleasure-loving Parisians are daily doing; and many a one who, two months ago, would have thought it preposterous to rise at nine, and would have been horrified at getting his feet wet, now goes through the most arduous duties without a murmur.

Each division of the National Guard has its turn on the ramparts, and generally on the appointed day assembles in some square or unfrequented street. Each guard, besides his usual accoutrements, takes with him a perfect outfit of personal comforts, among which thick railway rugs and copious comforters are conspicuous. A tin saucepan with some savory concoction is indispensable to his equipment, neither is the eau de vie, with which to lighten the tediousness of his watch, forgotten. Drums and trumpets at their head, they march to their day's destination in time to think about breakfast. The arms are piled, and mysterious messes are disinterred from knapsacks and sauce-pans, wine is fetched from a neighboring canteen, and the company make themselves as comfortable as circumstances will permit.

At night the guards crep into the tents with which the ramparts are furnished. If there is room enough to hold six or eight occupants as closely packed as herrings in a tub. As soon as the revelle sounds they come out, and the same fantastic costumes—as represented in the sketch on page 772—seem a dressing-gown and cap, with their heads tied up in woolen wrappers, while others smoke their morning cigarettes, their loins girded with a sheepskin. A few days' exposure of black coffee the sound of the relieving company's trumpet is heard, and they march back to Paris and tranquillity.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ABOUT seven years ago a movement was made by certain charitable individuals in this city to add to the benevolent institutions of New York a hospital for the relief of ruptured and crippled children. In due time a commodious edifice was erected, and given to the society formed, and a large number of patients were treated each year. A suitable building was needed; and a week or two ago the new hospital was formally opened, a large edifice in Lafayette Place, upon being present, and the exercises being of a very interesting character. The building occupies a lot on the northwest corner of Lafayette Place and Great Jones Street. It is built of brick, has all modern improvements and conveniences, and is capable of accommodating two hundred and fifty children. At present there are about one hundred and fifty there. The society is now free of debt; but to enable the institution to support it, it can find room for a few more, derived of annual subscriptions, whereby a subscriber of one hundred dollars has a right to place a child in the institution for treatment for one year, a proportional additional one hundred dollars a child may receive one year's residence. The trustees will bend come from when months have passed away?

William C. Bryant recently celebrated his seventy-sixth birthday. He was born in 1794.

The German papers bewail the effect of the war on the trade. One manufacturer of needles said recently, in one respect, lost more than France, for her army contained nearly one more trained to the use of fire-arms, and manufactures who have died on the battle-field, and whose sons it will take another generation to call humanity. Though a temporary consequence of the war is the incompetence of the harvest gatherers, millions of tons of corn were used for that purpose having been taken for the army. The result of last summer's abundant crop of fruit, which would have been spoiled by the rains, as it was impossible to gather them in quickly enough."

The American artists from this city, R. S. Gifford and J. Wells Champney, are spending some time this fall at Tangier, empire of Morocco, Africa. They will doubtless find there a great deal of material for sketches. After spending a month on the coast of Italy they intended to go to Alexandria.

Hall's Journal of Health urges rest from stimulating brain labor. Insanity, it says, always comes on with increasing sleeplessness, and the first step toward recovery is a growing ability to sleep. Too much nervous stimulates the brain; and if this is continued too long, the inevitable result is either nervous prostration, or apoplexy. Insanity is caused by too much blood to the brain or the action of the brain; paralysis is a loss of power—the parts have worked so much they can work no more; apoplexy is where too much of the brain are so full, so distended, that they are ruptured. The person who is kept up to the working point by any artificial stimulant runs a dangerous risk of losing life or reason.

A rebellious damsel, declining by her silence to assent to the requisitions to "obey" in the marriage service, the officiating clergyman refused to proceed with the ceremony until an audible indication of consent was given.

There are, according to report, not less than five hundred English in Paris at the present time who are really suffering for money, and even for food.

At the first meeting of the presbyteries of the United States after the union of the Old and New schools it was voted to raise within a year $50,000 for church purposes. The money will doubtless be promptly raised.

A price of five hundred dollars a year for the remainder of the college course has been offered to the student of the Freshman class in Princeton College who, at the close of his year, shall pass the best classical examination. As the examination includes authors not in the curriculum, the competitors must devote extra attention to preparation.

Dœt and the younger Dumas are among the literati in the French army.

Pestilential vapors hood over the battle-field of Gravelotte. It is a ghastly fact that beside every grave-heap a barrel of chloride of lime stands like a translation; yet, notwithstanding this disinfectant, the air is indescribably fetid.

A year ago last March the Women's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized at Boston. The specific work intended was to send the Gospel to the women of India and China. The first public meeting of this society was held recently at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church in this city. By the first annual report, just issued, it appears that seven thousand dollars have been collected; one hundred and thirty auxiliary societies formed; a missionary journal established; and two missionaries sent to India about a year ago. In addition to these things, at the first annual meeting the society resolved to maintain certain schools and hospitals in India and China, and to send out two other missionaries this fall. For this work $1,198 in gold have been appropriated, and it is proposed to raise an additional $9,000 in currency. The society now includes six contributaire branches, which are located in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis. It is proposed to establish similar branches in New Orleans, Charleston, and San Francisco.

A London publisher has offered ten thousand pounds for the exclusive right, for ten years, of publishing the revised version of the Bible now in progress.

The German soldiers will have a home-stick longing to be with friends and relatives at Christmas. To them the Christmas festival is a very tender bond of sympathy.

According to an official statement the number of German soldiers buried on French territory is about 120,000 of them belong to Prussia and the North German Confederation.

Telegraphic reports of the weather are now received in Washington three times a day from twenty stations; and the information is used for distributing them throughout the country are very substantial.

A report comes from Germany that the inhabitants of Strasburg desire that the fortifications of the city be destroyed, and have forwarded it to an open petition.

Napoleon, in his exile at Willenhalshe, rises regularly at six o'clock. After dressing, a cup of tea and a slice of bread are brought to him, and then he reads the German, French, and English newspapers, remaining alone until the nine o'clock. At nine his private secretary arrives, and remains with him until ten. After walking about the grounds of the château, at noon a second dejeuner is served, the dishes being very simple. Napoleon and his officers then spend an hour or so in smoking and conversation. He then retires to his cabinet for business. At half past three or four he drives, rides, or walks—always preferring walking when the weather permits. At half past six dinner is served, which usually consists of a mixture of French and German dishes, but every thing very simple. After dinner his Majesty and his household retire to a parlor, where coffee and cigars are served. The evening is passed in conversation, cards, or reading aloud. Napoleon usually retires very early.

A good degree of interest has been manifested by the United States government, the Coast Survey, and the Smithsonian Institute in the scientific enterprise which leads a party of three to make Mount Washington their winter residence. Messrs. J. H. Huntington, of Hanover, New Hampshire, Assistant State Geologist; S. A. Nelson, of Georgetown, Massachusetts; and A. F. Clough, of Warren, photographer and telegrapher, make up the company. All needed scientific instruments have been provided. By means of a telegraph cable daily reports of the weather will be sent to the world; and it is expected that these reports will be of great value to commerce by giving warning of approaching storms. The building to be occupied is sixty feet by twenty-two, and twenty-five feet high. The main room is twenty feet by eleven, lined with light thicknesses of felt, and thickly carpeted. Six months' provisions and an abundance of coal have been provided. Small stoves have also been sent up, to be used in cases of emergency.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"WAS MR. Chisselm a very popular man when he lived in your town?" inquired a busy-body of a friend. "I should think he was," replied the gentleman, "as many persons contrived to prevent his leaving, and several of them, including the sheriff's deputy, followed him round distance."

"Mamma," said an intelligent little girl, "what is the meaning of a book being printed in Texas?" "Why," said she, "probably, my child, "it means that the book will be published in twelve months."

"WHAT'S THE BUSINESS" "NO SMOKING"

Poetry is the flower of literature: prose is the corn, potatoes, and meat; satire is the aqua-fortis; wit is the spice and pepper; invectives are the honey and sugar; and letters containing remittances are the apple-dumplings.

Under the head of "Crimes and Casualties" a rural paper mentions the fact that a rival editor has just published a book.

BILLIARD-LETTERS.—Love-letters.

A gentleman dropped a letter in Memphis the other day. A by-stander picked it up and returned it to the owner, saying, "You have dropped a paper, Sir; it may be valuable." The gentleman looked at the wandering communication, and replied, "I valued not at all. It's only a love-letter!" Sentimental young ladies can make a note of this.

WASTING TIME.—Hugging the grim.

A French marquis was riding out one day, when he passed an old priest trotting along contentedly on a quiet donkey. "Ha ha!" exclaimed the marquis, "how much the ass, good father!" "On horseback, my son—on horseback," replied the priest.

SET-LOOTS.—Stars.

Not to laugher after each others' chills" is the height of discourtesy in Indiana.

SATURDAY NOTES.—Our salaries.

A lady who has been reading law is in the most fearful and agonizing doubts regarding the legality of her married condition. She says: "Letters are illegal, and marriage is the greatest lottery in life."

"That bed is not long enough for me," said a very big, stout old Englishman upon being ushered into his bedroom by an Irish waiter at one of our hotels. "Faith, Sir," said Pat, "it's long enough for, when you first come into it." "I don't mean that there'd be two feet more added to it." Exit Pat, with a boot forlorn up the rear.

A witty lady, being asked her opinion of mustaches, replied, "I always set my face against them!"

Why is a grain of sand in the eye like a schoolmaster's cane?—Because it hurts the pupil.

During peace a regiment is quartered; during war time it is occasionally cut to pieces.

Two Dutchmen lived very close together, and they had born (not friends), but they fell out, and hated each other like poison. One of them got sick, and sent for his neighbor, and said, "Hans, I am going to die; will you forgive me?" "If you die I will," said Hans; "but if you get well you will die after all," stand good."

THE BEST WIFE FOR YOUNG LITE.—Cherry.

Where do Welshmen go to when they die?—To Australia).

The gentleman who borrowed an oyster-knife with which to open an account at a bank, has returned to meet with a pocket cork-screw to draw a check.

The nation which produces the most marriages must be the fastest nation.

THE ART OF BOOK-KEEPING.—Don't lend them.

When a man husband and wife not one, but two.—Because the wife is number one, and the husband gone for nothing.

Why is the letter "O" like the marriage service?—Because it makes "one" into "two."

"IN VINO VERITAS."—Seattle M'Semple respondeth: "Truth in wine, indeed! Host, man, there's one sin a thing! Just shake up that cold pot, and you'll find there's muckle low in it."

Why do school-boys having their ears boxed resemble ragged house-brokers?—Because they are handcuffed.

An old lady, whose son was lately about to proceed to the South Sea, among other articles of necessaries, gave him strict injunctions not to bathe in that sea, for she did not want to see him come back a "bilious mate."

A fellow in Indiana put one end of a gun-barrel in the fire, and looked down the muzzle to see whether it was loaded. A comrade jury decided that his suspicions were correct.

"I hope this band is not counterfeit," said a lover, as he was leaving with his sweetheart's fingers. "The best way to find out is to ring it," was the next reply.

DUEL BETWEEN THE PRUSSIAN GUN-BOAT "METEOR" AND THE FRENCH GUN-BOAT "BOUVET," OFF THE COAST OF CUBA.
FROM A SKETCH BY AN EYE-WITNESS.—[SEE PAGE 782.]

PRUSSIANS TAPPING FRENCH TELEGRAPH WIRES.—[SEE PAGE 782.]

THANKSGIVING-DAY AMONG THE PURITAN FATHERS IN NEW ENGLAND.

TAPPING THE WIRES.

TAPPING the telegraph wires in the enemy's country was first resorted to as a system in this country during the war of the rebellion, and many are the stories told of hazardous adventures undergone by raiders and operators in quest of military intelligence by this means. The Prussians have not neglected this important branch of modern warfare in their French campaign, going to work in a severely scientific and business-like way. When Metz was invested subterranean lines of wires were discovered and cut, as depicted in the illustration on page 780; some were found in the cellars of Mendon, but double-bet before they were destroyed they were made to furnish a budget of news for the information of the besieging army. Sending messages in cipher is at present the most effective way of counteracting these precautions, and even ciphers may be read with patience and ingenuity.

NAVAL DUEL NEAR HAVANA.

WE are indebted to a Cuban correspondent for the spirited sketch on page 780 of the engagement between the Prussian warsteamer Metzer, carrying three guns, and the French war steamer Bouvet, carrying five, which took place off the port of Havana on the 9th of November. The Metzer had a crew of sixty men, and the Bouvet eighty. The Spanish war steamer Hernando Cortés, having on board General Don Rafael de Quesada, Captain-General of Cuba, who acted as umpire, and other prominent officials, went out to see a fair fight, and to prevent a violation of the neutrality of Cuban waters. The fight took place about ten miles from Havana; and as it was in full sight of that port, the neighboring heights were crowded with thousands of interested spectators.

The Bouvet opened the contest by firing five shots, which the Metzer promptly returned. The Bouvet then attempted to board the Metzer, but this she was unsuccessful. Her rigging became entangled, carrying away her main and mizzen masts. The rigging, falling with the masts, became entangled in the Metzer's screw. At the same moment the Metzer sent a shell into the inside of the Bouvet, smashing her steam-pipe. The Metzer, by reason of the disabling of her screw, became unmanageable; and the Bouvet, finding the quarters hot, and capture certain if she waited until the Metzer could disentangle herself, set sail rapidly, and made for port, the Metzer continuing to fire meanwhile. With a fair wind the Bouvet was enabled to reach the Spanish water before the Metzer could disentangle her screw. At this time the Hernando Cortés first fired a gun, a signal that the combat had closed. Both fought bravely.

The victory was accorded the Metzer, though both vessels were badly damaged. The Germans had three killed and one wounded on board the Frenchman there were three wounded and one killed. Both vessels returned to Havana after the fight, and another engagement is to come off as soon as they have completed repairing.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"On the 14th of February, 1854, my husband made me a present of a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine. For nearly fifteen years it has done its work (hundreds—yes, thousands of dollars' worth), and is this day as perfect a sewer as when I first got it. It has never been the least out of repair. During the war I kept out needle in constant use, and I have more than half the original dozen of needles given with the machine on its purchase."

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS for VOICE and PIANO-FORTE. Published by Boosey & Co., 24 Hanover Square, London, and 7 Beekman Street, New York. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large type, in volumes containing about 300 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO, with the four Overtures.
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. IL MATRIMONIO.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers in the States, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond Street, New York.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 18 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 161 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Burnett's Cocoaine
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FOR
HAIR DRESSING in the World.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, and either of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $6, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 107 Pearl St., N. Y., Electric Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly for sale at 10 cts. per lb.

$10 to $25.—Genuine Oxide-Gold Watches. Address Cross Four Foster, MT., 19 Nassau St., N. Y.

HELMBOLD.

HE APPEARS IN A NEW ROLE.

NOMINATED FOR PRESIDENT.

The Most Enterprising and Largest Advertiser of the Age.

THE famous DR. H. T. HELMBOLD, of 594 Broadway, New York, who is universally regarded as the most sagacious, enterprising, and successful business man of the age, has recently been brought before the public in a new attitude—that of a candidate for the Presidency.

The following rapid and graphic sketch of this remarkable man can not fail to be read with interest, and might be studied with profit by men who could make a fortune had they half of HELMBOLD'S pluck, tact, and push:

PEN PICTURE OF HELMBOLD.

Beyond doubt, the greatest advertiser in the United States, if not in the known world, to-day, is H. T. HELMBOLD, the millionaire druggist of New York, whose name, through the medium of the press, has become a household word in every township in the United States.

As the public is always more or less interested in men who have, by dint of energy, enterprise, boldness, and honorable dealings, risen from ordinary to extraordinary positions in life, a pen picture of this most successful merchant and accomplished gentleman may not be uninteresting. If you have time, come with us a few moments while we introduce you to the man who has made himself very conspicuous through the medium of the press, and by the discovery of a remedial agent for certain diseases somewhat prevalent in American.

Leaving our office, in New York, on Printing-House Square, we turn into Broadway, whose activity is heard night and day, about half-past two in the afternoon we leisurely saunter up Broadway, that great street of the world. We soon passed Canal Street, on our way to Grace Church. On the right-hand side of the street there is a beautiful drug-store attracts our attention. Of course we will stop for a moment and look at it, for on all the American cities there is not another quite like it. Beautiful, filled with every thing to please the eye, arranged by the hand of taste and genius, the store is a model in every respect. It is wide, nearly three hundred feet deep, and filled with the choicest articles that money can demand. As others are constantly entering, we will do the same. Come with us, from the front door back toward the rear building, and observe that, in this is called the "parlor," leaving those who wish to make purchases in the front department, where they can be waited upon, for we are looking for the man, who in a few years has erected this monument to enterprise, liberality, and well-doing.

It is nearly three o'clock in the afternoon. "Which one is HELMBOLD?" "Which do you think?" It is not that tall man. It is not that portly man. Nor is it that earnest, iron-looking man who is poring over the ledger and private cash-book. "Well, which is the one?" It is that little shaver, about five feet one inches in height, dark-brown hair, heavy eyebrows, full whiskers, cut rather close, dressed as if just taken from a bandbox. It is that same man who is flying on an elegant pair of bid gloves, but, while doing so, is continually walking about from this desk to that one, from this man to that one—giving an order to that, a word of encouragement to this man or that man. Yes, that is the man we took as a cat on every thing going on from one end of the establishment to the other.

In dress he is faultless. A first-class business suit, the whitest of shirts, elegant wristbands, hair neither too short nor too rough—indeed, taken in all respects, indicating a business man of taste, wealth, and prominence. He walks to this man and to the right, leans his shoulder at once on what he is doing, nods approvingly; then to his cashbook, makes a few figures, and away he is right; then asks the cashier of the concern one or two questions, nods approvingly; takes in the entire store at a glance, says very politely to those in charge, "Good-day, gentlemen!" He passes out, nods to the occupants of stores on both sides of the one, and, with a kind word to all, passes out to his private carriage, waiting before the door, and, if the weather is pleasant, with one top or two cradle is off for a drive through Central Park, and up the Bloomingdale Road, behind his elegant horses. Few men in New York drive so fine a team as does HELMBOLD. From three o'clock until six, with a friend or two from different parts of the country, he is on the road, as are thousands of other businessmen in the great city, gathering health, fresh air, and strength for the morrow. At six o'clock we find him at his elegant residence on Fifteenth Street, corner of Fifth Avenue. And there is always at his well-furnished table two or three extra plates and extra chairs for such friends as he may invite to his dinner-table. HELMBOLD believes that it is not good for a man to eat alone. And though he has at his house one of the most beautiful women of the land for a wife, and a family of three little children, he still delights in extending the most generous hospitality to those who are always welcome when invited.

HELMBOLD lives well. This we know, for often have we dined from his well-filled table, laughed at his jokes, and listened to his experiences in life.

As a business man, HELMBOLD is a success. As a merchant, he is a prominence. As a druggist, he is equal to cut glass. As a sharp, shrewd, calculating man of the world, he is worthy of much of enthusiasm. While as a bold operator and advertiser, he has no equals in the country. He does business on a large scale. Lives like a prince. Pays his advertising bills with a liberal hand, and promptly. Pays large salaries to those in his employ, and aims apparently, not so much to accumulate money as to spend it for the benefit of printers. His expenses for advertising are nearly half a million of dollars per year; a one or ten thousand dollar order to some newspaper is nothing for him, providing the paper is of sufficient importance for him to use. In the evening you will find him and his wife, and perhaps one or two friends, occupying a private box or reserved seats at one of the operas or theatres; at home, if the weather is unpleasant, or at the home of some of his friends, the business men of New York.

When seven o'clock in the morning comes, you inquire for HELMBOLD, and you will find that he has down town. He must have seen something about the early bird catching the worm, for certainly we know no earlier bird among the business men of New York than this same little druggist. His beautiful palace of a store is kept open day and night at the accommodation of the public; and early in the morning, before the rest of the family are up, HELMBOLD has walked to his store, looked over the establishment, gained an appetite for breakfast, and returned. Breakfast over, the morning papers looked at, a romp with his family, the carriage is brought to the door, and down he goes to his place of business, reaching there at ten o'clock, and from that time till three in the afternoon he is most industriously engaged dictating answers to hundreds of letters, giving orders about his business, forming the acquaintance of strangers, chatting with friends who drop in for a moment, and comporting himself with the air of a man with all the business on hand he can possibly attend to.

HELMBOLD is a nervous, quick, restless, ambitious man. He understands the art of advertising to perfection. He believes with us that money judiciously expended in printers' ink brings a larger return than any other investment.

An idea comes to him one minute and is acted on the next. What he does he does quickly and thoroughly.

While other men would be canvassing, debating, or arguing the propriety of doing this or that, he has accepted or rejected the proposition almost before it is made to him. He acts at once and with energy. A little hint from one of his brother-men and magnify to something of importance. Some little idea that another man would have no faith in, or think unworthy of thought, he will seize, turn to advantage, and make thousands of dollars therefrom.

He began life with little or no capital, but, confident that the remedy he had discovered was the right thing, he was not afraid to advertise. His success tells the rest. His sales now amount to about three million bottles per year, and are rapidly increasing. The opening of his palatial drug-store in New York was one of the greatest events of the season. Thousands of persons attended to partake of the sumptuous repast furnished free upon the occasion, and all were delighted.

Among the presents to those who came were one thousand bottles of cologne distributed to the ladies. This of itself shows that HELMBOLD is a very acute man.

To see him on the street or in the store, you would imagine him the confidential clerk of the proprietor; but when you come to talk business, make plans and suggestions, you will find that this seemingly confidential clerk is the head of the house, and what he does not understand about business and about advertising is hardly worth learning.

Some time, when in New York, if you want to see a man who is making a success of business, and making himself wealthy by using printers' ink, walk by his drug-store, drop in, and ask for H. T. HELMBOLD, and tell him you came, out of curiosity, to look at one of the smallest business men in New York, who is at the same time one of the greatest. If he should look just a little astonished at your description, tell him who we sent you, and in all probability he will ask you to the soda fountain, order a glass of tonic, bid you call again, and give you a cigar on your way leaving, and behold that HELMBOLD, the millionnaire druggist of New York, is about as good a fellow as they make.—Exchange.

GREAT MEN, LIVING AND DEAD, are pictured and described in the December No. Phrenological Journal, with Portraits of Prince of France, the late General R. E. Lee, of Va.; L. A. Thiers, the French Statesman; Benjamin Franklin, Dr. Livingstone, Rev. Geo. Trask, the Reformer, and others. Articles on The Physician, his Office and Qualifications; Eminent Orators; Physical Education; Strength; Power of Concentration; Sketch-Making in America; Ethnology; The Ignorotes; Sleeping; Mental and Social Condition; Sketch of California Excursionists; Visit to Salt Lake City; Brigham Young's Residence, Family, The City and its Surroundings, City Government, Principal Buildings, Mineral Springs, Manufactures, Trade with Salt Lake, Weather and Seasons, Mormonism, Salt Lake Tribune, National Beverage; Spiritualism, Views of Mormons; Yankee Applied to Horses; A College Widow; A Picket Duel, an Incident of the War; Wedding Bells; Struck by Lightning; Let Us Have Peace; A Merry Christmas; Valedictory; Literary Notices, Miscellany, &c. A rich and valuable number, which closes the volume. 30 cents, or $3 a year. Subscriptions are now in order.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL

Is a Bi-Monthly Publication Magazine, devoted to Phrenology, Ethnology, Physiology, Physiognomy, Education, and Literature, and Contributions to Reform, Elevate, and Improve Mankind Physically, Mentally, and Morally. The 624 Volume commences with the January number, and now is the time to subscribe. The JOURNAL is in most prosperous condition, and elect to change in form It has been one of the most popular Magazines. Terms—$3 00 a year; single numbers, 30 cents. Two copies, for a Club, $5.0. With either of Harper's, only $6 00. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y. Registered Letter, and address in full, $4.00.

A WEEK paid Agents in a new business. Address SACO NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me. $60

SEE
WHAT $5 WILL DO!
Alphabet FOR THE People.

A GREAT PREMIUM LAND SALE.

SURE and TAKE ADVANTAGE of IT.

OUNTRY HOMES, FARMS, VILLA SITES, &c.,

ISTRIBUTED among Shareholders.

VERY ONE REMITTING $5 becomes A SHAREHOLDER.

OR EVERY SHARE YOU RECEIVE A PREMIUM.

REAT OPPORTUNITY FOR

OMES, HEALTH, HAPPINESS.

MPROVED PLANTATIONS, FARMS, COUNTRY HOMES.

UST THE PLACE TO AVOID LUNG AND THROAT DISEASES—

NOWN AS THE SOUTHERN SARATOGA.

OOK INTO THE MATTER.

AKE YOUR FORTUNE.

INETY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS IN PREMIUMS!

RCHARDS, VINEYARDS,

LANTATIONS, FARMS, COUNTRY HOMES, VILLAS,

UANTITIES of PEACHES, GRAPES, STRAWBERRIES, &c., &c.

ARE OPPORTUNITY TO

EE WHAT $5 WILL DO!

RY IT;

WILL NOT REGRET IT.

ILLA SITES, COUNTRY HOMES, FORTUNES,

ITHIN THE REACH OF ALL.

ERCISE YOUR OWN JUDGMENT.

OU ARE SURE to get A PREMIUM OR PRIZE. AS A PROOF, SEE THE

EAL WITH WHICH SHARES ARE NOW BEING TAKEN.

YOU WILL BE CONVINCED THAT what Shakespeare says is true:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, Taken at the flood, leads on to fortune," &c.

For particulars, address

J. C. DERBY, GENERAL MANAGER, 177 BROADWAY.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.
CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America, as the most valuable substitute for Quinia, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics used for producing sleep. Price 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Send for Circular explaining medical indications. T. DE WITT KENYA, Proprietor, 31 Barclay St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, or will take from $4 to $10 monthly until paid.

Nasby's Paper.

THE TOLEDO BLADE.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the World, choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor. Besides this, every number contains a Young Folks' Department, an Agricultural Department, a Religious Department, and a carefully conducted Financial and Commercial Review, rendering it the most complete and perfect Family Newspaper published any where.

The Nasby Letters!

These inimitable Letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued in the paper during the year. Oppression, wrong, and corruption, wherever found, are exposed by the trenchant pen of the great humorist. "The Nasby Letters," says a distinguished statesman, "have done more than all the corrention of some of the greatest evils in our government, and the spread of sound political principles among the people, than all the speeches politicians ever made."

ORIGINAL STORIES.

The first week in March, 1871, we will commence the publication of a charming original story, written expressly for the BLADE, by one of the most popular writers in the country. The high reputation of the author warrants us in promising our readers a story of surpassing beauty and interest. Other stories by distinguished writers will be published during the year.

Remember that the BLADE is a truly National Newspaper—not a paper for either the East, West, the North, or the South alone, but The Whole Country.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club of ten.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and at the same time give us the addresses of a dozen or so of your friends, at different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

500 VOLUMES IN ONE!

Agents Wanted
FOR

The Library of Poetry and Song.

Being Choice Selections from the Best Poets,
ENGLISH, SCOTCH, IRISH, AND AMERICAN,
With an Introduction by WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

This volume is the handsomest and cheapest subscription book extant, and contains in itself more to give it enduring fame and make it universally popular than any book ever published. It has something in it, of the best, for every one—for the old, the children, aged, and the young. It has intellectual food for every taste and for every mood and adapts itself, accordingly, from the merriest humor up, through all the gradations of pathos, to the most touching and tender pathos. Excepting the Bible, no work has ever been issued and the most frequently referred to in the family.

The whole work, page by page, poem by poem, has passed under the educated criticism and taste of poet of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, a man reverenced among men, a poet great among poets.

This is a Library of love 500 Volumes in one book; whose contents, of no ephemeral nature or interest, will never grow old or stale. It can be, and will be, read and re-read with pleasure as long as the leaves hold together. Over 800 pages, beautifully printed, elegantly illustrated, handsomely bound, sold only through Agents by subscription.

Agents, Male and Female, Men, Intelligent Women, can all secure good pay with light work by taking an agency for this book. Terms very liberal.

Send for Circular containing full particulars to

J. B. FORD & CO., 39 Park Row, N. Y.

BURNETT'S
THE BEST
Flavoring Extracts.

"Your vegetable flavoring extracts are strictly "'Standard,' uniform in quality, and give entire satisfaction to our customers."
PARK & TILFORD,
Fifth Avenue, Broadway.

"Growing in favor."
ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT,
Chambers Street.

2, 5, and 16 oz., Flat, and Quartzvies for sale by all first-class Grocers in the United States and Canada.

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., 245 Washington Boorne, Mass.

LATEST IMPORTED OIL NOVELTIES—Magic Money Box, $10; Magic Imp Bottle, $1 00; Magic Cologne Bottle, $1 00; Magic Pocket Flask, $1 00; Two-Cent Box, $1 50; The Three Magic Bottles, $2 00; Magic Self-Sealing Bottle, $1 00; Magic Bottle, $1 00; Magic Bag and Key, $1 00; Magic Invisible Finger, $1 00; Magic Horn, $1 00; Comical Monkey, $1 00; Magic Photographs, 5 assorted packages, $1 00. Full directions sent with each trick. Good Books for Puzzles, 40 cts.: Friends' Games, 40 cts.: Tableaux, 40 cts.: Dialogues, 40 cts.: Comic Speeches, 40 cts.: 1000 Conundrums, 40 cts.: Fortune-Teller, 25 cts.: Courtship Made Easy, 25 cts.: Etiquette of Love and Correct Letter Writer, 25 cts.: True Manner of Love-Making, 25 cts.: Book of Verses for Lovers, 40 cts.: Correct Etiquette, 25 cts.: Book of Jokes. All Books sent free by mail, postage paid, by
W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, New York.

"IT STILL WAVES."—Sell, Rent and Rent or Sell. Pianos, Organs, Melodeons, Sheet Music, Books, Musical Merchandise. Wholesale and Retail. Prices lower than ever. Illustrated Catalogue free. Pianos, Organs, Melodeons, and sundries sent to all U.S. Cities and Towns. Pianos to Rent, $5 per month. Rent allowed if purchased. Pianos Tuned, Moved, and Repaired. Second-hand Pianos, Organs, and Melodeons, from $30 to $100. Pianos taken in exchange. Monthly Magic Lantern, 25 cts. Magic Lantern and 50 Slides, $5. Stereoscopes, 50 cts. to $5. Stereoscopic Views, $1 per dozen. Photographs, $1 per dozen. Circulars free. Agents wanted. Address
S. D. & H. W. BERRY,
No. 106 Fulton Street, New York.

$30 PER WEEK.—Agents wanted in every town. Samples free. C. W. DENNE, Rochester, N. Y.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.

FREEMAN & BURR'S
CLOTHING
WAREHOUSES.

Overcoats, $6.
Overcoats, $8.
Overcoats, $10.
Overcoats, $15.
Overcoats, $20.
Overcoats, $25.
Overcoats, $30.
Overcoats, $40.
Overcoats, $45.

FREEMAN & BURR'S stock is of unparalleled extent and variety. It embraces Suits, Overcoats, and CLOTHING of every description, for all ages, and all classes and occasions.

ORDERS BY LETTER.—The easy and accurate system for Self-Measure introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables parties in any part of the country to order Clothing direct from them with the certainty of receiving the most PERFECT FIT attainable.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Samples of Goods, Price-List, and Fashion Sheet sent free on application.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.

Winter Suits, $12.
Winter Suits, $15.
Winter Suits, $20.
Winter Suits, $30.
Winter Suits, $40.
Winter Suits, $50.
Boys' Suits, $6.
Boys' Suits, $8.
Boys' Suits, $12.
Boys' Suits, $18.

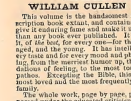
WASHINGTON
MEDALLION PEN

$9000 of the PATRONS' FUND of Fourth Series now ready for Distribution. For a List of the Numbers drawn, address THE WASHINGTON MEDALLION PEN CO., 11 College Place, N. Y.

$3 Watch! $3 Watch!
THE GREAT EUROPEAN
Eureka Aluminum-Gold Watch Co.
MAKE APPOINTED
J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., JEWELERS,
561 Broadway, New York,
SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U. S.

And have authorized them to sell their great EUREKA ALUMINUM-GOLD WATCHES for THREE DOLLARS, and to refund to each purchaser the money they received for one year. This Watch we guarantee to be the best and most durable Watch ever sold for the money, and to look like gold. The works are in double cases, Lady's and Gent's size, and are beautifully chased. The cases are made of the metal now so widely known in Europe as Aluminum Gold. It has the exact color of Gold, which it retains forever; it will stand the test of the strongest acids: no one can tell it from Gold only by weight, the Aluminum being one-fourth lighter. The Watch cases are all made by machinery, the same as the well-known American Watch. We pack the Watch safely in a small box and send it by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $3.00; fifty cents for packing and postage. A key is sent free with each Watch. Money should be sent by Post-Office Money Order or in a Registered Letter. Address all orders and communications to

J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., Jewelers,
561 Broadway, New York.



EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

This, one of our patrons said the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, then never touch than ink. Our press contains printing full information about these presses, prices, recommendations, &c., &c., and set specimens of various books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., to cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 93 Murray Street, New York.

☞ On Receipt of One Dollar
We will Mail to you the most acceptable gift to a Young Lady.
LORING'S BOX OF HOME NOTE PAPER,
French or English, Stamped with her Initial.
Address LORING & CO.,
32 School Street, Boston, Mass.

THE FISHERIES.—NETS, SEINES, LINES, TWINES, and Fishing Tackle, for Export, River, Pond, Lake, or Sea Fishing, for sale to the trade by AMERICAN NET AND TWINE CO., 45 Commercial St., Boston. Samples and prices by mail.

CORNS CURED WITHOUT PAIN FOR 25 CENTS, by the JAPANESE CORN FILE. Sold at all Druggists', Shoe, and Notion Stores. Samples mailed on receipt of price. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Depot, 34 Pine Street, New York.

OXYGENATED AIR, cure for Dyspepsia, Catarrh, and Consumption. Send address for Pamphlet to Dr. C. L. HUGO, Boston, Mass.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS
F. E. SUIRE & CO.,
Wholesale Druggists,
N. W. COR. FOURTH & VINE STREETS, CINCINNATI, OHIO.
Price, per Bottle, $1 00. Sent by express, free, on receipt of $1 00.

The Patent Base Ball and Ball Pipe.
Manufactured by
Agents Cane Co., Chesterfield, Conn.
French Brier, Sweet and Cheapest.
Agents and Dealers
Wanted in every City and Town, and well paid for selling. Price List mailed. Sample Pipe sent post paid for 25 cents.
E. HOOPER, M'f'r Briar Pipes, 203 Broadway, N. Y.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$75 to $250 per month every where, made to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $100 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch," and will do as much range of work as any $100 machine. Every machine sold is warranted to give perfect satisfaction. $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission allowed, to men or women who will work for us. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo., or Chicago, Ill.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 12 pictures, sent by mail, postpaid, for 75 cts.; 5 for $1; $6 25 per dozen. Catalogues free. Address
C. S. HILLIARD, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1871, for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, ONE YEAR..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, ONE YEAR..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, ONE YEAR..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Volumes of the Magazine begin at Dates; the Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar commence with the first Number issued after January 1st of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft, payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to bank-notes. Where neither can be procured, the money should be sent in a letter, and the letter should be registered. The registration fee is FIVE CENTS.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $100; Quarter Page, $50—each insertion. Eight lines of Agate space, $3 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Agate Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WINTER
EMPLOYMENT
PERKINS & BOUSE'S PATENT
NON-EXPLOSIVE
METALLIC KEROSENE LAMP
Is absolutely safe from explosion or breaking: burns Coal Oil, and gives a pure white light, no odor, and uses less oil.
The Perfection of Kerosene Light is believed to be realized by the Perkins & Bouse Lamp. Scientific American Agricultural Edition.
This lamp is the most ingenious, clever and useful, as well as the most economical than any other lamp in use.—Mr. Stephen Dearborn, formerly of the Scientific American.
The appalling deaths and destruction from kerosene lamps must cease. The Perkins & Bouse Lamp is simply IMPOSSIBLE to explode. Agents wanted, welcome the secret. Sold by Canvassers; Agents wanted everywhere. Send for circular. Terms to Manufacturers & Co., Cleveland, O., or 27 Barclay St., New York.

Local Agents Wanted.
I want a local agent in every town and village in the country to sell my Patent WESTERN WORLD. A Magazine of Local Literature and Engraving to every subscriber. From $3 to $10 per day easily made by canvassing. Liberal cash commission allowed. Send for sample copy for canvassers and Circular.
JAMES R. ELLIOTT, Boston, Mass.

50,000 Boys and Girls
Want a copy of their own paper, the best paper for our Bright Side, Agents' Book Patterns, and other current and entertaining matter. Good pay in cash, and permanent employment. Address
JOHN R. ALDEN & CO., Chicago, Ill.

$500 PER WEEK
Can be made by parties who are wide-awake, without interfering with their business. Address EVANS & HOOD & CO., 636 Broadway, N.Y.

$1500 A YEAR.
WANTED AGENTS to sell the Universal Stitch Sewing Machine. Price, complete, with 19 tk. long by 8 in height, of great capacity and durability; works on a new principle. Price only $15 00; sent C. O. D. Address Universal S. M. Co., 323 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

$100 to 250 per Month guaranteed. Sure thing. Address, with stamp, for particulars, Box 2442, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS! READ THIS!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $100 per month and expenses, or allow large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo., or Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED, in every section of the country, to sell a new Map, showing the Seat of War between France and Prussia, by L. P. Brockett, M.D., Author of "Our Great Conflict," and hundreds of other valuable books. Sold by subscription. Agents are meeting with unparalleled success. Send for circular. SMITH & MCDIVITT, Publishers, 107 Dearborn Street, New York.

$240 A MONTH to Agents. 18 entirely new articles, staple as flour. Samples free. J. WORTHINGTON, 88 South Halsted St., Chicago.

$250 A Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Does it. Don't talk to secrets. Circular and Samples, free. Addr. S. M. Spencer, Brattleboro, Vt.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address J. C. BAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Sample pies sent free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

WATCH AGENTS WANTED. $30 a week and expenses paid. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

AT THE GATES OF PARIS.—WHICH WILL GET IN FIRST?

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

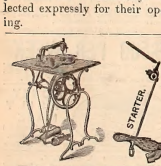
All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE,

Having removed to their New Store, now offer their entire importation for the Holidays—selected expressly for their opening.



THE STARTER!

NEEDHAM'S PATENT SEWING-MACHINE STARTER

ALWAYS STARTS THE MACHINE IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION WITHOUT APPLYING THE HANDS TO THE WHEEL.

DOCTORS HAVE RECOMMENDED IT.

LADIES LIKE IT. A CHILD CAN RUN MACHINE IS PERFECT WITHOUT IT.

GO AND SEE IT AT

862 BROADWAY, above 17th St., New York.

CONVENIENT agents at Agency,

735 BROADWAY (Basement Floor), New York.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 ..... Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N.Y.

Non-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

THE WATCHES MADE BY THE NEW YORK WATCH CO. ARE THE BEST & CHEAPEST.

ASK TO SEE THEM. Factory, Springfield, Mass.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5096, N. Y.

N.

Robes de Chambre

AND

House Coats,

FOR

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.

E. A. NEWELL,

727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

F. SCHLEIFER & Co.'S

PURE CALIFORNIA

BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations and substitutions of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

Engines, Tools, Machinery, &c.,

FOR SALE,

AT

THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,

FOOT OF EAST 12TH ST., N. Y.

Embracing

ENGINES, PLANERS, LATHES, SMITHS' AND BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS, And Machinery and Patterns of the most approved kinds, &c., &c. Also,

6 HIGH-PRESSURE ENGINES, partly finished;
2 STEVENSON'S PATENT TURBINE WATER-WHEELS, 66-inch diameter; and
1 MARINE BEAM ENGINE, 66-in. by 10-ft. stroke.

JNO S. SCHULTE,

Receiver of the Novelty Iron Works.

☞ Send for Catalogue.

New York, Oct. 29, 1870.

EUREKA

PENCIL

SHARPENER,

Opens and Shuts.

Pencil Sharpener, Combs Blade, and Nail Cleaner combined.

Samples mailed free on receipt of 75 cents.

Address E. W. WEEDEN,

Box 3661, New York.

Farnham, Gilbert, & Co.,

BANKERS,

No. 8 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS.

Amber, Repairing and Boiling.

Store, 27 John St., middle of the block.

Send for Circular.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO.

BISHOP & RHIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS, and other FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

F. BOOSS

Importer and Manufacturer of

FINE FURS,

and Sole Manufacturer of the

PATENT LE GANT MUFF,

449 BROADWAY, between Grand and Howard Sts.

CARTWRIGHT & WARNER'S

PATENT MERINO

UNDER-VESTS, DRAWERS,

AND

HOSIERY.

A LARGE VARIETY OF NEW GOODS,

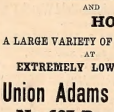
AT

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Union Adams & Co.,

No. 637 Broadway.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.



New Improvements, patented. Reduced Prices. Recommended as the best by nearly TEN THOUSAND PROMINENT MUSICIANS. Awarded TWO MEDALS, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1867, over every other. Prices, $50 to $1000.

☞ A new illustrated Circular now ready, and sent free.

Warerooms, 554 Broadway, NEW YORK; 154 Tremont St., BOSTON.

GANTZ SEA FOAM.

Best Baking Powder in the world. Great Fair American Institute, 1870.

First Premium over all others.

All these last families use it.

For sale in every first-class store.

It makes 40 pounds more Bread to Barrel of Flour. Saves Eggs, Shortening, Milk, &c.—Wonderful.

GEO. F. GANTZ & CO., 116 Cedar St., New York.

No. 716 CHEST'T, PHILADELPHIA.

C. BENKERT & SON

No. 705 BROADWAY, N.Y.

BOOTS & SHOES.

THE IMPROVED

WILSON

SHUTTLE

SEWING MACHINE

for simplicity, durability & beauty stands unrivaled! For stitching, hemming, tucking, felling, quilting, cording, binding, braiding, gathering, gathering and sewing on gathers, it is unexcelled! Salesrooms in every County in the United States where we have not one already employed. For particulars address the Wilson Sewing Machine Co., Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

"OUR POPULAR SHIRTS,"

MADE TO ORDER FROM BEST MATERIALS, AND WARRANTED TO FIT.

Send for Circular, or, to buy part of the country, of the following articles:

6 Shirts, Good Muslin and Linen Fronts $9 00
6 " Better Muslin and Linen Fronts 10 50
6 " Wamsutta Muslin and Fine Linen 12 00
6 " Wamsutta Muslin and Best Linen 15 00
6 " New York Mills and Best Linen 15 00

RICHARD MEARES,

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.

6th Avenue & 19th St., N. Y.

DOOLEY'S THE YEAST POWDER

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

PRICED AND ILLUSTRATED MANUALS on the following subjects sent free:

Part I.—Mathematical Instruments, 112 pages.

Part II.—Optical Instruments, 84 pages.

The following are sent on receipt of 10 cents:

Part III.—Engineers and Stereopticons, 88 pages.

Part IV.—Philosophical Instruments, 84 pages.

JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia: 3 Doy St., New York, P. O. Box 4510.

EVANS' Prices EVANS' Prices

FOR THE

"BEST-MADE"

FALL AND WINTER

CLOTHING

IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS.

$10, $13, $18 50, $25, $30, $35, $38, $22, $23, $27, $28.

REEFING JACKETS.

$6 00, $7 00, $8 00, $10 00, $15 00, $19 00, $22 00.

WINTER SUITS.

$14 00, $16 50, $18 00, $21 00, $25 00, $28, $27, $30.

PANTS.

Fashionable Stripes, $6 50, $7, $7 50, $8, $8 50, $9, $9 50.
In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

ELGIN

(ILLINOIS)

Watches!

CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT,
CHICAGO, Feb. 1, 1870.

T. M. AVERY, Esq.,
National Watch Co.:

Dear Sir—I have pleasure in expressing my opinion of the Elgin Watches which you have sent me. I do not think there is a better Watch made, and could wish that them are in use by our conductors and engineers and other employees, and I have had no dissenting opinion upon their merits. They run with a smoothness and uniformity fully equal to any other Watch I know of, and justify all your claims of excellence in manufacture and fitting of parts.

Yours truly,

GEO. L. DUNLAP.

☞ Call on your Jeweler and ask to see the Elgin Watches.

Business Office and Salesroom National Watch Company,

159 and 161 Lake Street, Chicago;
1 Maiden Lane, New York.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S

CHALLENGE SAUCE

Pronounced by Connoisseurs

TO BE THE

BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,

AND

SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.

For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Cooked Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.

Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

THE Rexall is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents. Pamphlet on Catarrh free. Address Dr. R. V. PIERCE, No. 181 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED

AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through her agents, some of the best family books, and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the books in much more demand than the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business will address for further particulars, AVERY HILL,

Care of Harper's Bazar Establishment,

331 Pearl St., New York.

BLEES'

Noiseless,

Link-Motion,

Lock-Stitch

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world to perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, simplicity of construction, and capability of management. Call and examine, and for agencies and circulars, apply at

623 BROADWAY,

New York.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

contains in every number one COLORED PLATE of Fashions, and 40 to 50 other pages of Household Literature. Only 50 cents a year. Specimen copy free. A clergyman's wife writes: "I would not be without it for its cost." Address E. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

PRINTING. DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Printing Machines of all kinds, from $3 to $300. Send for circular.

Prisbrey Manuf'g Co., 14 Ruby St., Boston, Mass.

SUPPLEMENT TO HARPER'S WEEKLY

To accompany Vol. XIV. No. 727. NEW YORK, DECEMBER 2, 1870 [Gratuitous.

"THY BROTHER'S BLOOD CRIETH."

By CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI.

All her corn-fields rippled in the sunshine;
All her lovely vines, sweet-babes, bowed;
Yet some weeks to harvest and to vintage:
When, as one man's hand, a cloud
Rose and spread, and, blackening, burst asunder
In rain and fire and thunder.

Is there naught to reap in the day of harvest?
Hath the vine in her day no fruit to yield?
Yea, men tread the press, but not for sweetness,
And they reap a red crop from the field.
Build tombs, inscription, cypress all mingled:
Though your scales be called to-night.

A cry of tears goes up from blackened homesteads,
A cry of blood goes up from drenched earth:
Tears and blood have a cry that pierces Heaven
Through all the Hallelujah revels of earth;
God hears their cry, and though He tarry, yet
He doth not forget.

Mournful Mother, sitting in the dust weeping,
Who shall comfort thee for those who are not?
As thou didst, bow down to thee; and heap the ashes,
And beat the furrows sevenfold hot:
As then once, now there to thee—who pitieth then
From sea to sea?

O thou King, terrible in strength, and building
Thy strong throne on thy pain!
Though he drink the last, the King of Shushach,
Yet he shall drink at the last.
Art thou greater than great Babylon,
Which like overthrows?

Take heed, ye swallow among the people:
O ye fools, when will ye understand
He that plaiteth the net shall He not hate,
Nor His smite who formed the bond?
"Vengeance is Mine," thus saith the Lord.
O Man, put up thy sword.

INSPECTING A BATTERY.

★The illustration on the second page of this Supplement shows General Trochu inspecting a powerful battery erected on the summit of the Butte Montmartre, which commands a wide sweep of country to the north of Paris. The gunners here are sailors; the sentinels belong to the National Guard. The distant view looks toward Argenteuil, Montmorency, and St. Denis. The railway to Calais and Boulogne is shown beneath on the right of the hill, and part of the convent of Montmartre lies close under the hill to the left.

REVIEWING TROOPS IN PARIS.

THE scene depicted in the illustration on the third page of this Supplement, showing the members of the provisional government reviewing the National Guard, took place immediately after the insane attempt of M. Flourens, at the head of the Red Republicans, to overthrow the government, and install himself and his friends as leaders. The readiness of the National Guard, fortunately for Paris, prevented the accomplishment of this design. It is said saved the city from the horrors of riot and anarchy. This took place on the 10th of October. A few days afterward the gunboat Farcy arrived, and publicly thanked for their promptitude and fidelity.

CARRIER PIGEONS IN WAR TIME.

THE carrier pigeon employed by the Parisians to convey intelligence to other cities during the present war is larger than the common species, being usually about fifteen inches in length, and weighing from a pound to a pound and a half. The plumage is generally either dun-color or black. The pectoral muscles are very large, denoting a power of vigorous and long-continued flight. As to the instinct, or whatever it may be called, which leads a carrier pigeon to make such wondrous flights, naturalists seem to be pretty well agreed that it is made up of two elements—love of home and keenness of sight. Mr. Rennie, speaking of the pigeon's power of vision, says: "We have not a doubt what is by the eye alone that the carrier pigeon performs those extraordinary aerial journeys which have from the earliest ages excited astonishment. We have frequently witnessed the experiment made with other pigeons of taking them to a distance when the dove-cot expressly to observe their manner of finding their way back; and we feel satisfied that their singular flights are uniformly the same. On being let go from the bag in which they have been conveyed, they rise to conceal themselves on the road they dart off on an irregular excursion as if it were more to ascertain the reality of their freedom than to make an effort to return. But they find themselves at full liberty they direct their flight in circles round the spot whence they have been liberated, not only increasing the diameter of the circle at every round, but rising at the same time gradually higher. This is continued as long as the eye can discern the birds: and hence we conclude that it is not confirmed after we lose sight of them—a constantly increasing circle being made till they ascertain some known object, enabling them to shape a direct course." A spiral directly the reverse in character is made by a pigeon let down from the ear of a balloon; the bird drops perpendicularly for some distance, and then begins to wheel round in a descending spiral, increasing in diameter until some previously known object is descried by which the flight home may be regulated. Their vision is undoubtedly very acute. In the wild state, as seen in this country, they fly in amazingly large flocks over wide ranges of country, keeping high in the air, and flying with extended front, so as to enable them to survey hundreds of acres at once. They can descry a fertile field at a considerable distance, and will descend with unerring accuracy to enjoy the meal of which they are in search.

Whatever may be said about the instinct that is at work, a good deal of training is necessary to make the pigeon's flight serve their fight. The Turks have paid much attention to this matter. When a young pigeon arrives at full strength of wing, it is taken from the nest in a light basket, and taken to a distance of half a mile or so from home, where it is allowed to feed alone, looks keenly around, selects a course, and flies home. It is then tried a mile, two miles, four, eight miles, until it will traverse the whole length or breadth of a kingdom. If the pigeon fail in the first journey or two, it is discarded as not being fitted for this kind of work. These Turkey pigeons were regularly used as media of communication in past years. Russell, in his "History of Aleppo," tells us that the Turkey Company's establishment at that city employed carrier pigeons to bring news from Scanderoon, the nearest Mediterranean port. When any of the Company's ships arrived there, the name of the ship, the hour of her arrival, and other particulars, were written on a slip of paper, and fastened under a pigeon's wing; and the bird, set loose, flew back to Aleppo (its home) in two and a half or three hours, the distance being about seventy miles. The pigeon's feet were dipped in vinegar to keep them cool and to avoid the delay which would occur if the bird were tempted to descend at the sight of water. The best pigeons would fly a hundred miles over the Aleppo, and it was anxiety about the chicken that hurried the parents back. It was found that if the pigeon were kept at Scanderoon more than a fortnight, they could not be relied upon for returning to Aleppo; the pigeons of the Scala dominos fauled and weakened. There are lofty hills between Scanderoon and Aleppo; the birds, instead of ascending gradually in the manner of those hills, used to dart up vertically to an amazing height, where they could lark it over them.

There was a great deal of this kind of pigeonexpressing in old days. Some of the victors at the Olympic games used to send off pigeons with news to distant friends by pigeon-express. When Modena was besieged by Antony, pigeon-intelligence was maintained by pigeons between Decimus Brutus and Hirtius; and Pliny was so much struck with the bird in 3,000 years. Thousands have been distributed to the army, and they can be employed in places where field-artillery is impracticable.

THE PARIS HORSE-FLESH MARKET.

THE necessities of the time have caused great activity in the Paris horse-flesh trade. The great market was usually held on Wednesday and Saturdays on the Boulevard d'Enfer, but since the commencement of the siege it has been decided that Mondays, Tuesdays, and Fridays shall be additional market-days for the sale of horses intended for slaughter. Upon these days the show of horses is now very large, and a government commissioner is there to examine the animals exposed for sale, and brands those which it deems fit for human food. The ordinary weight of a horse ranges from 400 to 450 kilogrammes, and the selling value is from 40 to 50 centimes the kilogramme. On the 25th of October 700 horses were offered at the market, and 400 were slaughtered, most of the remainder having been retained for the purpose of remounts. Asses, mules and mules are also sold in the market, and are in great demand. The asses are eagerly sought after, and bring 75 centimes per kilogramme of the living animal.

WILLIAM THE VICTORIOUS.

THE King of Prussia on being informed by telegraph by the King of Prussia of the fall of Metz, replied thus: "I hail with the deepest thankfulness the capture of Metz, so important for the result of the war, and send you my best thanks for your skillful strategy. When the forty-one day reviews the splendid successes which the German forces under your command have uninterruptedly gained, they will justly give you the name of William the Victorious.

A BAD MOMENT FOR A SOLDIER.

A GERMAN officer, writing from before Metz on the 26th of September, thus relates the opening of the negotiations for a surrender: "On the evening of the 26th a letter arrived at head-quarters from Bazaine, requesting an interview for General Changarnier on the morrow. Prince Frederick Charles granted it, but only on condition that the General should be met by two orderlies near the outposts at 11 A.M. They, however, did not find him. The moment, two thousand paces in breadth, between our outposts and the enemy, was arranged to the minute. The orderlies had to wait and come within one hundred steps of our lines in order to hunt out potatoes, grapes, and forage. This went on till the morning. The French took off their hats to our outposts, pointed to their stomachs, and made gestures indicative of hunger. Our soldiers then winked, the French began their trick, and turned back when they had filled their sacks. The French had through this become so audacious that we were yesterday (25th) forced to drive them with sticks out of a village which they had occupied and would not vacate. As the General did not come, our orderlies took a white towel and went, accompanied by hundreds of unarmed enemies, up to the French outposts, where the guard received them on their saying they expected the General, an approaching carriage was pointed out to them. Changarnier, a venerable man of about eighty, but tolerably hale, hopped out he might do as far as possible, as he could not walk far. Our officers sent for the carriage, and it came so close up that the General had only to climb over a small trench. Changarnier is a republican, but carried his services to the Emperor after the battle of Wörth, and since the 8th of August had been in Metz, where he was attached to Bazaine headquarters. Any separate convention to be blindfolded, and on his arrival here was received by General Steinmetz, and delivered to the Prince. The interview lasted an hour and a half, and he was accompanied as far as the carriage. The General shook hands heart-broken, as his words were, 'We shall fall, but with honor. I wish, gentlemen, that neither you nor any brave soldier may ever experience this.' Thereupon a flood of tears streamed from his eyes. He was led back blindfolded past the outposts. There, the handkerchief being removed, he observed some potato-sackets, and delivered a eulogium to our soldiers. He added that he hoped the negotiations in the evening would lead to some result."

NAVIGABLE BALLOONS.

A FRENCH paper says that M. Dupuy de Lôme, the inventor and constructor of the French ironclad fleet, has recently placed before the Academy of Sciences at Paris a scheme for the construction of navigable balloons. It says:

"He has applied to balloons the principles of aquatic navigation. We can not enter into technical details, but we into the calculations he gives. We shall only say that his balloon has an oval shape, with a rod projecting at each extremity, and to which the screw is hung transversely. At the back a triangular sail, managed by ropes, takes the place of a helm. The motive power is the screw, driven by human power. Four men are necessary to perform the work. The screw, instead of being worked with an axis, turns round round a fixed horizontal axis. The wings consist of ribs of wood covered with silk. In order to avoid loss of ballast in ascending and loss of gas in descending, M. Dupuy de Lôme has placed in the lower part of the balloon an air-balloon resembling the bladder of a fish. It is a kind of gas urse which a pump can compress in order to cause the weight of the balloon, while a valve allows the same air to escape, and thus lighten the balloon. It is possible by these means to obtain a speed of from eight to eleven kilometres per hour. The direction taken by the balloon is the resultant of two forces, the wind and the motive power. If the wind blows from the south, instead of going due north the balloon may be directed either to the northeast or southwest, at an angle of from thirty to five degrees, according to the force of the wind."

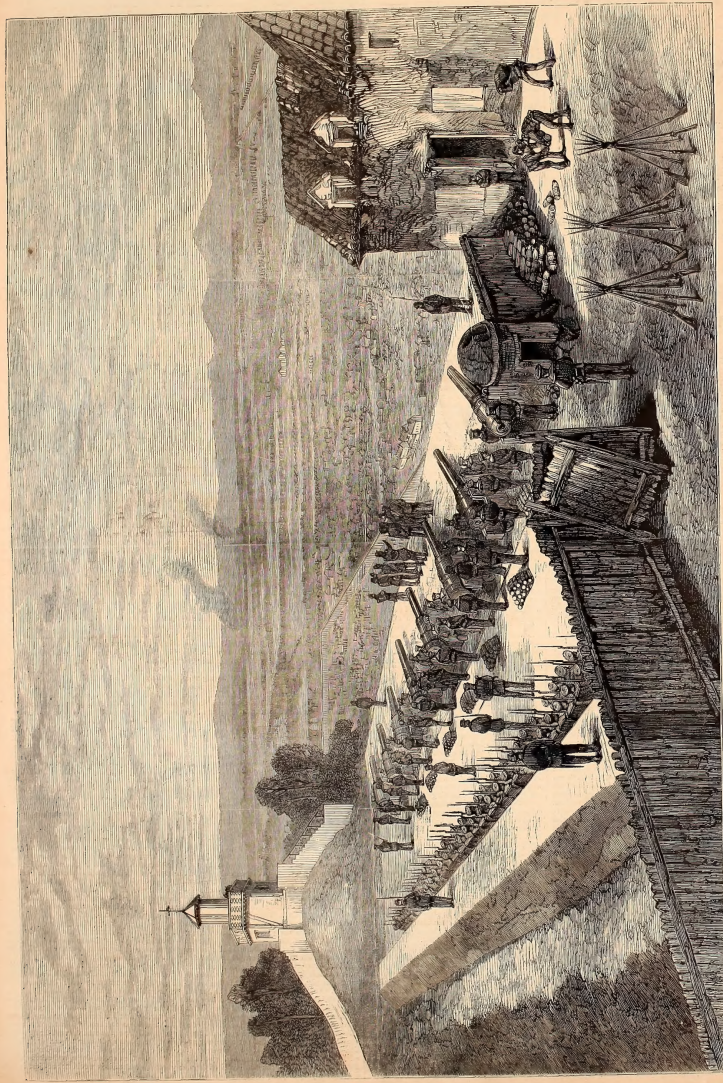
A DAY OF RECKONING COMING.

THE semi-official North German Correspondent contains the following striking paragraph:

"The necessity and justice of making the authors of a war, and not, as hitherto, merely their subordinate agents, responsible for their own acts before the world, have suggested the idea in governmental circles of stipulating as a condition of peace between France and Germany that the intellectual originators and instigators of the present war shall not escape with impunity. Among the responsible parties are included the entire executive which devised the invasion of Germany; the Frenchmen who organized it; the ministers by whom it was recommended; the persons who labored for it, and openly and vehemently welcomed it; the journalists whose constant text was war, and who discussed the triumphs of the coming campaign. The watchword of 'Guilty' or 'Not guilty,' and the penalty to be inflicted, would be left to a jury composed of jurists of neutral states, supposing those states to lend the plan their concurrence; or, in case of their refusal, the privilege might be allotted to the two belligerent nations themselves. The institution of an international tribunal for the settlement of peace-breakers is regarded in governmental circles as likely to furnish no unsatisfactory guarantee for the future of the world."

AN AWKWARD SITUATION

A GERMAN writes thus from Nancy to the Cologne Gazette: "People appear very fanatical in this good town, although they do not go to the guillotine, and the belief is that the whole of the Germans will leave their graves in Lorraine. A thoughtlessly trusted my Prussian head to a hairdresser, and allowed myself to be drawn by him into a political discussion. He was a man with red-hot patriot, and ought to be in Gambetta's place at Tours. The danger of my situation compelled me to agree with him in every thing; but the more I concurred with him the more excited he became. All the officers who had traversed or sedan are cowards, he exclaimed. 'Undoubtedly,' I answered, 'but we must not venture to be seen again in his native country.' 'Of course not,' I admitted, while he was working the shears on my head. 'Only a hundred thousand brave men are under arms in Paris, who will all rather die than yield, and will annihilate all the Prussians.' Snip went the shears close to my ear, so that I shivered. I held my tongue. The man became still more violent. 'The whole nation will rise as one man to crush them.' Snip went the shears again over my ear. 'At least, don't cut my ears off,' I cried, in despair; and the fanatic then cooled down, and asked quietly whether the Prussians would not act just in the same manner."



GENERAL TROCHU INSPECTING A BATTERY.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT REVIEWING THE NATIONAL GUARD IN PARIS.—[SEE FIRST SUPPLEMENT PAGE.]

THE BRAIN'S WORK IN SLEEP.

SOMNAMBULISM is an unmistakable form of unconscious cerebration. Here, while consciousness is wholly dormant, the brain performs coolly and with most brilliant operations. Coleridge's poem of "Kubla Khan," composed in opium sleep, is an instance of its achievements in the realm of pure imagination. Many cases are recorded of students rising at night, seating themselves at their desks there writing down whole columns of algebraic calculations, solutions of geometric problems, and opinions on difficult cases of law. Calmly says that Condillac brought to a conclusion at night in his sleep the reasonings of the day. In all such cases the work done asleep seems better than that done in waking hours; there is no lack of anecdotes which would point to the possibility of persons in an unconscious state accomplishing things in unconscious ways altogether. The beyond their ordinary powers altogether. The muscular strength of men in somnambulistic delirium, their power of balancing themselves on roofs, of finding their way in the dark, are physical advantages exercised for such conditions. Abnormal acuteness of hearing is also a well-known accompaniment of them; and in this direction we must understand the marvelous story vouched for by the late Sir Edward Codrington. The captain in command of a man-of-war was roused suddenly in his cabin, with a sentinel, an usual, seated in his door. In the middle of the night the captain rose from his bed, called suddenly to the sentinel, and sharply desired him to tell the lieutenant of the watch to alter the course by so many points. Next morning the officer, on greeting the captain, observed that a change must have been made in the course of their position and had given such an order, as there had been a mistake in the reckoning, and the ship was in shoal water, on the point of striking a reef. "I!" said the astonished captain; "I gave no order." I kept soundly in my cabin." The sentinel was summoned, and, of course, testified that the experienced commander had, in his usual unknown way, learned the peril of his ship, and saved it, even while in a state of absolute unconsciousness.

Whatever residue of truth may be found hereafter in the crucible wherein shall be tested both the marvels of spirit-rapping, mesmerism, and hypnotism—whatever revelation of forgotten facts or successful hits at secrecies may be discernably due to the action of unconscious cerebration. The person reduced to a state of coma is liable to receive suggestions from without, and these suggestions and queries are answered by his somnambulism out of whatever portion of memory it may retain. What a man never knew, that no magic has ever yet enabled him to do; but what he has once known, and in his conscious hours has forgotten, that, on the contrary, is often recalled by the suggestions of the other operator when he is in a state of hypnotism. A natural dream sometimes does the same thing. I once all the discoveries of hidden treasures, corpses, etc., made through dreams, generally with the fact of the obvious ascendancy of a ghost. General Sleeman mentions that, being in pursuit of Thugs up the country, his wife one morning very interested him to move their tents from the spot—a lovely opening in a jungle —where she had been lulled by the previous evening. She said she had been haunted all night by the sight of dead men. Information received during the day induced the General to order digging under the ground whereon they had camped; and beneath the floor of the women's tent a considerable corpse, victims of the Thugs. It is easily conceivable that the foul exhale of death suggested to the lady, in the unconscious cerebration of her dream, her horrible vision.

Drunkenness is a condition of coma when conscious self is more or less completely obfuscated, but in which unconscious cerebration goes on for a long time. The proverbial ingenuity in talk which drunken men full without hurting themselves can only be explained by the fact that the unconscious will does not interfere with the unconscious instinct of falling on the parts of the body least likely to be injury. The same ingenuity is enjoyed by persons not intoxicated, who at the moment of an accident do not very violently exert the muscles being which way they shall strike the ground. All the ludicrous stories of the absence of mind or of injury men may obviously be explained by supposing that their unconscious cerebration is blindly fulfilling the best known and most unconscious will does not interfere with the unconscious instinct of falling on the parts of the body least likely to be injury. The same ingenuity is enjoyed by persons not intoxicated, who at the moment of an accident do not very violently exert the muscles being which way they shall strike the ground. All the ludicrous stories of the absence of mind or of injury men may obviously be explained by supposing that their unconscious cerebration is blindly fulfilling the best known and most unconscious instinct.

"WHAT is Providence, I wonder?" says that the wag, if a little exhibit, was by no means really drunk. Such a joke could hardly have come from Shirley Brooks, even one so well accustomed to the production of humor. As in dreams, intoxication never brings new elements into action play, but only abnormally excites latent ones. It is only a Person who, when drunk, manifests his horse and kicks his wife. A drunken woman, on the contrary, unless an habitual virago, rarely strikes and bully. She possesses the vehicle for her emotions—her tongue—is the organ of whose services her unconscious cerebration avails itself.

SHAUN'S SORROW.*

A TALE OF ALL-HALLOW EVE.

MOST of our readers have a clear idea conveyed to their minds by the words "an Irish cabin." A vision of smoke and bare stones; cows, children, and pigs mingled in inextricable confusion; a withered old woman knitting; a dark-haired, grey-eyed girl, with bare feet, but much her blue petticoat; two or three men, unshaven, stalwart, and Irish-looking—there is no more to see.

In just such a cottage as this (or rather "house," for no Irishman would confess to a cottage) a party was gathered on the night before "All-Saints' Eve." It was after sundown, and the last rosy tinge had faded from the sky, a sea-breeze which had blown through it so keenly all day.

What will ye have for supper the morrow, Madge?" said a tall young man, who leaned near the entrance of mother's cabin as well as permitted by the title of window. He addressed his sister, who was facetously peeling potatoes for a round pig, on the floor beside herself on a block of turf at his feet.

"Can't ye think yourself that I'm peeling for buttern,† Mebeas' Mother bade Nancy bring over a quarter stone of flour. There is not an ear or eye or finger silent. If one Antony will cross the ferry for a bit of fresh meat we should eat Hallow-e'en supper in grand style."

"Ye'll have a fine pig, Madge," said Shaun, as they term it, "set-aside," of Western Ireland. As a social gathering, corresponding to Christmas-day or Easter-Sunday in the estimation of the people. "I wonder did Father Dennis tell the people to pay all due honors to its observance; even the very poorest among them collect their eggs to save up their pence to spend on the special luxury of "white bread" at this time.

Michael O'Donnel and his family were accustomed to a sort of rough plenty. Their farm was large, their cows many; and since the father's death, Madge, the eldest daughter, had always found it easy to keep the house in plenty of potatoes during the autumn and winter, and in a small meal and cakes made through the spring and summer. They had their own milk, butter, and eggs; and what comfort could the people of Inver County "strive bread" at this time.

Michael O'Donnel and his children were accustomed to a sort of rough plenty. Their farm was large, their cows many; and since the father's death, Madge, the eldest daughter, had always found it easy to keep the house in plenty of potatoes during the autumn and winter, and in a small meal and cakes made through the spring and summer. They had their own milk, butter, and eggs; and what comfort could the people of Inver County "strive bread" at this time.

Michael O'Donnel and his family

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 728.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1870. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT. PRICE TEN CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

INSIDE PARIS—VOLUNTEERS ON GUARD DUTY AT A POSTERN GATE.—[SEE PAGE 798.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1870.

☞ With this Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY is published the FIRST OF A SERIES OF EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENTS, containing an Original and Magnificent Double-Page Cartoon, by our Special Artist, J. F. GOODRICH, entitled,

WAR TIME IN BAVARIA;

together with Another Chapter of VIRGINIA GABRIEL: AN ADVENTURE, illustrated; several interesting Stories, and other literary attractions.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient AFTER THE RETURN-ING OR THEIR VERDICT SHALL BE KNOWN. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

THE PARTIES.

THOSE who speculate upon the formation of a new party, or gravely propose it, seem to suppose that a great party is organized as a corporation is chartered. But that does not seem to us to be the way in which a party arises. In our own history party divisions began during the administration of Washington, and the Federal and the National Republican parties continued until the former disappeared, leaving in the Monroe era of good feeling, no immediate successor. The next great party division was that of the Whigs and the Democrats. It turned philosophically upon the question of the functions of government, and practically upon the just and constitutional policy of the great internal improvements, a national bank, tariffs, etc. The Whigs contended for a liberal, fostering, protective, and developing government. The Democrats declared that it was by the enterprise of the people, and not by the action of the government, that the most solid results are to be obtained. But gradually the increase of slavery, and the development by machinery of the product of slave labor, made it essential to controlling element in politics. The intensity of the moral agitation of the subject, with the fanaticism of the slave interest, which used the government for its own purposes, and absolutely dominated the Democratic party, with which it allied itself, and, upon the other hand, the economic sagacity which perceived the material impolicy of slavery, all concentrated political interest upon the subject.

The Democratic party made an abject alliance with slavery. Its policy proceeded entirely from the slave leaders, and its success—it was made evident—had it been doubted—by the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Whig party, unwilling to take any step that upon the one absorbing and paramount question of the time, was virtually annihilated in 1852, and the new party division of Republicans and Democrats appeared, which still continues. But does it seem to any one who speaks of a new party that the organization which to-day controls the Administration, and holds a great majority of the States, and which at the intermediate election, when every Administration party is weakest, has carried forty or fifty majority in Congress, is in the condition of the Federal party or the Whig party when they were superseded? The war of 1812 finally destroyed the Federal party, and the slavery question, which was supreme, and which it evaded, destroyed the Whig party in 1852. What issue is there to-day so overshadowing and absorbing that it will probably and properly supersede the Republican party? If the Republican revenue reformers, as we have said, should desert in a body to the Democratic party, they might do a great deal of mischief. But they will not do it. That scheme is an important element to-day in the first place it is not paramount to all others, and in the second, if it were, it is by no means evident that the reform is more practicable under Democratic ascendency.

There will be no new party until there is a general feeling that the party system is essential for the national welfare is more probable with a Democratic than a Republican Administration, and that feeling does not exist. Those who hope for a reform of the civil service, for revenue reform, for a wise foreign policy, for maintenance of the authoritative will of Union, for honest and economical administration, and for reform of electoral corruption, do not expect them from the Democratic party. But they do expect them from the Republican party, and they expect them because they are harmonious with the principles, history, and the composition of that party. Some Republicans will, of course, leave the party. Mr. GRATZ BROWN, of Missouri, who there are not faithful Republican hitherto, designs, if we read his late serenade speech correctly, to act with the Democratic party hereafter. Mr. CARL SCHURZ, his coadjutor in the late election, has expressed no such intention. Mr. BROWN sees that he has brought the Democratic party into power in his State, and he naturally wishes to make the best of the situation. But Mr. SCHURZ declines to believe that there are not great national issues upon which he must be a Republican. There are many revenue reformers in New England also, and a strong party for the civil service reform, but they act within and not without the Republican lines.

The Chicago Tribune, therefore, seems to us mistaken in supposing that there can be "a reconstruction and reorganization of parties"—in other words, a new party; and when it speaks, among others, of Mr. GARRISON, Mr. BEECHER, Mr. SCHURZ, and Mr. SUMNER as favoring such an attempt, we are very sure that it is mistaken. Mr. SCHURZ and Mr. SUMNER, at least, have distinctly denied sympathy with any effort to destroy the Republican party. There are some questions they differ with the President, but they do not allow their disapproval of certain executive measures to paralyze their loyalty to the party. The proposal for a new organization, under the circumstances, is, therefore, a declaration in favor of Democratic ascendency. That party is certainly very unlikely to commit hari-kari if it should see its opponent engaged in that operation. Indeed, it already inviting the Chicago Tribune and Mr. SCHURZ to walk into its parlor. The assumption that revenue reformers belong with the Democracy, not that Democratic revenue reformers will secede and join a new organization, is what the Chicago Tribune thinks of revenue reform and civil service reform as objects equally desirable, it would be interesting to know how lively a friend it has of reform of the civil service from the Democracy.

In the present situation of the country, when the Republican party is neither disbanding nor likely to disband, the Republican who asks whether a new party is not desirable, merely asks whether it is desirable that the Republican party should be successful. If, indeed, the party had gone to pieces, like the Federal in 1812 and the Whig in 1852, he might wisely ask whether he should vote with the Democratic party for a new organization. But we must not forget that the country was so ready for the Republican party that, in 1856, it polled 1,200,000 votes in less than a year, 500 votes cast, and elected its President in 1860. Is there any corresponding situation now? The career and character and leadership and necessities of the Democratic party are known of all men. Who believes that great and salutary reforms of political corruption can be effected under or to proceed from it? Who supposes that greater order, progress, and economy, would follow the destruction of the Republican party?

GENERAL BUTLER'S TRIAL.

GENERAL BUTLER has repeated the substance of his latest views upon the Irish question in a speech. The General remarks that the ears of a certain offender are very large, that two wells, a lunatic asylum, a pump handy, but he would by no means recommend nailing the ears to the pump, although the sinner richly deserves it, and it could be very easily done. His arraignment of England is not upon the ground that the British Government peremptorily refused to admit the Confederacy, nor that the Alabama and Shenandoah were suffered to escape, but that after they escaped they were received, fitted, and equipped in British ports; besides which England was "bitterly hostile;" and she has suffered a Dominion to be created on our entire northern frontier for the purpose of crippling us, while she has destroyed our commerce upon the sea. Besides, she is unfriendly, because, intermeddling in the fisheries, out of which serious collisions are sure to arise. These offenses General BUTLER considers past, and then proceeds to consider the remedy. This is nonintercourse, in the first place, which will probably lead to war; then a maritime war, with England consents to relinquish her American possessions.

The General can not conceal his fervent hope that war may arise. "Far be it from me to suggest," he substantially says, "that the strength of the Democratic party, the vote of 1,200,000 Irishmen, and that they would be quick to the war party; or that the Democrats themselves would, of course, support the Government in a foreign war; or that our Southern brethren, now somewhat discomposed, would gladly join in a contest directed again what was as loving brethren; or that it would be a war upon the ocean, in which only a few sailors (whose interests as laborers are dear to me!) would be killed, while the stimulus given to American production would not only pay the cost of the war, but make the whole rich besides; far from me," says the General, "be the disposition to suggest such unspeakable facts; but when I think of them, I cannot help praying that I may be saved from temptation."

This speech of General BUTLER's was delivered in the Music Hall, where a few weeks before Mr. Theodore Hinckley spoke upon the same general subject. Which speech, in manliness, in lofty spirit, in sincere and generous humanity, was preferable? Which was the speech of a man honorably anxious that the two great nations whose harmony is essential to the development of free government should be at peace, if peace be possible, and which that of a politician who seeks to kick up a row which he hopes may save what he considers a moribund party? Which country is the more fortunate in its orator upon the occasion—America or England? General BUTLER's speech is remarkable for its unfairness. We have felt and we feel as deeply as any Americans the conduct of the British Government during our war. But we should certainly be the meanest of ingrates if we forgot that great body of Englishmen composed not only of popular leaders like JOHN BRIGHT and CONDEN and GOLDWIN SMITH and CAIRNES and THOMAS HUGHES, but of the great mass of the cotton operatives, who stood fast by us, and even consented to starve that we might save. And what is to be said about BUTLER? Let us have non-intercourse. Let us keep back our cotton and breadstuffs. Could we wish paralyzed Manchester, Birmingham, and Bradford will work a revolution! That is to say, let us starve the workmen who were true to us until their suffering brings the Government to terms.

What did these workmen do for us? They sustained their liberal leaders in England who compelled the Government to decline the invitation of France to recognize the independence of the Confederacy. General BUTLER says that the British Government was not more openly hostile toward us because it was afraid of the result. Not at. It was because its hands were held by those whom the General now proposes to pinch and starve. We insist, as they do, that they shall not be forgotten; and we have no doubt whatever that they will be infinitely more serviceable in settling the difficulty than any Democratic leading would-be out for a party cry at home.

We hope that the intelligent Englishmen who have remained true in this country will reform their countrymen of the precise weight of General BUTLER in our politics. He is a man whose services in certain angry junctures of the war were signal and most efficient, and gratefully remembered. But there is no politician in the country less trusted than the General. He is universally known to be always wondering which way the wind is going to blow; but never has the gift of seeing further into mill-stones than quieter persons. He speaks for himself only, not for his party or the Administration, and he very truly stated in his address. But if the Republican party with which he acts should ever become a war party with England, it would be only because there is no longer honorably possible even to the most friendly sentiment, and not because of 1,200,000 votes that might keep the party in power.

RUSSIA AND ENGLAND.

THE position assumed in the Russian note upon the treaty of Paris, as we said last week, is destructive of its provisions. If any one is bound by a treaty whenever it chooses to declare any of its provisions violated, it is not bound at all. There is no ultimate tribunal to which the subject can be referred. A nation in signing a treaty engages its faith, but there is no superior authority to enforce its observance. If the faith fails, every thing falls. A nation, indeed, does not pledge nor compromise its sovereignty. It only pledges its faith to the treaty. But when it has become a party to a joint understanding, it has virtually agreed that it will proceed solely in a friendly spirit, that a friendly spirit requires that it shall refer to all the signers any question which may arise under the agreement. If it is dissatisfied with the judgment, it has its remedy. It can then declare, as a sovereign, that it takes all the risk of withdrawal upon a conquest, the conditions of which it believes to be violated.

This is the view taken by the English note of the Earl of Clarendon, and there can be no doubt of its justice. It is very possible that the Earl did not sufficiently consider two things: first, that nations are not as punctilious in such cases as good faith and obvious principle require, and that England herself should be extremely careful how she lays down abstract principles of international conduct; and second, that when Russia makes such a declaration at such a time, she probably studied her opportunity, and means to do what she says, and that, therefore, the answer should be so expressed as to avoid a specific reply, unless war was already accepted. But the English note only suggested that if a reference to a conference had been accepted by Russia, England would gladly have assented. If Russia chooses, a peaceful issue will certainly follow, because in a congress Russia would undoubtedly have her way, and while she triumphed she could not be accused of dishonorable violation of a treaty.

Should a congress assemble, Russia would present two facts: first, that the treaty was made to her disadvantage; and secondly, that when the disadvantageous treaty had not been respected by the other powers. Both positions would be correct. If the congress assented to such modification as Russia might propose, she would have prevailed peaceably. If, on the other hand, the congress declined to modify, Russia would properly reply that she had done what was possible for a united solution of the difficulty; and her action being apparently unacceptable, she must resume her original right, and withdraw from what she believes to be a broken compact. If then England or any other power proposed to make war, it would be upon some other ground. That ground, of course, is evident. It was the consideration that originally made the treaty to the dissdvantage of Russia. It is the fear of the Russian extension in the East.

If, therefore, England is tenacious, it is not because a treaty is formally violated, but because the violation of the treaty is accepted by her as the beginning of a policy injurious to her interests. England looks at India, not at Turkey. Turkey is only a barrier maintained by Europe in the path of Russia. But should Russia make the question to the great powers, and should they decide that she was justified under the restraints imposed by the treaty, her refusal to be bound by her strength by conditions imposed upon her helplessness would be naturally and universally respected.

CHURCH AND STATE

THE Reverend Father HECKER recently delivered a lecture in Boston upon the true method of caring for the poor, whether by the church or the state. He contrasted the sluggish, the cruelty, the demoralization of the state care with the tender supervision of the unlearned nothing poor by the charitable brotherhoods and sisterhoods of the Roman Catholic Church. Father HECKER cried history. He told not spare Henry the Eighth, and he quoted English and American reports. He might have alluded with effect to GIBBON'S Baby, but that dragging little nature shows conclusively that the Roman Catholic methods are very much like the rest. The whole discourse of Mr. HECKER, however, was a practical application of the principle which he stated—as reported—when he began. "The Catholic Church teaches that the whole man comes under the jurisdiction of the Church." That has been always the cardinal axiom of his denomination. That being conceded, all the rest follows. It is, in fact, the extreme demand of his Church.

If the statement which is now made that a quarter of our population is of that Church, the principle announced by Mr. HECKER becomes interesting. Translated into common language it is this: "Every act and every motive of life must be subordinated, not to conscience, not to religion, not to a sense of moral duty, but to a body of ecclesiastics. History, to which Mr. HECKER appeals, shows us what the purposes and character of the ecclesiastical body have often been. Every man's knowledge of himself and his own experience teach him what such a body must always be. Mr. HECKER has done a great service by publicly and plainly stating the objective point of the activity of his Church. It is a statement which would satisfy the most extravagant ultramontane. And it is not to be forgotten that the particular ecclesiastical body which makes the declaration through Father HECKER is the only Christian denomination in this country which has expressed political purposes. True to the theory that the Church should take care of "the whole man," it demands its share of the school money, that it may put the schools in which its children are taught at the control and under under its own ecclesiastical control. Faithful to the principle of the subjection of "the whole man" to the Church, it will enforce its views of his political duty. It is upon this principle, and no other, that the Church by the Pope claimed authority to release subjects from their allegiance. The doctrine is that the Church, which is of no country, but is universal, is charged with the care of every subject of every man. It demands that the Church be first obeyed, and then such authority as the Church may designate. It demands that the subject of the Church in England or America be loyal or disloyal to his government as the Church, to whose jurisdiction "the whole man" is subordinated, may direct.

We say that Father HECKER's doctrine is the extreme demand of his Church, and he has recently returned from the Œcumenical Council at Rome. That Council has affirmed the infallibility of the Pope. That, however, he was always infallible. Then, upon all subjects which the Church could rightfully decide, the Pope was always spoken infallibly. The object, if the Church is to regulate every human relation, as Father HECKER claims, the Pope might justly control temporal affairs, and the universal interference with local political governments was justifiable. Yet where shall we find the evidence of the assumption of the Church upon which its clergy always lay such stress? If Father HECKER should explain that when he says "the whole man comes under the jurisdiction of the Church" he means only so far as the Church has rightful jurisdiction, he plays with phrases in a manner unworthy of him, and which we do not believe he intends. But if his words mean what they express, he is at variance with other scrupulous Catholics. Archbishop PURCELL tells us that when he asked in the Œcumenical Council where was the authority of the Popes to depose HENRY or ELIZABETH, or to absolve their subjects from their allegiance, "the entire Council, with one voice, cried out, 'Those Popes had no authority, no commission from God to pretend to any such power.'" Yet, if the Church is charged with jurisdiction of "the whole man," and the Pope, when speaking upon subjects rightfully cognizable by the Church, speaks infallibly, then when he annuls allegiance he is within his acknowledged sphere.

The reader of Father HECKER'S praises of his Church need not deny to that organization any merit which it may justly claim—the heroism of many a missionary, the wonders of its discipline. But when he is asked to surrender to any body of men, because they are ecclesiastics, the supreme control of all human relations, he will decline to barter into history and experience, and ask himself whether Spain and the Netherlands under PHILIP the Second, or any country or age in which ecclesiastical authority is virtually supreme—the rural parts of France and Spain, and the patronage of St. Peter, under the immediate political control of the Pope—present a spectacle of human well-being which persuades him that the practice of Father HECKER'S doctrine would be likely to increase the happiness of mankind.

THE SITUATION IN MISSOURI.

THE ST. LOUIS Democrat makes an interesting statement in regard to the late vote in Missouri. It was assumed out of the State that about a third of the Republican vote was cast for Mr. BROWN, and that the enfranchisement of the ex-rebels would add about 70,000 votes to the Democratic party, which would give it the permanent control of the State. But the Democrat says that there were 90,000 Republican votes at the election, of which 65,000 were for BROWN, and 25,000 for Mr. MCCLURG; and about 85,000 Democratic votes, of which 38,000 were for BROWN and 5000 for MCCLURG. The Democrat, upon investigation, is of opinion that if every man recently enfranchised should vote with the Democrats, the Democratic strength would not exceed 116,000, against 130,000 Republican votes; and it concludes, first, that a majority of the Republicans voted for BROWN; second, that more Republicans than Democrats voted for BROWN; and third, that the Republicans, if united, have now more than 14,000 majority in the State, even if all the newly-enfranchised men vote against them; and that majority, by immigration and other causes, will be still larger in 1872.

On the other hand, as GENERAL GRANT will probably be the Republican candidate in 1872, it will be impossible for Governor BROWN to support a man of whom he has spoken as he did of the President during the recent campaign; and he has as totally forfeited the confidence, which can not be assumed, he can distract the party so as to give the State to the Democrats. In his sermonic speech Governor BROWN said; "I am the last man in the nation to disregard the obligations under which I stand, and the first election I expect to meet my obligations are in the largest measure due to the Democratic party of the State of Missouri." It is quite evident that the Governor does not regard his election as a Republican victory; and although he says that there was no appeal to party, his speech is a long series of praise of the Democratic party as released from its old bonds, and established upon "a platform upon which the young men of the nation can stand." Governor BROWN, therefore, in his own view, is a Missouri Democrat. He is of opinion that the regeneration of politics has begun, and in his dithyrambic of the Democracy he has not even a word of remembrance for the party with which he was so long associated, and whose achievements will long be the chief glory of our history. That the St. Louis Democrat also intends to drop the Republican party we shall regret.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY AND REFORM.

WE observe that the Boston Advertiser asserts that the Secretary of the Treasury is unjustly charged with indifference to the civil service reform, and that he has "done all in his power to secure honest examinations." But the implication of the Advertiser's remarks that appointments in the various branches of the Treasury Department are not political, and that patronage is abolished, is certainly unfounded. In some of the very details mentioned by the Advertiser the fatal power of patronage is most evident. We are very glad to know that the Secretary of the Treasury approves the principle of the civil service reform, and we can assure him that there is a great deal he can yet do to reduce it to practice. But the only measure which would spare him all trouble, and enable him to give himself wholly to his official duties, would be a wise civil service bill. And the Secretary in favor of a law upon the subject, or does he only favor what the Advertiser calls a dead law "which he has revived"? We hope he is not dead? And is it not while this law has been upon the statute-book that the great abuses of the service have occurred? A clear and positive statement from the Secretary, exposing the present system and recommending a real reform—a statement such as Secretary COX made last year—would be of the greatest value to the country.

But meanwhile the evil of the existing system is too radical and fatal to be trifled with by any vague and well-meant exculpations of particular persons. It is the system which is responsible, not the heads of departments. Every Secretary now takes office with the implied obligation to administer its patronage in the interest of the party. There are certain important officers whose chief business is the regulation of patronage. The political weight, as well as the fidelity and service of subordinates, in a number of public offices is enormous. To retain an experienced postmaster in the most insignificant village, who is not offensively partisan, is regarded as an insult by the party in the town. And the Secretary of the Treasury knows, as every body knows, that if the Republicans were to lose control of the government, every one of the officers whom he has appointed upon proper examination would be turned adrift for reasons that might be as "properly examined" as the Secretary's success. The minutest points in the service are character and ability, and permanence of tenure. If the Secretary could say that every man he had appointed had improved to be fit for his place, he could not say that the fitness would retain the place. And that is one of the essential objects of the reform. It is the uncertainty of tenure which is so horribly demoralizing. The man who is put into an office by political pressure, and who knows that the utmost honesty, devotion, and intelligence will not hold him in his place against the stronger political pressure which puts in a candidate, is under a cruel temptation to make hay while the sun shines. And it is not a temptation to which any nation can wisely subject its citizens.

If, then, the Secretary of the Treasury has been really prevented from applying the civil service reform by carefully ascertaining the qualifications of candidates, and by rejecting those who are found to be incompetent, we may justly expect from him a public report, or a law which would make his efforts really effective. If the Secretary merely directs to-day the examination of candidates who are to-morrow appointed, and to-morrow directs the examination of others who are more powerfully nominated, and the business of such examinations be to-day's, what has the country gained? It is not a fact that competent persons are now appointed to the various branches of the Treasury service. But if it were, would not common-sense suggest that competent officers should have some security of their positions?

NOTES.

THE article in the Edinburgh Review upon the European situation, which is attributed to Mr. GLADSTONE, shows the immense power of civilized public opinion, the new power with which statesmen and rulers have to deal. So far as GLADSTONE, or the Queen, or any woman, against a war with Russia, are stated to have seriously influenced the policy of the ministry by their calm and moderating appeals. It is very evident that the old days of war-making were passed, and that statesmen were deeply conscious of the necessity of popular approval in proceeding to extremities. It is long since the American people began to support blindly the summons of the Government to the field in defense of what is called national honor. A new question arises, and Lord Granville, for instance, declares that one course should be taken, and Mr. BRIGHT, representing public opinion, declaring the one counselor to be as disinterested as the other, and at fully equal pains to study out the law, will pause and reflect, and the decision is as likely to be against the minister as for him. It is the most significant sign of progress, for every thing that tends to make war more difficult is a blessing to mankind. War is sometimes inevitable, but it is never any thing but the least of two terrible evils.

AMONG the new magazines none is more striking and beautiful in form and in contents than Art, an illustrated monthly devoted to the fine and industrial arts, and which has absorbed the Photographic Art Journal. It is published by SAMSON LOW, SON, & MARSTON, in London, and MESSRS. PUTNAM & SON are the New York publishers. Price three shillings sixpence a year, half per annum. The illustrations are various and striking, and the articles are interesting and valuable. In the September number there are two drawings by the American VEDDER, and six by the late MARSHALL, engravings in the South Kensington Museum. The work is, of course, addressed, not to lovers, to a public interested in art, but for them it will be found very satisfactory.

THE Pope has certainly one effective weapon, which it is reported that he will use against VICTOR EMANUEL. Mr. HARRIS, the British minister at Rome the Pope will order the churches in that city to be closed. The city, in fact, will be laid under an interdict. All public religious services in churches and the music of incessant bells would be most distressing to the people, and the law in the kingdom of Italian Roman Catholic population it would be as if a visible curse rested upon the city. It is possible to conceive certain Protestant towns in which the temporary closing of the churches would not profoundly excite the people. But to close the church to the average Roman would be to close to him the gates of heaven. He would feel that the favor of God was averted. Should this be done, there will certainly be a powerful pressure of public dissatisfaction in Rome. The Pope's hope, of course, is that it will be directed against the Italian Government. But it is not impossible that the people may find leaders who will say, "Let us not sacrifice our newly found liberty to the Holy Father, but let us compel him to yield to that liberty." So if the Pope should insist, it is not impossible that he may be driven from Rome by the Romans. And when, by insisting upon his interdict against the popular monstrances, it became evident that it was leveled at the Romans as well as at the new order of things, Italian leaders would have gained a great advantage. The interdict, however, is a most powerful weapon, under the circumstances, in the papal armory.

IT is remarkable that the French were as ignorant of the movements of the Prussians before the battle of Sedan as the Prussians were of those of the French before the equally fatal battle of Jena, sixty years before. Lord Malmesbury says in his journal: "A general and decisive battle took place on the 14th [of October, 1806] between Jena and Auerstadt, which ended in the total defeat and annihilation of the Prussian army. The force on each side was nearly equal, amounting to about 120,000 men. The two armies had for some days been near each other, but the Prussians did not know that the main body of the French did not know where the French were till a day or two before the battle." LORIN NAYLORDS says, in his late apology: "So well did the Prussians conceal their movements behind the formidable screen of cavalry, that they deployed before them in all directions that, notwithstanding the most unswerving vigilance, they never quite knew where the mass of their troops was, nor, in consequence, whom their chief efforts should be directed."

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

WE present to our readers a list of appropriations made at the last session of Congress for literary, scientific, educational, and benevolent purposes, which will amount to $1,000,000, which, we think, will be of interest as showing a generous recognition of the claims of such objects, and an example of what may be looked forward to in the future. It is true that the sums mentioned are considerably less than many foreign governments expend, since the national revenue of the United States is annually about $600,000, while all the national museums of the United States receive only about $25,000. In other directions, however, the disbursements authorized by Congress are much greater than the corresponding appropriations abroad; and we have very good reason to be satisfied with the schedule as it is presented:

1. Benevolent Objects.

Life-saving service on the coast	$48,880
Government Hospital for insane	140,880
Columbia Institution for Deaf and Dumb	46,778
Freedmen's Hospital for Women and Children, District of Columbia	15,000
National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, District of Columbia	16,000
Care of sixty transient paupers	12,000
	$184,658
2. Education.
United States Bureau of Education.	$14,500
Howard and Lincoln University	57,000
	71,500
3. Literature.
Library of Congress	$50,000
Publishing Records, United States Army	2,000
Publishing Records, Navy	2,500
	52,500
4. Museums.
National Museum, in charge of Smithsonian Institution	$20,000
Army Medical Museum	12,000
Agricultural Department Museum ..	6,000
	32,000
5. Science and Art.
Geological Survey of Territories	$10,000
Botanical Garden	5,000
United States Capitol gardens	$48,904
President's house	9,208
Agricultural Department	28,350
	76,094
6. Agriculture.
Department of Agriculture—miscellaneous expenses	$138,070
Of adding thirty already given—grain-science, $38,890; Museum, $6,000; Botanist, $2,500	49,390
Of adding fifteen, $20,000; we have an aggregate of $188,070 for the Agricultural Department.)	138,070
7. Astronomy and Meteorology.
Observations of eclipse, December, 1870, under Coast Survey	$20,000
United States Naval Observatory	20,000
National Observatory	19,000
For meteorology at National Observatory	10,000
Hydrographic notices of storms	50,000
	169,000
8. Surveys, etc.
United States Coast Survey	$103,000
Survey of lakes	150,000
Survey of Louisiana and Tehuantepec ship canal	50,000
Survey of the mouth of the Mississippi	75,000
Professor Powell, survey of Colorado and Dr. Hayden's	12,000
Polar expedition under Captain HALL	50,000
Dr. Hayden's geological survey	25,000
Statistics of wool and mining	10,000
	1,025,000
9. Light-house Establishment	1,871,197
	$3,316,594

Excluding from the above enumeration, as may be considered proper by some, the appropriations for the United States Coast Survey, for the survey of the lakes, and for the light-house establishment (which may be regarded rather as aids to commerce and navigation than as especially literary), there will remain $1,000,000, or $1,052,721 for the general purposes of science, literature, art, education, public utility, etc.

It may be remembered by some of our readers that during the last session of Congress an appropriation of $70,000, to be expended in observations by the Coast Survey on the great solar eclipse of December 22, 1870, was made at the suggestion of the Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, of Ohio. Steps were taken at once by Professor PEIRCE, the Superintendent, to secure the most satisfactory results for the laudable appropriation, and an officer was sent by him to examine the principal places to be involved in the eclipse, in order to form a judgment among them most available for the purposes of the expedition. Two parties have been organized, each consisting of about twelve persons. One, under the direction of Professor PEIRCE himself, will observe in Sicily (Catania probably), while the other, under the direction of Professor WINLOCK, of Harvard Observatory, will proceed to Xeres or elsewhere in Spain. Nearly all the astronomers of the expedition took part in the observations of the eclipse of August, 1869, and consequently are familiar with the use to their purposes in studying the impending phenomenon. It is expected that observations will be made in all branches of science, those with the spectroscope being specially assigned by Professor WOLCOTT GIBBS, assistant by Professors YOUNG and MORTON. Mr. HENRY DRAPER, of New York, prepares the photographic apparatus for Professor PEIRCE'S party, and Mr. HENRY FITZ, JUN., of New York, accompanies him, to superintend this portion of the work. Professor WINLOCK'S party will be accompanied by Captain ALVAN CLARKE, of Cambridgeport, Mass., assisting in the observations.

The polariscope examinations will be made by Professor PRUDDEN, of Professor PEIRCE'S party. The expedition will be accompanied by two officers of the United States Engineers, namely, Major ABBOT and Captain ERNST.

It is understood that Mr. HENRY DRAPER has accepted the warm invitation of Professor PEIRCE to accompany the expedition, which, therefore, will have the benefit of the presence of this eminent physicist.

Up to a very recent period it was supposed that the Mediterranean would be land-locked, owing to the alleged refusal of the Admiralty to furnish a vessel for the transportation of the Nubian caravan. But it was expected that a number of them would take advantage of Professor PEIRCE'S offer. And as it seems probable, after all, that the desired aid will be furnished, we presume that the expedition will sail from Britain in the American party will be quite limited.

The Italian Naval Observatory at Rome also organized two parties for a similar purpose. One of these, under the direction of Professor SECCHI, goes to Spain, the other, embracing Professor ASAPH HALL, Professor HARKNESS, and Professor EASTMAN, proceeds to Sicily.

A British vessel of war, recently touching at the Galapagos, reports that at the island of St. Charles the inhabitants, consisting of forty men and one woman, were habitually occupied in collecting ox-hides for export. Some thousands of cattle were running wild on the island, and birds were dealt with in great numbers. Of the latter, geese were seen, and it is probable that the gigantic race of tortoise remains, formerly well known to whalers, will soon be extinct, if not already so.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR IN FRANCE.

THERE has been no change in the aspect of affairs in and around Paris in the past week. It is reported from London that Paris has still plenty of provisions for two or three half months, four or eight months, and wine and brandy for a year. The people are confident, and are busily engaged in active military defenses on all sides. From Berlin, however, it is reported that large bodies of Prussians, and in some cases regular troops of the garrison at Paris, have passed through the German lines and arrived in surrender. Invariably, it is added, they have been Germans.

Various minor movements are reported to have occurred in different parts of France, in which the advantage remained with the French. But the serious demonstration toward Glen and Montargis, on the eastern flank of the French, was met by the Duke, and the Germans were obliged to change the plan of attack. An movement from Germain fell or was baffled, followed, with the view of overwhelming the French left, Bourbaki was attacked and too weak.

Frequent encounters are reported from Belgian observers between France-Prussian and the cavalry, or Ulhans, in which the latter have been worsted. The Prussians have been driven back from the frontiers into Belgium, where they were promptly disarmed.

A successful sortie was made November 17 by the garrison at Montmedy which defeated a loss of 800 in killed, wounded, and prisoners upon the besieging forces, who were soon afterward driven beyond the fire of the fortress.

Napoleon is said to have written to the provisional Government proposing an armistice by proposition to cede French territory to Germany. The London Times believes the information of the report is probable.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Eastern question is still threatening, though a peaceful solution is hoped for. The Russian Press has offered her good offices as a mediator between Russia and the other powers, but the result has not yet been known.

News from San Domingo to November 9 says that Baez had defeated Cabral in a battle near the southern boundary. The Haytian army defeated the latter, in the hope of overthrowing Baez before the arrival of the fleet from the United States, which is stationed in the United States, it is supposed, of success will engender thither from Central and South America.

The kingdom of Bavaria and the Grand Duchy of Baden have signified their adhesion to the North German Confederation.

The Paris Official Gazette urges sending Mr. Bright as minister to Washington, in order to insure peaceful relations with the United States in the impending crisis. There is great opposition to the new king of Spain in Aragon, and insurrection is threatened.

The Spanish press has been officially ordered to avoid all discussion of relations of Germany as against France and the United States being identified with those of Austria.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

At the meeting of Congress this month the Senate will be full number of members for the first time since 1861.

Ex-Secretary W. H. Seward has been heard from in Paris.

It is reported that E. M. Yerger, who killed Colonel Crane at Jacksonville, Mississippi, has recently had a second trial, and has been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Thirty thousand seats had been captured near St. Paul and the adjacent islands, Alaska, up to the 10th of October, and 4000 more are expected before the season closes.

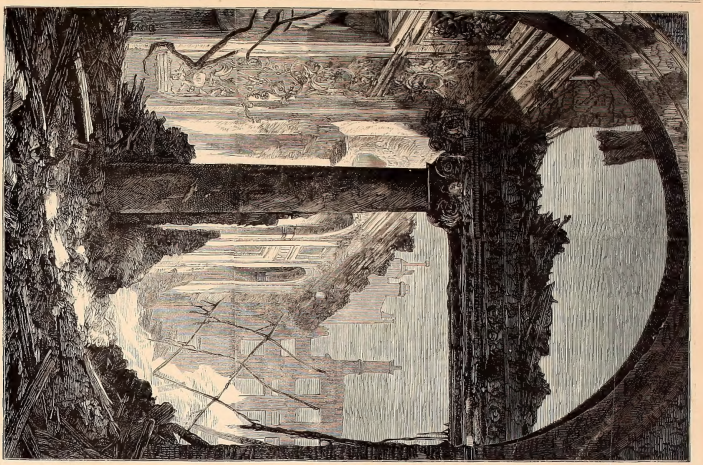
The United States Assistant Treasurer of New York has been ordered to sell $1,000,000 of gold on each Wednesday, and purchase $1,000,000 of bonds each Thursday, during the month of December.

Thirteen ships have loaded with wheat at Oakland, California, for Europe since the first of October.

General Bullock, who was ordered to make arch discoveries in Georgia, is now in Georgia as may be necessary to prosecute the work of reconstruction in that State.

The premium for Indian scalps has been raised from $100 to $500 in Sonora.

INSIDE PARIS—WAITING TO BUY MEAT AT A BUTCHER'S SHOP.—[SEE PAGE 796.]



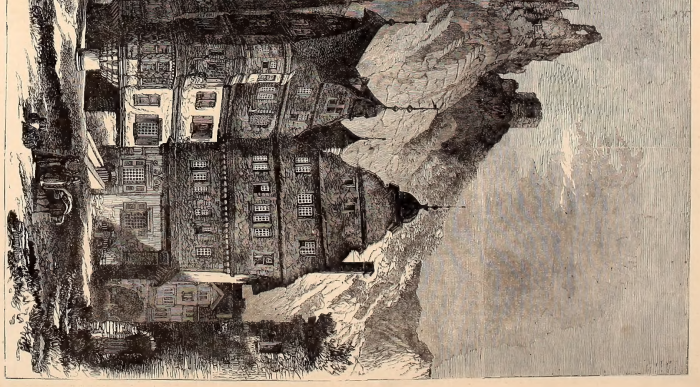
THE RUINS OF ST. CLOUD.

THE RUINS OF ST. CLOUD.

THE destruction of the magnificent palace of St. Cloud, which has so long been associated with the pride of the French monarchy in modern times, is much regretted by those who know Paris. The small town of St. Cloud takes its name from the hermit CLODOALD, grandson of CLOVIS. The palace was originally built, in 1572, by a rich financier, named JEROME DE GONDY; but it afterward became the mansion of the bishops of Paris, till, in 1658, it was purchased by LOUIS XIV., and presented to his brother, the Duke of Orleans. In 1782 it became the property of LOUIS XVI., who gave it to his queen, MARIE ANTOINETTE. It was the favorite residence of NAPOLEON I.; and it was here, in the Salle de l'Orangerie, that a celebrated historical transaction was performed, about seventy-one years ago—namely, on the 18th of Brumaire, in the revolutionary calendar, which means November 9, 1799. It was on that day that General BONAPARTE, military commander of Paris, after his return from Egypt, played the part of CROMWELL by dispersing the Council of Five Hundred with his soldiers' bayonets, upsetting the republican Directory, and making himself dictator under the title of First Consul. This coup d'état took place in the Salle de l'Orangerie at St. Cloud, to which the meeting of the council had been adjourned from Paris because of the turbulence of the city mob. The engraving will give the reader an idea of the completeness of the ruin which has befallen this splendid palace.

TRARBACH.

TRARBACH is on the Moselle, in the Prussian Rhine Provinces, some sixty or seventy miles below Metz. It is in that portion of German territory coveted by the French, and would probably have changed hands at the end of this war if the fortunes of the campaign had been reversed. Its transference from Prussian to French rule is necessary to that "rectification of frontier" of which we have heard so much since 1866. Happily for the fifteen hundred honest, industrious, and peaceful inhabitants of this village, the tide of conflict has been turned in another direction, and Trarbach and its neighbors, who would have been certain to suffer at the very outset of the French invasion of Germany, are saved at the expense of the equally honest, industrious, and peaceful villages and peasantry of Northwestern France. Trarbach has seen enough of war in times past to satisfy it for the remainder of its existence. It stands in the midst of the old battle-ground of France and Germany, and, besides its tale of Franco-German war, it has wondrous narratives to relate of the quarrels of petty counts and territorial bishops. The village stands on the right bank of the Moselle, not more than five miles by road from the ancient city of Treves. Its situation is in the most beautiful part of the valley of the Moselle, where the scenery is scarcely less interesting than that on the Rhine. A great fire occurred in the little old town in the year 1857, and robbed the place of much of its quaintness.



THE OLD TOWN OF TRARBACH, ON THE MOSELLE.

The pile of civic buildings which forms the foreground of the picture on page 789 stands at the foot of the rocky heights which are crowned by the ruins of the old castle of Grünburg. That baronial fortress, whose broken walls present so weird and striking an appearance in the engraving, was built in 1336, and was for centuries the strongest castle between Treves and Coblentz. It belonged to the powerful counts of Sponheim, of whom remarkable stories are preserved in the locality.

On the left-hand side of the Moselle, directly opposite the castle whose ruins are depicted in the sketch, on the summit of a lofty hill, in the year 1681, the great military engineer, Vauban, erected for Louis XIV. of France a mighty fortress which completely commanded the passage of the Moselle. This fort was called Staerburg and Mets by the same country, this act of war was perpetrated in a time of peace, and the fortress was actually built on German territory. King Louis's excuse was a perfectly groundless claim to the dominion of the Counts of Sponheim, the lord of the opposite castle of Grünburg. As many as 8000 men were employed for the construction of this fortress, and six score years afterward it was leveled to the ground in conformity with the terms of the treaty of Ryswick, the Duke of Marlborough having achieved great victories over the French forces during the long campaign which succeeded the general peace. The structure was called Fort Montroyal, which the ruins still remain. There are, therefore, no longer any strong places in the immediate neighborhood of Trèves; but the Prussian Rhine Provinces generally bristle with fortresses, and had NAPOLEON III. invaded that country there would have been as many well-defended sieges as we have witnessed in France.

ATLANTIC MAIL—FIRST-CLASS.

As naturally as a steel needle flies to a magnet so have I felt always ready to hurry to the rail of a big steamer. I do not say it unwillingly, nor put it forward as a virtue, for the act has generally been involuntary and as it was one day last year, when, having seen my small quantity of personal luggage on board the great screw-liner lying at the wharf getting up her steam, ready for her race across the Atlantic, I was looking out, watching with a somewhat amused the arrival of passengers, for the most part excited, worried, and the prey of porters and others, who seem to be troubled with no more perfections in Liverpool than in the metropolis. A lighted pipe was between my lips, and I was trying to enjoy it—for, judging from old experience of my sensations in a rough sea, I did not anticipate much comfort for the next two or three days at the least—when I saw a gentlemanly-looking man, evidently commercial traveller for a cutting house, walked on and asked me for a light, staring at me the while in a decisive manner that, as I had supplied my cigar, I glanced down at his left hand to see that it was not meddling with my watch chain.

"Looks like a commercial, but may be a pickpocket," I said—mentally, of course—while he puffed at his cigar, putting mine out in the process.

"Going across?" he said, abruptly, and, to use what would probably have been his expression, taking stock of me the while.

"Sir?"

"Going across the pond—Hebedlyn?" he said again, coolly, and nodding his head toward the great steaming and snorting vessel.

"My cigar—thanks!" I said, in a tone meant to be perfectly Belgravian in its hauteur, as I turned aside; for I had met the appeal of a pair of dark eyes—a lady was in distress, and, between porters and luggage, apparently perfectly bewildered.

"Are you going on board?" I asked.

"Yes, oh—yes," said the owner of the eyes eagerly. "Are you connected with the steamer, Sir?"

"Er—no, not exactly," I said, taken somewhat aback; and I felt disposed to say, "I took you for I was?"—"Allow me, though—these men!"

"Yes, yes," said the lady; "they 'ask six shillings for bringing my luggage from the station. Is it correct?"

"Absurd!" No," I said; "half a crown is ample." And, espousing the lady's cause, I dismissed the ravenous monsters who prey upon the unprotected, and then sent her luggage on board the Hebedlyn, casting more than once a glance aside to see that my new acquaintance was still, with handsome, well-marked features, very lady-like, and dressed in the first fashion.

"Seems odd," I thought, "travelling quite alone. Strong-minded woman, perhaps."

But this latter thought was not made the next moment as I handed her along the gangway for there was a quiet, earnest, trusting look in her dark eyes; and the answers she made to my entreaties that she would not be alarmed at the rushing to and fro, the messy motion of the steam and the pushing, excited crowd, were grateful in the extreme. I felt flattered, and not at all sorry that such a companion was to share my voyage.

"If you would lead me to the cabin where I could see the stewardess," she said, and I immediately handed her to the saloon door, where she turned frankly to hold out a well-gloved though rather large hand. "I am indeed much obliged. I am obliged to travel alone; but my husband will meet me on landing at New York, and he will, I know, be extremely grateful for your kindness."

The next moment I was standing alone, confounding her husband, and speculating to her to know why another should have first seen and secured about the only woman who seemed likely to form an agreeable sharer of my pilgrimage through life.

"Nice to be a young, smart-looking fellow," said a voice; and, turning, there stood the big man, puffing away at his cigar, and staring at me with all his might, though, probably from business habit, he was referring from time to time to a pocket-book he held in his hands. "Now, you know, I never make an impression like that on a lady. I never find the sea saking my protection, and all that sort of thing. Very nice, lady, I should say, isn't it?"

He accompanied his last words with the slightest approach to a wink, and I felt that he had poked me with it in the side; when I felt so annoyed that I angrily turned upon my heel and walked to the side, where, looking at the other passengers, but to my great disgust he followed me, and, unmindful of my frowning looks, continued his scrutiny.

I tried very hard to get rid of him, but unsticking was quite away. Apparently he could not understand that his conduct was obtrusive; and at last, making a virtue of necessity, I suffered him, and he literally hooked himself on to me.

But all the same he seemed to have a shrewd business eye; and while carefully keeping close to me he contrived to find time to make board till the time for starting had arrived. The cables were cast loose, the screw revolved slowly, then stopped, then revolved again, and the huge mass began gradually to move forward, the passengers waving their adieus as they passed the side. Then once more the bugman stared me full in the face, looked undecided, walked through the throng on deck, and then, with a wave, seized in face after face, as a dog would who sought his master, and then, in the same manner he had left her, returned to me, and stopped by my side, as if about to speak; but directly after he clucked himself, and drew out another cigar.

"How very soon the motion of the vessel begins to affect you!" he said, with a smile.

"Affects you, you mean," I replied.

"Yes, exactly. Curious, though, isn't it? Seems as if Nature were always ready to play a hand of our fathers—the place of our birth as the song says, eh? I've been across the pond."

"Yes, yes," I said, sharply; and then I walked away, for now, closely veiled, I had seen the figure of the lady step out another time from the saloon door; and upon my going up, and asking concerning her welfare, she made no demur about taking my arm and walking to and fro upon the deck.

I must confess that I thought very little of the scene around, though I kept, on the strength of old recollections, pointing out the various familiar objects we were passing, and I felt the side in my head that the remark my companion had made was not unjust, that is, that he seemed to believe that there would be my husband awaiting her upon the quay at New York, and that after all it was not a bad thing for a lady to be a single and unprotected woman wished to shroud herself in the respect due to the married protection of a married lady; and I felt assured that no one whose business it would be to meet her at the New York would so readily lay herself open to remark by accepting my arm upon so short an acquaintance.

"Is—is that a—a friend of yours?" suddenly asked my companion.

"Friend?—friend of mine?" I said, in a puzzled way. "No; I have no friends on board—at least, only—" and I felt myself hesitating.

"I—I thank you," was the hesitating reply, in the most gentle manner, "for your kindness in a single and unprotected woman wished to shroud herself in the respect due to the married protection of a married lady; and I felt assured that no one whose business it would be to meet her at the New York would so readily lay herself open to remark by accepting my arm upon so short an acquaintance."

said the second-class passenger, panting, as he rose from one knee: "but, for your information, Mr. Frank Smith, I hold a warrant for your apprehension. Bunk robbery, gentlemen; cool twenty thousand; but I'm in hopes it is all here." And he took up the bag that lay upon the deck.

"Stand up, Sir," he said the next minute, as he assisted his prisoner to rise, and tore off the "cloak." "Very clever, very well done, indeed, that false hair; and the chignon is very becoming, Sir. I must do you the credit of saying that you took me in, while poor Matthews hadn't a suspicion, but was rather down on your friend."

"Take me out of this," said the prisoner, faintly. And I would have turned and fled, but I felt myself weighed in among the crowd; for it seemed impossible that the fiend in the boat could and knotted with disappointment and rage, could have been that which had deluded me through the voyage.

"All right, Sir, as soon as we can get an officer from the shore. But then, you need not mind for a few minutes."

"Take me below, officer," was the husky, imploring petition next uttered; and the officer was about yielding, when a passenger exclaimed,

"But are you sure you are right, officer?"

"Right, Sir? Yes, I'm right enough, and I hope there's nothing blocker against him, for there is the death of my poor mate to clear up yet. It seems strange that he should disappear the very night that our friend here suspected that he was found out; and it seems stranger still that he should have settled down so quietly after, and never show at all when the officer first suspected him was gone, for he did not know I was on board."

I glanced once more at the deathly pale face as the detective led his prisoner below; and then, giddy with the rush of thought through my brain, I made my way back to my cabin to stay till the other passengers were ashore, when I proposed to an hotel, but not, as I had hoped, unseen, for I encountered the officer just returning from placing the prisoner in security.

He took me by the button, as he had seized the captain, and held me for a few moments.

"There, you need not be ashamed of it, young man," he said, with a dry smile: "he's got about as womanish a face as ever I saw on a man. The cause was as clever as it was possible to be. I was hard pushed, but I felt pretty sure that in the last I got one look that settled it. There's a resemblance between you that had he put on a good beard would have made him quite the man like you, and it was that which made my poor mate have his suspicions of some one else; but, any how, between you will make him quite different, and he won't come the petticoats again."

"Fourteen years!" I said.

"Yes, perhaps more; for it's a bad case—confidential clerk."

We parted, and I saw no more of the policeofficer. From the report of the trial, though, I learned that the police had certainly discovered that the culprit would sail from Liverpool in the Helvellyn, though his disguise had been nearly clever enough to throw dust in the eyes even of every one. I was only twenty then—a fact which I plead as an excuse for my share in the excitement; and no doubt I formed in the culprit's eyes a capital screen, and one which would make it almost impossible for his plot to fail for an instant doubted.

The brightest was right; the prisoner was brought back to the scene of his depredations, and fourteen years' penal servitude was his reward. As to the work of that night, whether Sergeant Matthews, otherwise Mr. Lister, met with foul play, and was sent to his death by a push in the dark—the mystery, if there was, lay a secret between Frank Smith, prisoner at the bar, and him who was forever dumb.

PREACHERS AND PREACHING.

MUCH as we have to say concerning "sensation preaching" nowadays, it is quite certain that nothing ever means the eyes or greets the ears of a modern audience at all so be exciting as the most extravagant performances of some of the elder preachers. Many of their sermons seem to us doubt mere modes of expression current at the time: but a good deal of their extravagance also was bathetery or violence of manner. We will should we say, for example, of a preacher now who should exhaust himself by the physical energy of his declamation that he should be obliged to stop several times during his sermon to recruit himself with wine, as it is related of a certain of Seville, preacher to Charles the Fifth? We read of some preachers who indulged in every sort of extravagance of deportment, or of others who went just as far the other way, affecting monotony and unvaried movement in all things, and fixing the exact passage beforehand when they would cough. Feignot professed to have made the manuscripts of a preacher, on the margin of which were directions, thus: "Sit down; stand up; here you must use your handkerchief; here you must roar en diable," etc.

It was to the demonstrative kind that Bolzee referred when he makes an old doctor advise a young man concerning preaching as follows:

"Shake the church all over, look at the crucifix in a frenzied manner, say nothing to the purpose, and you will preach well."

The strange folly and buffoonery both of manner and matter which were so habitual as to pass without reproach, may be illustrated by an anecdote or two. Here is one related by Feignot, for the truth of which he does not vouch, but which is by no means too strange to be believed:

"A monk, preaching on the Nativity, remarked that the cock was the first to announce the joyful morning the great event, by singing, 'Christ is born, Christ is born,' Christus natus est, and in repeating the Latin words the monk imitated the crowing of a cock; 'then,' continued he, 'the ox, impatient to know where Christ was born, cried out, "Where, where?" "Ubi, ubi?" and again he imitated with the Latin the deep low of the ox; 'to this question of the ox, the preacher said the sheep made answer, "In Bethlehem, in Bethlehem," and so saying, he bleated like a sheep; finally the ass invited all to repair to the place by braying out, 'Let us go, let us go, let us go, 'Eamus, eamus, eamus;" and it was in the braying of the ass that the preacher surpassed himself."

The Father Honoré, however, a celebrated Carmelite of the seventeenth century, had his performances far in the shade. Once, when he was preaching on the vanity of the world, he suddenly produced a human skull, and held up to view. "Speak!" he cried, "speak, thou skull, speak, thou mute and dumb! Let us hear what Silence gives consent." Then clapping upon the skull the cap of a judge, he continued: "Ah ha! what thou never wast before, good friend? Just now not been snoring many times during a hearing? Eh, eh, etc. "How many times have you given per the fleur-de-lis only to put virtue at a disadvantage?" Casting aside the skull, he held up another, which in like manner he addressed: "Want thou not, perhaps, the skull of one of those benefices who occupy themselves only with catching hearts, after the manner of bird-catching?" Then, arraying it in a bonnet, he continued: "Ah ha! you, Sir, answer. Where are those lovely eyes, which cast such fascinating glances? that pretty mouth, which opened such pleasant lips? that fine nose, which unhappy ones to weep in hell? Where are those cheeks, which chewed gum so many hours, and to make them the more tender for the devil's eating?" etc., etc. "Thus most invectively he preached through the whole of Advent, before the court," bringing forth skull after skull, and appropriately discoursing to each according to what the Father Honoré is said to have been a very popular and successful preacher in spite of his whims and oddities. He was born in 1651, migrates on the ear, but to rends the heart."

A still more extraordinary preacher was that of Brydaine, a powerful preacher of the first half of the last century. He caused himself to be laid into the church by the door, and then about his neck, like a victim endeavoring to win the favor of God. Then he commenced his sermon. The

GENERAL VON MOLTKE MAKING A RECONNOISSANCE BEFORE THE WALLS OF PARIS.

MARSHAL BAZAINE'S ARMY LEAVING

KING WILLIAM I. OF PRUSSIA, AT A CAMP FIRE, DICTATING A DISPATCH TO COUNT VON BISMARCK.

AFTER THE SURRENDER.—[See Page 794.]

LOVE AND TIME.

BECAUSE old Time's a rover,
And young Love change his home?
Ah, now that summer's over,
Old Time, and winter come,
Teach young Love to discover,
Where'er them roamest, some
New ways wherehy to love here.
If Love with thee must roam.

Old Time, why wilt thou never Let young Love be? Ah, why?
Because thou art forever
Unkindly fleeting by.
Must Love, where Time is roaming,
And play me false like thee?
Change thou thy sons and seasons,
But leave my love to me!

A CHINESE EXECUTION.

In several respects the Chinese are an anomalous people. Individually they are harmless and inoffensive, as proved by Californian and Australian experience, but in their national capacity they are prone to treat foreigners with the utmost baseness and contempt. In their social relations they appear to be kind-hearted and good-natured, and the intensely brutal, hardened rabble which beats his wife and starves his children is a rare phenomenon in China; yet the penalties inflicted for his friendly severity, and, on occasion, unfriendly slight provocation, human blood is poured out like water. In trading, although the Chinese, as compared with Europeans, are stigmatized as cowards, their timidity can scarcely proceed from an excessive love of self-preservation, for there where she in the world is the indifference to death so great? That which in the Western world is regarded as the highest type of self-sacrifice, namely, that a man should give up his life for his friend, is in China regarded as a mere matter of business. A man will voluntarily offer himself as a substitute for some consenting criminal, provided a sum of money is handed as a recompense to his relations.

The engraving on page 797, which is copied from a photograph of an actual occurrence, represents the scene before a Chinese execution. We see the criminal, with his hands bound behind his back, and his tail brought forward over his face, so that he cannot impede the efforts of the executioner's sword. In this picture only one victim is visible, but it frequently happens at Canton that the number of doomed persons may be reckoned by scores and hundreds, while, after the capture of provinces and some of the principal cities during the Tae-ping rebellion, thousands of poor creatures were thus massacred in cold blood.

A naval officer visiting Canton thus, in Good Words, describes an execution which he happened to witness near that city. The execution-ground consists of a lane outside the city walls, and about two miles from the factories. It is a favorite spot with the backs of houses, and has a door at each end to keep the mob out. While sitting in a shed at this ground from the top of a carpenter's shop, our informant heard a great noise in the street below. A party of Chinese were escorting the people for execution. The prisoners, who had their arms pinioned behind their backs, and their hair twisted in a knot at the top of their heads, were carried in baskets, pitched out on the ground, and then arranged in four rows kneeling. As soon as the chief mandarin arrived the work of death began, and the four executioners, whose assistants changed their swords at every fourth stroke, cut off the heads of sixty-eight people in four minutes. The heads are thrown into a trough, as a warning to passers-by, but their bodies are the right of pleasure, claim the bodies. The clothes are handed over to the executioners as a perquisite, and they also add to their gains by cramming the bodies into one coffin, being allowed eighteen pence for each coffin supplied. The number of people executed yearly at Canton is between 2000 and 3000, sometimes as many as 150 are executed at one time.

Following close upon them came the cuirassiers of the Guard, then the voltigeurs, then the hussars, then the lancers, then the horse artillery, then the guides, then a mixed mass of infantry. To this apparently unending stream of men there was a very small proportion of officers. In order to spare them as much as possible, the French officers were not required to do more than set their men fairly en route, and then turned back to Metz to make their submission in some more private way. All this time it rained and hailed alternately, and the poor, half-starved army had, in addition to their other misfortunes, the misery of a wet night in the open; but they would have food. Riding along toward Metz, meeting this melancholy cortege, I came to a small farm, a spot at which Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, surrounded by his staff, was watching them file by. He was on horseback, a little in advance of his staff, smoking a cigar, and talking to the French officer who was there to see that the stipulations in regard to the surrender were properly carried out. With them was General FAILLY, who had come from the town in a French officer rode up, and placed in his hands a slip of paper which contained the numerical strength of each regiment as it passed. There were three horse artillery officers riding back to Metz, and, as they passed their regiment, one of them took a note-book out of the ranks and seized them by the hands. It was too much for me. I turned my head and my eyes over their eyes to hide the tears that gushed from them. I could see that it was with a very great effort that they kept their emotion. The last corps that finished the procession, as evening closed in, was the Guard—the—the grenadiers of the Guard; and they, as they passed their officers, in several instances embraced them, kissed them on both cheeks. Then I came to the corps which seemed really to feel its humiliating position. They were the cuirassiers. Their troops stood in masses, silently watching the foot for whom they can not but feel contempt; but not a word was spoken, and not a gesture betrayed any expression of that feeling could be seen or heard."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

BALLOONS bring out from beleaguered Paris occasional letters, and the following is reported as an index of the state of affairs within the walls of the once gay capital. To a great extent the people have fallen back upon their own only individual feeling and knowledge; the real condition of the masses can scarcely be revealed by them. Some of these articles find a spirit and hope. One lady writes: "We bear gayly the privations and the discomforts. Our troubles but so changed every body that the Parisian appears a people of brothers, salutations are exchanged side by side on the ramparts, and use their best endeavors to help each other. Women have relinquished the gayest vanities; toilette no more form the question of our days. We have made a vow to wear the same dress until the siege is over. They tell me to-day that as there is nothing like necessity for bringing out natural resources, the Parisian—always the Parisian—has developed several new talent. The fiâcre horse is now replaced by a donkey, and the animal, docile as well as humble, and disregarded except, the city of Paris will not count its donkeys, is the object of the empress's own cares and good taste." An indication of this natural "good taste" is found in the universal change in the mode of dressing the hair. At least one in the fortnight of our stay, I should say, is taking advantage of the flight of certain personages to adopt a new style. Women have given up the fashion their indispensable false hair, Parisian ladies have at once restored to liberty their own locks, so long hid under the disgusting chignons. The Empress Paris, carefully smoothed down, light ringlets, at once graceful and natural, have replaced the artificial curls the delicate and pretty heads of young ladies, who are delighted to have their most beautiful adornment restored to them.

Boston has received a bad blow in a disgusting exposé of its backbiting—or of some of them—by a NEW YORK paper. If the facts in the case are generally believed, "Boston brown bread" will lose its popularity under it is made somewhere in Jersey City. The "Hub" might retaliate, if it can not deny the statements made. New York is not spotless in its cleanliness.

Art receives some favors in war. The residence and studio of MISS. ROSA BONHEUR, at the picturesque town of Fontainebleau, escaped the fate of the sacred and respected by the Germans in accordance with a special request from the Crown Prince of PRUSSIA. Her studio have been given by the King of Prussia in favor of the talent and studio of the artist M. EDOUARD FRERE, at Rouen.

Hypochondriacs are often cured by some very simple device. Not long ago a wealthy citizen of New York, who considered himself a confirmed victim of what he terms "the blues," was induced to consult a physician, who prescribed a course of medicine, to be administered by two medical students, who followed him about from place to place, and whenever they saw the most mobilous, stated that they were waiting for him to go to dinner. The result was he might have a chance to pick up the pieces for dissection.

A European student of the habits and peculiarities of poisonous snakes has discovered that "if poison be applied to the specific antidote to the bite of a reptile or reptile in which these poisons exist." The bite of the rattlesnake, which is the most fatal, can be cured by administering a few drops of a preparation of the gall of the snake. The gall of the most deadly kind of snakes may be used in cases of bites of those less virulent. The gall is to be mixed with pure spirits of wine, or the best high wines.

A singular story is told of the reappearance of a gold medal which was made about three years ago, and was to be presented to CYRUS W. FIELD on the accomplishment of the Atlantic cable. Congress had appropriated $5000 for the purpose, and the medal was, we believe, ratately carved and mounted, and inclosed in a pearl case mounted with gold. The Secretary of the Treasury received the medal from the mint, and sent it to Prescident Johnson by his confidential secretary. The medal was missed shortly after this, and, upon inquiry being made, Mr. Johnson stated that he had returned it to the Treasury Department. Nothing could be heard of it at the Department, and it was finally believed that the medal had been stolen. Congress, therefore, made another appropriation of $5000 for a duplicate, which was made and presented to Mr. Field about two years ago. It now turns out that the original medal was returned to the Treasury Department by President Johnson after he had received it, and the messenger gave it to Assistant Treasurer Tuttle, who locked it up in his private safe, and never heard the charge that it had been stolen, or an appropriation made for a new one. The medal remained in his safe until a week or two ago, when Mr. Tuttle inquired of General Spinner why Mr. Field did not receive his medal. General Spinner was greatly astonished, of course, at hearing all the facts in the case, and will obtain the medal until some disposition of it be made by Congress.

Miss Vinnie Ream writes from Rome that the statue of LINCOLN, upon which she has been engaged for three years, is completed, and will be shipped at once for Washington.

"The Pope has sold his horses." Such is the announcement of a Roman correspondent, accordingly, who writes from the Eternal City we gather that there same horses were "grand" ones, that they were also "old," and, moreover, they were "lame." We judge also that they were fine trotters, and were to the habit of occasionally running off with the Equilline deities with flowers, leathers, and bells. But who has bought them? And to what uses will they now be put?

The American College, erected in Constantinople at the expense of the Protestants of the city, is now nearly completed. It stands on a splendid site on the Bosphorus, close by the ancient castles built in A.D. 1400 by Mahmoud II., the conqueror of Constantinople, and commands a most magnificent panoramic view. Mr. Morse is now in Constantinople. When the college is finished several of the Armenian Mussulman families intend to place their sons there to be educated.

A new water-proof packing paper is now prepared by coating it with a resinous liquid, and afterward painting it with a mixture of glue and soda, to prevent the appearance of blotches. After it is dry the two surfaces of the paper are applied, which consists of a solution prepared with two and a half ounces of powdered gum arabic, one ounce of glue, 1 lb. whiting, 1 lb. soda, boil in added gradually one-third of an ounce of pulverized alum, and then add some fine mineral coloring matter, like ochre or umber, may be added. When cold it is ready for use. The operation of coating is now quickly performed, and two persons may prepare three thousand square feet of paper per day.

Miss Rye is an English lady of large fortune, who has for many years exercised her benevolent feelings by collecting waifs in the streets of London, and providing them with homes in the fields of Canada and Iowa. Most of these children are orphans; all are taken from workhouses and sin at a tender age, which has tended to increase the English poor-rates. Over three hundred have been sent across the ocean by Miss Rye from Marylebone in Canada, many others in the Western States.

From Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, comes a curious story at a steamboat excursion, when, one Sunday, an attempt to make his way through the crowd to get within better hearing distance of the distinguished BEECHER, BEECHER was at that moment giving the words of his text, "Who art thou?" in a clear, distinct voice. As he spoke the words a bystander said, "Who art thou?" The stout man thinking himself in the wrong, pushed by pressing forward, and believing himself to be personally addressed, startled both preacher and people by sotutely replying, "I'm a pilgrim from Brooklyn, Sir." I hope you still may. There ain't any rarly, or else I'd 'a not down." Plymouth Church didn't recover its serenity for ten minutes.

M. Gambetta, one of the most vigorous members of the provisional government, is young in years, yet his black hair is already tinged with gray. When a boy he destroyed the sight of one of his eyes to make his father take him from school. A boarding-school that he disliked. He has therefore a glass eye. His voice is remarkably sonorous, powerful, but quite coaxed and a youth of hardships and privations have much impaired it. He is a fine orator, and in his parliamentary attacks, habitually wears a respirator, and public speakers will recognize the utility of it, when it be necessary to exert the voice greatly, always distresses and weakens him.

War is prolific in strange devices. It is reported that Napoleon III. will issue a number of bonds in the vicinity of Paris to wage war upon the French savage carrying the bonds.

Dio Lewis says that if you wish to live to the age of eighty-five in the full enjoyment of all your faculties, go to bed at eight o'clock, and eat twice a day the most acute quantity of plain food. He is of opinion that the reason why Americans are such dyspeptics is that we eat too much and too fast.

Fleshy people are constantly inquiring how they can reduce their weight, and lean individuals as frequently how they can put on flesh. A correspondent of the Lewis says to the former: "Reduce the quantity of your food one-half, and increase the proportion of animal food. At the end of three months reduce the quantity another quarter. Eat, only, sleep little, and walk an hour before breakfast. Exercise into a profuse perspiration at least once a day." His advice to the latter is: "Eat plenty of oat-meal and Graham mush, cracked wheat, and stewed fruit. Retire at eight o'clock. Rise at six. Begin to become young and plump, go to bed at eight o'clock, and rise when you have had enough. Exercise gently, and take your share of the laughing." Fat people will perceive that the rules are expected to work by a happy frame of mind, and by no means to indulge in much laughter.

In a preface which Disraeli has written to a collected edition of his works, now being published in London, he says, speaking of "Lothair:" "It has been more extensively read both by the people of the United Kingdom and of the United States than any work which has appeared for the last half century." The Count himself remarks on the extraordinary circumstance: that there is not the slightest doubt that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was read far more extensively.

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc. etc.

CHAPTER XI.

A PROJECTED PARTNERSHIP.

THOUGH by no means to either the mental or physical condition in which a lady should be who is called upon to play the part of hostess, Harry Rose had presented that Solomon in mind several alone. The presence of this stranger, whom his genial friend had described as "different without a glance at his features, was welcome to her, because it was likely to distract from herself her husband's regards. What she would like to have done would have been to shut herself up alone in her chamber, and weep and pray. As it was, she had to be cheerful, to affect an interest in her husband's late expedition, and pleasure at his unexpected return. Mrs. Rose had been invisible; you would never have managed that it was the same woman—so rich an amount of ingenuity had she minutes before, and now so self-possessed and cheerful. But she had been used to playing parts throughout her life, and acting was easy to her. She dreaded silence, lest with it should come observation and remark upon the agitation and distress only too visible in Harry's countenance; and yet it was difficult, even for her to keep up the ball of small-talk, for Solomon was always slow and scant of speech, and the new-comer rarely opened his mouth, and then only to utter a monosyllable. His manner too, was embarrassing; he turned his white and black eyes now on one, now on the other, like an automaton, but with a weird and searching gaze. They had never so much as heard his name before, for Harry had been accustomed never to mention Belfour in his letters, since they were, of course, opened by the authorities, and friendships were not encouraged at Lingmoor; but, on the other hand, it was evident that these ladies were an interest for the visitor. Even while they were yet all below stairs, arrived Charles and Agnes, Charles's greeting of Solomon was enough, but also a great disturbance and alteration for the worse in Mr. Coe's temper. No sooner, as it seemed to him, had Jack been turned, then, than the intimacy between this girl and his son, which he had strictly forbidden, had been recommenced, and with the connivance and encouragement of his wife too, or else how should they have come to bring her home? For the first time Solomon was openly rude to Agnes; and the latter, being a girl of great sensitiveness and quick perception, Charley, rash and impetuous, rose to consequent fury. Solomon was accustomed to his son's temper, and that the presence of the visitor would have been wholly inadequate to prevent a family scene, when Agnes had departed with Mrs. Rose. "No, Charles; I would rather go alone. If your father wishes to say my presence there is shall not be intruded; and if he considers your company a condescension, I can not accept it upon such terms."

Solomon could have taken but little notice of all consequences, and led her off under Solomon's nose; but the compliance in which Harry was narrowly watched by the disregarded stranger. When Agnes got her way and departed, "That's a girl of character," observed he, with a cynical smile.

"She is a girl without a penny," answered Solomon, gleefully, with a scowl at his son, upon whom this young fool wishes to throw himself away."

"What! so early?" observed Mr. Balfour, good-naturedly addressing Charles. "When I was your age, I thought of enjoying life, and not of marriage. I don't wonder, however, that any one should wish to make Agnes Rose become a young fellow as your son, Sir. It is quite natural, and there is no need to blame him for it, that I see."

Ashamed, perhaps, of having exhibited such violence of temper before his guest, Solomon was very willing to be mollified, and grimly saluted approval of these sentiments; Charles, too, though fully resolved to set himself right with Agnes on the morrow, was not displeased with the visitor's remark; but the two women justly thought it a most impertinent speech. If Charles's thoughts had not been so preoccupied with the late voyage—the deprivation of his Agnes's society, which he had promised himself for the rest of the day, and the snub which he considered he had administered to Jack—he would have noticed too, for he was by no means wanting in observation, that the new-comer seemed to Solomon and Mrs. Basil was not what it should have been. It was not absolutely rude, but it was extremely curious and inconvenient. He no longer stared at them as at first, but, on the contrary, seemed to ignore the fact that his companions were addressed them; and if either spoke to him, replied as briefly as possible, and then relapsed into the same fit of abstraction. Mrs. Basil concluded that he was a vulgar fellow, who, having penetrated into the secret recesses of the males had the upper hand in the establishment, did not give himself the trouble to conciliate the lady whose social influence, if not Harry, always timid and suspicious, was alarmed at him; his air had, in her eyes, something of brute in it as well as contemptuous. She could not understand, and therefore mistrusted, the influence he had evidently obtained over her husband, and which already had superseded that of Mrs. Basil.

That Solomon should no longer take pains to make himself agreeable to the latter, now that he had obtained from her his object, was, to any but a fool, a most unpardonable oversight; but why should this stranger have taken her place as his counselor and friend? The idea of some personal advantage was, of course, at the bottom of it: but it was clear, not only to say Mrs. Basil, but even to Harry—since even a moderately skilful looker-on sees more of the game than the best player—that in any contest of wits Solomon would have small chance with his new friend. The opinion of Mrs. Basil was, that some new speculation, in some manner connected with the Crompton sale, had been entered into by the two men, and that Mr. Balfour would in the end secure the oyster, while Mr. Coe was left with the shell. But Harry had deeper forebodings still; she was instinctively confident that there was enmity at work in the new-comer, as well as the motives common to all speculators to overreach a friend. There was a look in his pallid face, and in his speech, as he thought unheeded, on either Charles or Solomon, which, to her mind, boded ill. If it did so, it was certainly unwarranted by those on whom it fell. He Coe had apparently never found a companion so agreeable to him; and, curiously enough, this idea seemed to be shared by Charles. According to his own account, Mr. Balfour had been abroad in South America for many years, and had there retrieved a fortune which, originally inherited, had been speedily dissipated in the pleasures of the town. His long absence from such scenes had by no means dulled his taste for them, and his conversation ran on love affairs. He had a light rattling way with him—that, to Harry's view, resembled youthful spirits rather than opinion in a corpse resembles life, and which was certainly not in harmony with his age nor appearance—yet graphic powers and considerable tuition; he expressed himself curious about the changes in public amusements since he left town, near twenty years ago, and seriously placed himself under Charles's guidance on the expenditure of pleasure for which the latter was always ready. To this, strangely enough, Solomon made no objection, notwithstanding that his own purse-strings had to be drawn more wide to meet these extravagances. His new friend had duly to suggest that he should give the lie to his pound note to enjoy himself with, and the thing was done at once.

As for Harry, Mr. Balfour seemed to be made of money, so freely did he spend it; and if he did not offer the use of his purse to every new companion, it was only, as he told him, because he feared to offend his pride. "Besides," said he, when they were alone together on some of their expeditions of amusement, from which Solomon, whose notions of enjoyment were always closely allied to money-making, always excused himself upon pretense of having business to do, "it is only right your father should be made to feel that he is as rich as Croesus. It is quite unreasonable that he should stint you in enjoyment when, one day or another, you will have all the pleasures of life to pick and choose from."

It would seem that Solomon's new-born friendship severely if he could have heard Mr. Balfour dilate upon this topic, which he did with such earnestness and fervor that he could not be convinced of those great expectations which the cautious reticence of his parents had so long concealed from him. On the other hand, Charley's companion deduced an argument from this fair prospect which was not so unwelcome to him as he maintained that, under the circumstances, it would be a pity to mar his father's pleasure entirely by uniting himself irretrievably to Agnes, or to any other young woman. "My good offices will be always at your disposal, my lad," said he, very gravely, "and I don't deny that, at present, I have considerable influence with Mr. Coe; but it would be proof against so flagrant an act of disobedience as that which you contemplate. The great bulk of his property is at his own disposal, and his nature, if I may speak plainly to you in so important a matter, is obstinate and implacable. At the same time, there is no harm in your and this charming young lady are but boy and girl at present. Love is uncertain, and you may not be your own master any day; wait till you are so, or wait for a little, at all events, to see what may turn up: and in the mean time, please myself."

The last part of Mr. Balfour's advice, at all events, was palatable enough, and that much of it Charles accepted; in doing which, as was anticipated, the whole intention of his Mentor became frustrated. Engaged in pleasure, the young man thought less and less of his love; gave himself little trouble, though he still wrote the unalterable attachment, to set himself right with her; grew more and more dissatisfied with his own home, at the same time that that of Agnes became less and less attractive; and, in short, he drifted away daily further and further from the safe moorings of love and duty.

Harry perceived all this with a dread so deep that it even drove her to invoke her brother's aid against this man, who, inexplicable as his hostility might be, was here, she firmly believed, aiming at the ruin of darling boy. With Solomon, as she well knew, the fact of his son's disposition was not likely to move him to interfere; so to her the companionship of Balfour was gradually producing an estrangement between Charles and the only friend he had to oppose him. She had no argument available except that of expense, and, to her unsophisticated judgment, that was to affect her prudent spouse.

"Just let things be a while," was Solomon's reply, "and mind your own business. It is quite true the lad's throwing my money in the gutter at a fine rate; but in the end I shall get it all back again, and more with it. This Balfour takes me for a foolish doting father, but he shall pay for all himself before I've done with him. I throw a sprat to catch a whale; and neither you nor any other fool shall interfere with my fishing."

Harry dared not say more; her husband had been in the worst of humors ever since he had returned from Crompton, and was all the more brutal and tyrannical to her that he had to be out of coin, and unlikely to see fresh, until he unfortunately indulgent, upon his account, to Charles. The unhappy mother was powerless to check the peril the growth of which was so patent to her loving instinct, and there was none to whom she could look for help. Mrs. Basil had no longer any influence with Solomon, and, besides, she was seriously ill, and had even been confined to her room for weeks. In her extremity, Harry had even resolved to make a personal appeal to Mr. Balfour, to appeal to the man who, her husband had injured him, to adjure him to forgive the wrong, or at least not to visit it upon her Charley: innocent head. But the shrank with an inexplicable terror from putting this design into effect: and she felt she should humiliate herself to no purpose; he would deny, in his cold, cynical way, that he entertained any thing but friendship for her estate husband and affection for her bright and impulsive son. Besides, to say truth, there was nothing to speak of in the man's look and a suspicion that this weird and shadowy fear was in some degree shared by Mrs. Basil; at all events, Harry was aware that it was not much midisposition as a desire to avoid his presence that induced the latter so hastily to absent herself from the family circle.

Mr. Coe, at all events, entertained no such prejudice against his guest; and by day he grew more communicative with him, and more solicitous to have his company, than Harry's self-love could have thought possible. The two men were in reality, as it was easy to see, as opposite in character as the poles. Solomon was, and apparently always had been, a man of pleasure; but his pleasures had been very low and brutalizing—sordid, shrewd, and selfish, and worldly-wise enough. It was rarely that his talk ever strayed to matters of business, which he considered a weak point in a listener; but that unambitious part he played to admiration.

Upon one occasion, however, their after-dinner converse happened to turn upon partnership; Solomon's views of that arrangement being how one man brought money and the other brains, and how pleasant it must be for the former to sit at his ease while the latter worked hard for him, both for present use and for the wintry future. He rose with the familiar subject to quite a flight of poetry.

Mr. Balfour, with half-shut eyes and a mocking smile, allowed upon the entertainment evinced in such communities of enterprise, the sympathy engendered by true friendship, and the success that were produced by them. His host either did not, or would not, perceive that these remarks were ironical, and launched out afresh into its details, proportions of profits, balance-sheets, etc., until Charles rose with a yawn, and left his two elders together.

"Well, Balfour," said Solomon, frankly, as soon as they were alone, "I've been much pleased at the matter that first introduced us to one another—your purchase of the old Crompton property, Wheal Danes."

"Ay," replied the other, carelessly lighting another cigar, "I've had a good deal to do with how many cigars Mr. Balfour got through daily; you might have almost thought that he had been born and bred there, from the interest he has lately just been permitted to resume the habit."

"Yes; you showed me that most eminently, I must confess. I went down to the sale on purpose to secure it."

"Do you hold any, or, at least, so I guessed from your manner; and yet I don't know why you should have been so anxious to get it, for only a bare bit of ground with a round hole in it, close by the sea."

"That's all," said Solomon, puffing at his pipe placidly. "What on earth could have made you buy it?"

"Well, I told you once. I lost my yacht off Turkey, when coming to England last autumn, and very nearly myself. I had a fancy for some escapes with a whole skin from such a storm as wrecked me there, the last time I ever went to sea, and so it was very attractive. I happened to be cast ashore beneath that very spot, and so I took a fancy to it. If I had been a good Papist I should have built a chapel there to my patron saint in gratitude for my preservation; but as I am not, I bought it to build a villa for myself there. It will have an excellent view, and the situation is healthy. I've had the plan of it prepared for the purchase, I have none to give you; it was a whim, if you like, but then I can afford to indulge in whims."

"This one cost you a good deal, however; you gave five thousand pounds for it, did you not?"

Balfour nodded assent.

"A great sum for a few barren acres," said Solomon, musingly.

"Yes; and so the trustees of the estate thought, when they sold it to me—and I took a sharp enough, and withdrew the lot from public competition; else, perhaps, I should have got it cheaper."

"Not if I had been bidding against you," observed the host, significantly.

"You don't say so! You were never shipwrecked therabouts, were you? Oh, I remember: you were wrecked in the Royal George. You had some tender recollection of the spot, perhaps, with regard to your drowning crew. What creatures of sentiment you men of business sometimes are—dear me!"

"I did live near the spot," said Solomon, slowly, "though I should deceive you if I pretended that that had any thing to do with my wish to possess it."

"You would not deceive me, my good friend," answered Balfour, coolly; "but, as you were about to say, it would not be frank. Let us be frank, and above all things."

"I wish to be so, I assure you," was Solomon's meek reply. "When I offered you a hundred pounds for your bargain, I think I showed you that deception was no part of my nature. In all matters of business I always go straight to the point at once."

"And in the present instance, for example," remarked the guest, with an imperturbable smile.

"I am coming to the point, Mr. Balfour—once for all. I will give you a thousand pounds down for that Crompton lot—twice the money that you gave for it within a month; that's twelve hundred per cent. per annum."

Balfour shook his head. "I am not a religious man," said he, "but I am far from it. But I believe, like Miss Jounna yonder, in inspirations: all my whims are inspirations, and therefore assert, Mr. Coe, that nothing will induce me to sell Wheal Danes, and I mean to keep it. If you offered me ten thousand pounds, I'd say it."

Solomon was silent for a while, his heavy brows knit in thought: then once again he addressed to the guest: "You may keep it, and not share the profit, Mr. Balfour."

"The profit!"

"Ay, the profit. I told you I was going to be frank with you, but you would never guess how. I'm much inclined to put somewhat a true into your pocket, on condition that you will let me have all the rest in the same mine. We were talking of partnerships just now; let us be partners in Wheal Danes."

"Balfour shook his head, but he only reiterated the other, coolly. "But I must hear your proposal."

"My plan is a secret—invaluable, indeed, as such—but which, once told, will be worth nothing to you or me."

"You may do as you like, my friend, about revealing it," said Balfour, coolly. "I care nothing for your plan; only, until I hear it I stick to my plot, my lot, my acreage. Tell me the whole story without equivocation—don't attempt to deceive me on the slightest point—and then you shall have your way. We will divide this land of gold between us, or, as seems to me much more likely, browse like twin donkeys on its rich and glorious herbage."

"I have nothing but your bare word to trust to," said Solomon, doubtfully; "but still, I must do it, as was while that I thought. Then, here's my hand upon it."

"Never mind my hand, my good friend," returned the other, coolly. "In the part of the world from which I hailed last, folks didn't shake hands, unless I've fallen out of the habit. Come, give us this story of Wheal Danes."

"It's a very short one," said Solomon. The plot of ground you purchased gets its strange name from an ancient tin mine that is comprised in it, and once worked by the Romans, but disused since their time. There are many such in Cornwall."

"So I've heard," said Balfour, while the other sipped his glass. It was curious to contrast the grave and earnest manner of the host with the careless and unconcerted air of his guest, who, presently, as the narrative proceeded, leaned his head upon his hand, and gazed into the fire, with occasional glance sideways at his companion through his fingers alone testifying that his attention was still preserved. He never uttered a limb nor winked an eyelid when Solomon came to that with his great secret.

"This mine is said to be worked out, Mr. Balfour, and which you have purchased by mere accident, believing it to be the same with your proposed building-ground, will, I have reason to believe, turn out a gold mine."

"So you have told me," said Balfour, coolly, "and you said it. I did not know that there was a shovel have been found in it, and left their pick and the man. What money, what gain, can ever compensate for the demoralization of our child?"

"Nothing, indeed," said Mrs. Basil, quietly. "But have a little patience. Is not this gentleman going on Friday?"

"Yes, but he will come back again. It is only some business that calls him into Midlandshire. He does not even take all his baggage away. I have a great mind to tell him point-blank that his presence in this house—at all events in Mr. Coe's absence—is unwelcome; but I dare not do it; I am afraid."

"Yes, your husband would be very angry, without doubt," said Mrs. Basil, thoughtfully.

"That is not it. I am afraid of the man himself. He reminds me of that hateful creature—what is her?—in the opera, for which Mr. Aird gave us the tickets, and which Agnes went with us to see—Mephistopheles."

"What a strange fancy! He is only a sour, pleasure-jaded man. If I was not so ill I would speak to him myself; but you are right not to do so; that is your husband's place, who has brought him here. Let things be as they are till Friday."

Harry sighed, but perforce assented. Friday came, and Mr. Balfour went as he had designed, but not without stating at breakfast his intention of returning on the ensuing Monday or Tuesday at latest, and even making an engagement with Charley to spend the latter evening with him at the theatre.

"Do you happen to know when my husband will be home?" inquired Harry, timidly.

"No, madam. He was good enough to say, however, that his absence was to make no difference to my remaining here as his guest."

This reply, which might easily have been made offensive, was delivered with the most studied courtesy: it cut the hostess's ground from under her; for it had answered the very objection which she had intended to imply. She felt herself not only defeated, but reproved.

"Let us hope you will both return together," said she.

"I do not think that very probable," answered Mr. Balfour, slowly.

An hour later and he had departed, his hostess, under pretense of being engaged with her sick friend up stairs, not having so much as shaken his hand. Charles, indignant at this slight, would have accompanied him to the railway station, but Balfour would not hear of it. For this he had two reasons: in the first place, he was anxious to keep his route secret; and secondly, it was a part of his system to give the young man no sort of trouble or inconvenience on his account. He wished every association that linked them together to be one of pleasure.

Mrs. Basil, as we have said, had not made her appearance that morning below stairs: she was, in fact, no better, but rather worse: that news from Lingmoor, outwardly borne so well, had shaken her to the core. Still, no sooner had Balfour left than she made shift to rise, and even come down to dinner. She discussed with Charley, who had a considerable regard for her, the character of their late guest—not with hostility, as his mother was wont to do, but with the air of one who asks for information, and has confidence in the verdict which she seeks. The lad, flattered by this implied compliment to his sagacity, answered her questions readily enough. He praised his friend, of course, and though he praised him even when he spoke ill of him. He repeated his pungent sayings, and served up his anecdotes—such of them as were adapted, at least, for the ears of the ladies—anew. By this means he hoped to bring his hearers to a better opinion of so cynical a fellow; and in Mrs. Basil's case he apparently succeeded. His mother still remained her opinion that Mr. Balfour was a dangerous personage, and not a fit companion for any young man. Charles smiled at this, for it was the almost literal fulfillment of a prophecy which Balfour had made to him, and believed in that gentleman's sagacity, accordingly, more than ever. Women were so ludicrously prejudiced; the fact of Mrs. Basil's "the white witch"—not being so was an exception that proved the rule. She had been evidently interested in his anecdotes, of one of which she had even requested to hear the particulars twice over; not that, in his own judgment, it was the best, but, being of a weird sort, it had probably struck her fancy. It had lost in the telling, too—for he did not pretend to have the gift of narrative, as Mr. Balfour had—and his mother had seen in the story in question nothing at all.

Mrs. Basil came down stairs no more after that evening. She grew worse and worse, and was not only confined to her room, but to her bed. Harry was not much with her; she seized with avidity this opportunity of being alone with Charley to undo, as far as she could, Mr. Balfour's work with him. This was not hard, for the boy was a creature of impulse, and swayed her son's own conduct was as much the cause of this as her husband's ill favor; but she saw in it, clearly enough, the mark of the cloven hoof, the work of Balfour.

"I WILL GIVE YOU A THOUSAND POUNDS DOWN FOR THAT CROMPTON LOT."

for good or ill with equal ease. But she discovered that it would be useless to attempt beseechforth to conceal from him the nature of his future prospects. He was now firmly convinced that he was the heir to large fortune, and she regretted too late that she had left the disclosure to a stranger. What grieved her much more, and with reason, was that an attempt which she now made to bring the influence of Agnes to bear upon him proved unsuccessful: the girl resolutely refused to come to the house in the absence of its master, and contrary, as she knew, to his express commandment. Charley himself, too, whose visits to Mr. Aird's studio had been intermitted for some time, was received in both with coldness. It was not in Harry's nature to understand this independence of spirit, and she deeply deplored it on her son's account. She had looked to this young girl to be his guardian angel, and had never anticipated that she could possibly decline to watch over a charge so precious. She would not allow, even to herself, that Sick Mrs. Basil could give her small comfort, though she did not attempt to defend their late visitor, as she had so unwarrantably appeared to do when discussing him with Charley.

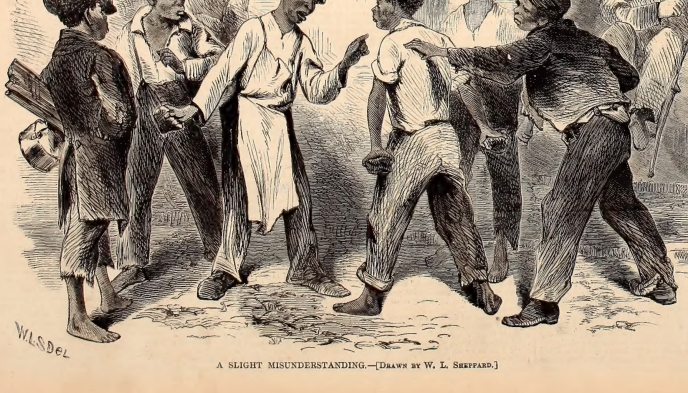
"The man is gone, my dear," said she, wearily; "perhaps he may never come back: let us not meet troubles half-way. Charley has a kind, good heart"—for "the white witch" showed great favor to the lad at all times—"and all will come right at last.

She seemed too ill and weary to argue the matter, and Harry left her, as she thought, to repose. No sooner was she gone, however, than the closed lids of Mrs. Basil were opened wide, and revealed a sleepless and unutterable woe. Her sharp, pinched face showed pain and fear. Her parched lips muttered unceasingly words like these, which were, perhaps, the rovings of her fevered brain: "I am sure of it now, quite sure; those stags, those stags! There is no room for hope. His heart has become a stone, which no power can soften. It is no use to speak, or rather I am like one in a dream who watches murder done, and can not cry out."



A SLIGHT MISUNDERSTANDING.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

EXECUTION OF A CHINESE CRIMINAL.—[See Page 794.]

INSIDE PARIS.

The illustrations this week on our first page and on page 788 are interesting as showing the state of affairs within the walls of Paris, and some of the arrangements made for its defense. The first is a picturesque sketch of a group of Parisian volunteers gathered in a public park in the fortified enceinte which protects the city. That on page 788 depicts a scene now daily to be witnessed at the butchers' shops in Paris—the long train, or queue, of patient people, mostly women, poor housewives or domestics, who thus stand waiting their turns for admission to buy the limited quantity of meat allowed for each person, as specified on the ticket to be shown before the purchase. A gentleman writes from that city: "The allowance of meat now is averaging now for six days as about equivalent to a good-sized steak. By economizing one can manage, and eats three days' allowance at a single meal, and trusts to Providence for the next two days. I am not complaining to be the subject-matter of poor neighbors, so that as yet I have managed to get about six ounces of solid meat per day; but the cold thing is, you can't buy a scrap of cheese from one end of Paris to the other. One can understand milk, butter, and eggs failing; but cheese, which will keep for years, is another matter. It is the same with beans, lentils, and all that class of provisions. It is said the authorities intend to prohibit the sale of ration-cards by the poor, under severe penalties, as a principle that may entail sickness and still worse distress upon that part of the population."

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"I have used Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machine for the past six years, and it has in all respects surpassed my highest expectations. During this time, though I have done all my own family sewing upon it, it has not needed the slightest repair, and I am still using the needles I got with the machine, never having either broken or bent one. — Mrs. S. W. Burckett, No. 3 Seventh Avenue, Brooklyn.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use Brown's Bronchial Troches.—[Com.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan,
Use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

A PIPE FULL OF THE PACE.
For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable, and contains no Lead Poison. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

DODWORTH'S STANDARD OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte. Edited by Arthur Napoleon. The complete scores, unabridged, in Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be issued from every week in the large, paper, large type, in volumes containing 500 to 570 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, DODWORTH & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N. Y.

Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, 12 ct.

THE WORTH OF $20 FOR $7 50.—The Electro-Galvanic $20 Battery of Dr. Scott's Patent Pyramidical Journal, $3. Marshall's Washington, $5. And the Doctor, a chrono, $2. The worth of all for only $7 50. Send to S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 made from 50c.!
Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent prepaid for 50 cts. Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.
R. L. WOLCOTT, 161 Chatham Square, N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
are offering,
at about one-half the usual cost of importation,
One case very elegant
STRIPED INDIA LONG SHAWLS.
Two cases
LACE GOODS, viz.:
POINT GAZE AND APPLIQUE SHAWLS,
FLOUNCES, CAPES, HANDKERCHIEFS, SETS,
CHANTILLY AND GUIPURE TRIMMING LACES.
BLACK AND WHITE LLAMA OVERDRESSES,
SACQUES AND SHAWLS.
Forming the largest and most elegant assortment they have ever offered, having purchased them in Europe
at panic prices.
BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

SHORT HAND.—$50 worth per minute. Send stamp. J. L. Gray, P. O. Box 4847, New York.

New Serial.

MY WIFE AND I;
OR,
HARRY HENDERSON'S HISTORY.
By HARRIET BEECHER STOWE,
Author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Minister's Wooing," &c., &c.

CHAPTER I.
INTRODUCTION.

It appears to me that the world is returning to its second childhood, and running mad for stories. Stories! Stories! stories! every where; stories in every paper, in every cracks, trade, and corner of the land. Stories! Stories! from the pen faster than the autumn, and of as many shades and coloring. Stories of the most horrible kinds from English novels; stories translated from the French, from the Danish, from the Russian, from the Swedish, from the Servian. There are serial stories in the Atlantic, in Lippincott, in the Galaxy, in Harper's, in Scribner's. The ladies' magazines are crowded for youthful pilgrims in Our Young Folks, the Little Corporal, the Riverside, the Youth's Companion, and every one of the weekly newspapers with serial stories for the nursery. We shall have Beautiful-but-Naughty illustrated magazines, the Double, the Rocking-Chair, the First Rattle, and the Foot Tub, with successive chapters of "Jack the Giant Gander," and "Hickory Dickory Dock," and "Old Mother Hubbard," extending through twelve or twenty-four or forty-eight numbers.

Even Solomon, in all his glory, Solomon would have said if he had lived in this day, "Do your num, it up and finish it," and then close with the abundance of literature in his time, and conclude that nobody was in a weariness to the flesh. Then, printing was not invented, and "books" were all copied by hand, in those very square Hebrew letters, where each letter is about as much as a bit of work as a gravestone. And yet, even with all those restrictions and circumscriptions, Solomon rather testily remarked: "Of making many books there is no end." What would he have said if he had lived over a modern Sunday-school library?

I do understood now that no paper is complete without its serial story, and that readers will be disappointed if the whole of wheels and spindles in motion are not brought out when the machine is put on the public ear, and to propound a new theory, or to give it a setting out. All my own life I have felt as in St. Paul's, a pedant, a doctrine, a tongue, a revelation, a manifestation—fortunes he wrapt it up in a serial story, and presents it to the public. We have prison disciplines, free trade, state rights, women's rights, the temperance question, in serial stories. We have Romanism and Protestantism, Mahigh Church and Low Church and no Church, contending with each other in serial stories, where each sees the errors of the other, according to the faith of the narrator.

We see the whole of the Bible, from it will be necessary to have a serial story. Even Jesus should embody his life in a serial story, to be delivered from the pulpit every day after Sunday. We look forward to announcements in our city papers such as these: The Rev. Dr. Ingersoll, of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, will begin a serial romance, to be entitled "St. Sebastian and the Arrows," in which will be given the duties, the trials, and the temptations of the young communicant. The Rev. Dr. Hall, of the Messenger, Plymouth Rock Church, will begin a serial story, entitled "Cotton Is Naughty." In which will be given the distinctive features of Protestant theology. The Rev. Dr. Bellows, of the Church of All Souls, will commence a romance of Christian Spiritualistic View, entitled "Prospero," in which every thing is, in many respects, the same as it is now, and all things are as they seem, and every thing will finally end somehow, and that nothing is of more importance than a body should cultivate general sweetness, and have the very best time possible in this life.

By the time that all these romances get to going, the public will be ready for parables, and sermons in a mouth in duck sayings, will be fully elaborated. Pilgrim's Progress will be revised, and the whole of Industrial City will be as plain in every body's mind as the streets and avenues of their own neighborhood. Finally, all science and all art and all religion will be reduced to the form of a serial by serial stories, of the greatest men and the least men, and the men of no men. This will be about the time of the Millennium.

Meanwhile, I am going to furnish a serial story for the Christian Union, and I suppose it will be as good as in every body's mind and mouth, discussed on every corner, and thought of by every body, and every one going home to every man's business and bosom, to wit:

MY WIFE AND I.

I trust that Mrs. Livermore and Mrs. Stanton, and all the prophetesses of our day, will remark the humility of my title. It is not "My Wife and I," or "My Wife on ice." It is My Wife and I. What am I, and what is my wife? Let us see, and let us see what is the use of any thing?

I write only specially for the Christian Union?" says the Landlord. Let us to a statement of facts.

Is it not evident why, O beloved? In not that firm of Christian Union which stands under the title of My Wife are I the oldest and most venerable form of Christian union on record? Why, then, is not my wife a better one?—a wiser, a stronger, a sweeter, a more experienced, and altogether better one?

To be sure, there have been times and seasons when this union has not respected her rights, and treated her a piece of old-fogyism, and various substitutes for it have been put in her place. But, lo! now, she is restored a relish, close competition inconsistent with the spirit of the times, and My Wife and I, united once more, with the rest of the Christian community, had no particular rights in society, and no particular rights to be thrust into the borders and outers of the Christian race. They have said, too, that My Wife are I, instead of an immovable unity, were a mere aggregation of partners, engaged on time, with the liberty of giving their months to any other concern that was in a hurry.

It is not thus that we understand the matter.

My Wife are I, as we understand it, is a type and symbol of more than any earthly partnership or union —of something sacred as religion, inflexible as the soul, endless as eternity—the symbol chosen by Almighty Love to represent his relation to humanity, which he sent into existence.

A fountain of eternal youth gushes near the heart of every household. Each man and woman that have loved truly, have had their romance in life—their poetry in existence.

So I, in giving my history, disclaim all other. Look not for tragedy, or haunted houses, or ghosts, or conspiracies, or murders, or concealed crimes, in this history, for you will not find such. But you will have simply and only the old story—old as the first of Genesis —of Adam, Eve, Abel, Seraphic, and Cain, Satanic, and how he sought and how he found her, and how he lost her and found her forever.

This much, on mature consideration, I hold to be sufficient introduction to my story, and now I proceed to have cast down written, and so long as human sex new Adams and new Eves in each coming generation, so will not want for sympathetic listeners.

So I, Henry Henderson—a plain Yankee boy from the mountains of New Hampshire, and at present citizen of New York—commence my story.

My experiences have three stages:

First. My child-wife, or the experiences of boyhood.

Second. My shadow-wife, or the experiences of my youth.

Third. My real wife, where I saw her, how I sought and found her, and how we lived together.

In the course of these experiences, my good friends, you will find that we take occasion to discuss all sorts of modern and exciting topics, as we keep up with the spirit of the discussion. Also, what time to-to-to-

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED
BY CONNOISSEURS
TO BE THE ONLY
GOOD Sauce,
and applicable to
EVERY VARIETY
OF
DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Game or Cold Joints, Fowl, Gravies, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street.
Special Agents for the United States.

$3 Watch! $3 Watch!
THE GREAT EUROPEAN
Eureka Aluminum-Gold Watch Co.
HAVE APPOINTED
J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., JEWELERS,
561 Broadway, New York,
SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U. S.

And have authorized them to sell their great EUREKA ALUMINUM-GOLD WATCHES for THREE DOLLARS, and to warrant each and every one to keep correct time for one year. This Watch we guarantee to be the best and cheapest time-keeper that is now in use in any part of the globe. The works are in double cases, Lady's and Gent's size, and are beautifully chased. The cases are made of the best solid silver known as Coin Silver, and Aluminum Gold. It has the same appearance of Solid Gold, and is of the same color, and is one of the strongest metals now in use. One can tell it from Gold only by weight, the Aluminum Gold being one-fourth lighter. The works are all made by machinery, the same as are the well-known American Watch. We pack the Watch safely in a small box and send it by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $3 50; $3 only for packing and postage. A key to set free with each Watch. Money should be sent by Post-Office Money Order or in a Registered Letter. Address all orders and communications to

J. F. WILLIAMS & CO., Jewelers,
561 Broadway, New York.

BURNETT'S
(THE BEST)
Flavoring Extracts.

"Standard," uniform in quality, and give entire satisfaction to our customers."
PARK & TILFORD,
216 Sixth Ave. and 526 Broadway.

"Growing in favor."
ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT,
Chambers Street.

2, 5, and 10 oz., Flint, and Quart sizes for sale by all first-class Grocers in the United States and Canada.
JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Sole Proprietors,
Boston, Mass.

BLEES'
Noiseless,
Lock-Motion,
Lock-Stitch
SEWING MACHINE
Challenges the world in perfection of work; strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine and, for agencies and circulars, apply at
623 BROADWAY,
New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will be returned to you, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

The Forrester Submerged Pump is a double-acting, non-freezing Force Pump. It is composed entirely of metal, is simple in construction, very durable, and liable to get out of order. It has no packings, and hence works with the least possible friction. Will work in wells of any depth, and is the cheapest and best for general use. Agents Wanted—local and traveling. Dealers especially interested. Send for Circular. Address
FORRESTER MANUFACTURING CO.,
Corner Church & Cortlandt Streets, New York.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.
CHLORALINE.
Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all other poisonous narcotics used for producing sleep. Price 50 cents and $1 per bottle. Send for Circular containing medical indorsements. T. DE WITT KAYSER, Proprietor,
81 Barclay St., New York.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, 80, and either of Harper's, $4, send a year for $6, by
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 $ 15 $ 20 $ 25

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last seven years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and for time to $60 cases of gold. These of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $100 cases of gold. Ladies' size, $25, equal to $125 cases of gold. Every jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are hunting cases, patent and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the best houses in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.

WASHINGTON
MEDALLION PEN

All persons holding Patrons' Tickets in Fourth Series are hereby notified that the fund is being distributed.' Send for Circulars and Samples. Address Washington Medallion Pen Co., N. Y., inclosing Stamp.

Vick's
Illustrated Guide
TO Flower Garden
AND
Catalogue of Seeds
FOR 1870

THE FIRST EDITION OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND copies of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published and ready to send out—100 pages, and an Engraving of almost every desirable Flower and Vegetable. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, illustrated with Three Hundred Fine Wood Engravings and Two beautiful

COLORED PLATES.

The most beautiful and the most instructive Floral Guide published.

A German Edition published, in all other respects similar to the English.

Sent free to all my customers of 1870, as rapidly as possible, without application. Sent to all others who order them for 50 cents, which is not half the cost.

Address JAMES VICK,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

STEEL PENS.
American Branch of House,
91 JOHN ST., New York.
JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.
HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE FOUDLING

A group of statuary by John Rogers, just completed, called GOING TO THE PARSON. Price, $15 each.

Parties desiring trees or other groups, or wishing to send them as presents, can order them, and inclose the price, and they will be delivered at any point east of the Mississippi with all express charges paid; or will be sent west of there by freight, the purchaser allowed to compare them.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to JOHN ROGERS, 912 Fifth Ave., New York.

SPRINGFIELD

"IT STILL WAITS."—Rich, full, and pure as ever. Upon tone, Lightness of touch, Elasticity, Durability, and Workmanship, the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company rest their claim to the favor of the public. Office, 658 Broadway, New York. "Letter A" Machines sold for $50.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, and in saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen book of Type, cuts, borders, &c., for 25 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1806
SAPOLIO,
For General
Household purposes
IS BETTER AND CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

☞ On Receipt of One Dollar
We will Mail to you the acceptable gift to a Young Lady,
LORING'S BOX OF HOME NOTE PAPER,
French or English, Stamped with her Initial,
Address LORING, Publisher,
36 School Street, Boston, Mass.

ONE DIME will secure by return mail copies of The Ballou Series, the cheapest, most attractive, and most popular young people's paper in the world (all stories complete), with three times the money. Splendid premiums and large cash commissions to agents. Order at once.
FRANK A. GOSS, Publishers,
Chicago, Ill.

W. D. WILSON & CO. 321 Pearl St., N. Y., want Firm with Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

NEW REVERSIBLE
WAYNES
Bonnet & Hooded
SCARF.
Combining Elegance, Comfort & Economy.
Acting Polarity
Prevents Chilling of the Kidneys.
Sold by Leading Retailers.
Manufactured by
WAYNE KNITTING MILLS,
Wayne, Pa.

MANUFACTURED BY THE PROPRIETORS.
F. E. SUIRE & CO.
Wholesale Druggists,
N. W. COR. FOURTH & VINE STREETS, CINCINNATI, OHIO.
Price, per Bottle, $1 00. Sent by express, free, on receipt of $1 50.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

WANTED.

BOOK CANVASSERS of both sexes are wanted in every County and Congression in the U. S and Provinces, to sell works especially appropriate as Gift-Books for the Holidays, viz.: Light at Evening Time; a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by John Stanford Holme, D.D. Barcher's Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises. Sons of Nazareth. By Lyman Abbott. Old Testament Shadows. By Lyman Abbott. Biography of Distinguished Women. By Mrs. S. J. Hale. And other works that have a large and profitable addition to any library. Liberal Commissions to Agents. Specimen Copies of Books sent on receipt of Price. For further particulars address
AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of SIX HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Steinway & Sons, at Extraordinarily Low Prices for Cash, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

Burnett's Cocoaine
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
HAIR DRESSING in the World.

THE FISHERIES.—NETS, SEINES, LINES, TWINES, suitable for Export, Pearl, Lake or Sea Fishing; for sale by the trade by AMERICAN NET AND TWINE CO., 44 Commerce Street, Philadelphia; sales agency by mail.

OXYGENIZED AIR, a cure for Scrofula, Catarrh, and Consumption. Send address for Pamphlet to Dr. C. L. DIEHL, Rochester, N. Y.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circular, address F. I. SHARPLES, Chemical Engineer, Chester, Pa.

$10 to $25.—Genuine Oroide-Gold Watches. Address JOHN FOGUS, WPT, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send it free. Address
MRS. M. C. LEGGETT, Rochester, N. Y.

AGENTS! READ THIS!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 per Week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

$240 PER MONTH to Agents. 12 entirely new articles; one sample free. Address C. M. LINNGTON, 88 South Hanover St., Chicago.

AGENTS WANTED for the Illustrated Annals of the War. The only complete and authentic work published. Splendid steel engravings. Agents are meeting with unparalleled success. Extra terms now ready. Address at once, J. B. FORD & CO., 539 Broadway, New York.

$75 to $250 per month, every where, made to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in the most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Alfred, Maine; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

Local Agents Wanted.

I want a local agent in every town and village in the country to introduce the WESTERN WORLD. A Magnificent Steel Engraving to every subscriber. From it $1 can be easily made in an evening. Liberal cash commission allowed. Send for Descriptive Circulars and Terms to JAMES R ELLIOTT, Boston, Mass.

$500 PER WEEK
Can be made by parties who are wide-awake, without interfering with other business. Address JAMES ROOD & CO., 626 Broadway, N. Y.

MONEY EASILY MADE
With our Stencil and Key-Check Outfit.
12th Circular Free.
STAFFORD MFG CO
52 FULTON ST.
N.Y.

$1500 A YEAR.
WANTED AGENTS to sell the Universal Shuttle Lock-Stitch Sewing Machine, size 12 in. long by 8 in. height, of great capacity and durability; works on a new principle. Price, only $25 00; sent C. O. D. Address Universal S. M. Co., 323 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED, in every section of the country, to sell the History of the War between France and Prussia. By Archibald Forbes, M.D. The most popular and best-selling book of the year. Splendid commissions. Send for $1 00 and for circular. Address GAYLORD WATSON, Publishers, 54 Beekman St., New York.

WATCH FREE—GIVEN GRATIS to every live man and woman who will act as agent for the most honorable business paying $50 a day sure. No gift enterprise. We mean what we say. Address with stamp, Reliance M. Rogers Kennedy & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 60 full-size photographs, manufactured, for 28 cts.; 5 for $1. $2 25 per dozen. Circulars free. Address C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

$10 A DAY.—Business entirely new. Circulars free. Address J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

WATCH FREE, and $30 a day sure, at 1 no business. Address LATTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

$75 PER WEEK easily made by Agents. Sample and Stencil Case Mam'f'g Co., Cortland, Conn.

$25 A DAY! 20 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. Address H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Send 10 cts. for full particulars. Sample, free. Address S. M. SENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$30 PER WEEK.—Agents wanted in every town. Samples sent FREE. W. BRINKLE, Detroit, Mich.

$60 A WEEK paid Agents in a new business. Spare or all time. Address SACO NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR, from the present time to the end of the year 1871, for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year, to one address, for one Year, or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Four Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, One Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year; payable quarterly, yearly, or semi-yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be paid in advance, and 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number.

Unless otherwise specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number issued after January 1st, but it is understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given. It is necessary to give name of discontinued Post-Office.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers. Care should be taken that Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the reader.

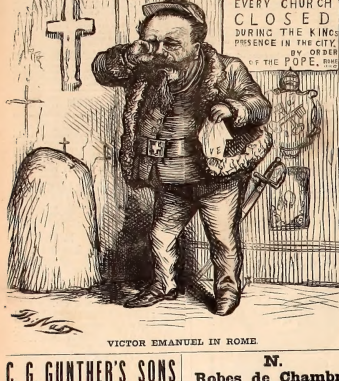
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $800: Half Page, $50: Quarter Page, $25—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



VICTOR EMANUEL IN ROME.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE,

Having removed to their New Store, now offer their entire importation for the Holidays—selected expressly for their opening.

F. SCHLEIFER & Co.'s
PURE CALIFORNIA
BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations and deleterious oil of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 1871.

Published Weekly; 16 pages; full of splendid engravings and articles by the best writers on the Popular Sciences and the Industrial Arts, Mechanics, Manufactures, Inventions, Engineering, Chemistry, Agriculture, Horticulture, Household Economy, and all Useful Knowledge. Volume 24 commenced January 1, 1871, and is recognized as a great Popular Educator. Specimen numbers sent free. Terms—$3 a year; $1 50 for six months. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York, Publishers and Patent Agents.

NEW PATENT LAW.—Our readers are aware that a New Patent Law was approved by the President in July last. Messrs. Munn & Co., of the Scientific American, No. 37 Park Row, N.Y., have just issued a handsome edition of the law, which they furnish free to inventors. Munn & Co. have been engaged in securing patents nearly a quarter of a century, and are secure about fifty patents per week.

POLLAK & SON,
Manufacturers of
Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS.
Ambers, Repairing and Boiling.
Retail Store, 27 John St., middle of the block.
Send for Circular.

HORSE CLIPPING.—Adie's Patent Machine, price $9, for sale at 191 Broadway, Room 6. Agents wanted.

N.
Robes de Chambre
AND House Coats,
FOR
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.
E. A. NEWELL,
727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

Mason & Hamlin
New Styles
Cabinet Organs.
Prices Reduced.
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES free.
MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO.,
Broadway, NEW YORK: 154 Tremont St., BOSTON.

Engines, Tools, Machinery, &c.,
FOR SALE,
AT
THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,
Foot of East 12th St., N.Y.
Embracing
ENGINES, PLANERS, LATHES,
SMITHS' AND BOILER-MAKERS' TOOLS,
And Machinery and Patterns of the most approved kinds, &c., &c. Also,
6 HIGH-PRESSURE ENGINES, partly finished;
2 STEVENSON'S PATENT TURBINE WATER-WHEELS, 66-inch diameter; and
1 MARINE BEAM ENGINE, 66-in. by 10-ft. stroke.
JNO S. SCHULTZE,
Receiver of the Novelty Iron Works.
☞ Send for Catalogue.
New York, Oct. 29, 1870.

THE IMPROVED
WILSON
SHUTTLE
SEWING MACHINE
for simplicity, durability & beauty stands unrivaled. For stitching, hemming, tucking, felling, quilting, cording, binding, braiding, gathering, feathering and sewing on cloth, leather, or anything.
AGENTS WANTED in every County in the United States where we have not one already employed. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

Farnham, Gilbert & Co.,
BANKERS,
No. 8 Wall Street, New York.

8 per Bonanza is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 60 cents. A pamphlet on Catarrh free. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, No. 10 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.
PRINTING Printing Machines of all kinds, from $3 to $300. Send for circular.
Printer Manuf'g Co., 14 Kilby St., Boston, Mass.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

Hatter and Furrier,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
719 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.
LADIES' FINE FURS.
Seal Sacques, $75, $90, $100.
Astrakhan Sacques, $35, $45, $50.
IMPORTER OF
ENGLISH HATS FOR GENTLEMEN WEAR.

UNRIVALED HOLIDAY
NOVELTIES.
House Coats,
Dressing Robes,
"Our Fritz,"
"Chancellor,"
"Monarch"
Scarfs,
Stylish and Fashionable,
With an Immense Variety of
HOSIERY,
Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin
GLOVES,
LINED AND UNLINED.
SILK SUSPENDERS,
INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.
Union Adams & Co.,
637 Broadway.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S
CHALLENGE SAUCE
Pronounced by Connoisseurs
TO BE THE
BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,
AND
SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.
For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.
Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

PATENT
IMPROVED
REFLECTORS,
for ILLUMINATING CHURCHES, HALLS,
THEATRES,
STORES,
SHOW WINDOWS.
Increase the Light fourfold.
Send for Circular.
PETRY BROS. & CO.,
253 Pearl St., N.Y.

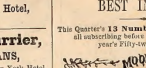
WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
150 Designs and Plans
$1 EACH. Postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
Publisher, 191 Broadway, N.Y.
New-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

MEDIKONES.—What are they? A new and remarkable discovery of vital importance to all. Book sent free. Address or call on Drs. WELLS & STILL, 21 West 21st St., N. Y. City.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE
contains in every number one complete story every month $1000. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

THE BEST PAPER
AND THE
BEST INDUCEMENTS!

This Quarter's 13 Numbers SENT FREE to all subscribing before Dec. 25, 1870, for next year's Fifty-two Numbers of



THE GREAT ILLUSTRATED
RURAL AND FAMILY WEEKLY, FOR TOWN AND COUNTRY.

The RURAL now in its 21st year, is not only the Largest, Best, and Cheapest, but by far the Largest Circulating Journal of its Class in the World! Not National in character, Ably Edited, Superbly Illustrated and Printed, it is the BEST AMERICAN WEEKLY!

It is the Standard Authority on all branches of AGRICULTURE, HORTICULTURE, &c. As a Literary and Family Paper, it is a favorite in many of the best families in the land. As a Business Journal, for Producer or Retail Dealer, Seller, and Buyer, it is Unequaled. The Largest Illustrated Journal on the continent—each number containing Sixteen Five-Column Pages double the size of most papers of its class. It is its paper for the East, West, North, and South.

TERMS, INDUCEMENTS, ETC.

TERMS—$3 a year of 52 Numbers, and only $2 50 in Clubs of Ten. This Quarter's 13 Numbers sent FREE, as offered above. Our Club Inducements for 1871 are unprecedented. Specimens, Premium Lists, &c., sent free to all forming Clubs, and we want a live Club Agent in every Town. Address

D. D. T. MOORE, 41 Park Row, New York.

S'NAV EVANS' Prices FOR THE 'SNAV EVANS' Best-Made FALL & WINTER Clothing IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS.
$10, $13, $13 50, $16, $18, $20, $22, $23, $27, $32, $37, $38.

REEFING JACKETS.
$6 00, $7 00, $8 00, $10 00, $13 00, $19 00, $22 00.

WINTER SUITS.
$14 00, $16 99, $18 00, $21 00, $25 00, $28, $32, $36.

PANTS.
Fashionable Stripes, $3, $4 50, $5, $7, $7 50, $8, $8 50, $9.
In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at S'NAV EVANS' CLOTHING EMPORIUM,
66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

F. J. KALTENBRUNN, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Ambers, &c., Wholesale and Retail. Repairing done in all its branches. Circulars and Price-Lists sent. P. O. Box 6734. Stores: 6 John St., next Bdway; 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Factory: 44 John St.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) for the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.

Travel and Adventure.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER VII.

At the Foot of Mount Hecla.—Arrangements for the Ascent.—A toilsome Ride.—Appearance of the Crater.—A perilous Slide.—Descent into the Crater.—Native Curiosity.

Soon after passing through the desert described in the preceding chapter, our travelers arrived at Hankadalur, where the minister, after seeing that he was provided with the necessary attendance for the rest of his journey, took leave of his guest, and returned alone to his home. M. Nougaret went on till he reached Selsund, which was a little collection of huts not far from the foot of the mountain—a kind of settlement, of which neither the word village, nor hamlet, nor any other English word, in fact, would convey any conception. The Icelandic word by which such a nestling of human families is called is bear. The engraving will enable the reader to form some general idea of the situation and aspect of Selsund, as approached from the south, with the volcano in the distance.

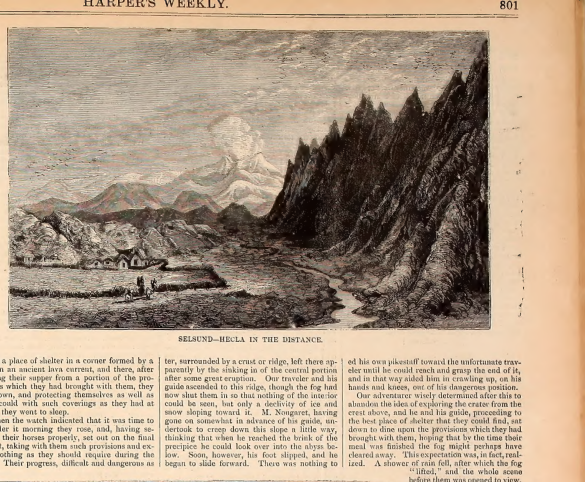
The minister of Thyorsarholt, to whom M. Nougaret had explained, in Latin, his wishes in respect to the ascent of the mountain, had sent a message by the attendant whom he engaged at Hankadalur to accompany the traveler to Selsund, and by this means the people there obtained a general idea of M. Nougaret's plans and wishes. The wife of the man on whom the duty would devolve of going to the mountain as guide seemed to be put quite out of humor by the arrival of the stranger, as the result of it would be to take her husband away from home, and expose him not only to great fatigue, but to some danger, especially as the mountain had been "uneasy" for some time past, and threatened an eruption. M. Nougaret tried to appease and conciliate her by presents and attentions, but with very little success. She continued morose, and apparently very unhappy.

The man made signs of taking out M. Nougaret's watch, and then pointed to the mountain, by way of inquiring at what hour on the following day he wished to set out.

M. Nougaret replied by producing the watch and pointing to the figure four.

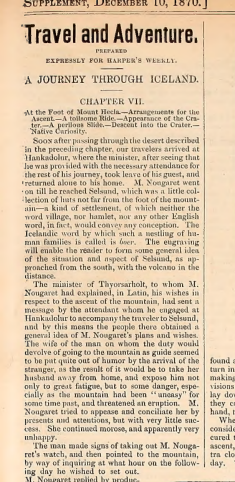
Accordingly at four o'clock the next morning he was awakened, and the arrangements began to be made for departure: but so numerous were the preparations required, and there were so many delays, part of which were occasioned by the evident disposition of the poor wife to do every thing in her power to retard and, if possible, to prevent the departure of her husband, that the process of preparation was very slow.

At length, however, about ten o'clock every thing was ready, and the traveler and his guide set out. They were to go to the foot of the mountain—a distance of some miles—on horseback, and then, leaving their horses, were to climb the remaining three or four thousand feet on foot. They arrived at the end of that part of the ascent which was practicable for horses about five o'clock—that is, after a six or seven hours' ride over a way encumbered with sharp rocks, ragged debâcles, heaps of scoriæ, and beds of volcanic ashes and sand. Greatly fatigued with the difficulties of the way, and mentally exhausted by the excitements and the dangers through which they had passed, they at once encamped on the spot for the night—if night the period might be called during which the sun glides along the horizon, skipping only for two or three hours a little below. They found a place of shelter in a corner formed by a turn in an ancient lava current, and there, after making their supper from a portion of the provisions which they had brought with them, they lay down, and protecting themselves as well as they could with such coverings as they had at hand, they went to sleep.



SELSUND—HECLA IN THE DISTANCE.

When the watch indicated that it was time to consider it morning they rose, and, having secured their horses properly, set out on the final ascent, taking with them such provisions and extra clothing as they should require during the day. Their progress, difficult and dangerous as it was on other accounts, was much impeded by a very dense fog, which rose and covered the whole mountain, and which in many places became so dense as to render it almost impossible to proceed. They, however, persevered. They soon began to encounter vast masses of ice and snow, which they were obliged either to traverse with great danger and fatigue, or to avoid by long detours. The engraving represents the kind of views they had of the mountain at such times as the fog lifted so as to open the prospect.



CURIOSITY TO SEE THE STRANGER.

The summit of the mountain forms a vast center, surrounded by a crust or ridge, left there apparently by the sinking in of the central portion after some great eruption. Our traveler and his guide ascended to this ridge, though the fog had now shut them in so that nothing of the interior could be seen, but only a declivity of ice and snow sloping toward it. M. Nougaret, having gone on somewhat in advance of his guide, undertook to creep down this slope a little way, thinking that when he reached the brink of the precipice he could look over into the abyss below. Soon, however, his foot slipped, and he began to slide forward. There was nothing to seize hold of to arrest his descent, and he instinctively struck his iron-pointed pike into the ice before him. The staff broke in his hand. He grasped the lower part, leaving the other to slide down the remaining portion of the declivity, and to shoot over the edge of the precipice into the crater, while he stopped his own progress by coming astride upon the part which was saved, and which was wedged fast in a fissure in the ice.

The guide soon came to the place, and, creeping down as near the spot as possible, he extended his own pikestaff toward the unfortunate traveler until he could reach and grasp the end of it, and in that way aided him in crawling up, on his hands and knees, out of his dangerous position.

Our adventurer wisely determined after this to abandon the idea of exploring the crater from the crest above, and he and his guide, proceeding to the best place of shelter that they could find, sat down to dine upon the provisions which they had brought with them, hoping that by the time their meal was finished the fog might perhaps have cleared away. This expectation was, in fact, realized. A shower of rain fell, after which the fog lifted, and the whole scene before them was opened to view.

They saw that the crest which surrounded the crater was not entirely continuous. There was a break upon one side, forming an opening by means of which it seemed that access to the interior might easily be gained. M. Nougaret determined to attempt this route, but remembering the anxiety and distress which the wife of the guide had felt in respect to the safety of her husband, he determined to make the attempt alone. So, making an appointment with the guide in respect to the place of meeting him when he came out, he began to creep and slide down the slope of rock and ice which descended toward the breach in the crest, and then went in.

He found himself in the midst of a vast cavity, of nearly circular form, three or four hundred feet in diameter, and surrounded by a range of cliffs one or two hundred feet high. The floor was covered with masses of lava and heaps of volcanic ashes, and here and there openings were seen, through which columns of steam and of sulphureous vapors were ascending. So dense were these vapors that in some places M. Nougaret was obliged to fix himself with his handkerchief to get breath. Besides these open vents, there were others which had formerly been open, but were now closed. Some had accidentally been choked up by the lava and ashes which had accumulated over and around them, while others were covered with ice and snow.

By going round to the windward side of one of the openings M. Nougaret found that he could approach so near as to peep over the edge and look down. He saw, at what seemed to him a distance of several hundred feet below, a glow of light, which seemed to come and go in flashes, and was accompanied by blinish flames, like those produced by the combustion of carbonic oxide or sulphureted hydrogen. Finally he threw a block of lava down one of these chimneys. He could hear it for several seconds thundering down through the winding passage-way, and then, after the lapse of about half a minute, a great commotion seemed to be produced by it below, and fresh bursts of steam and even flashes of flame came up to the surface, and issued forth, not only from the orifice into which the stone had been thrown, but from several others near.

M. Nougaret remained in the crater, he says, for three hours, exploring it in every part, and collecting specimens. Then he came out and descended the mountain to rejoin his guide at the place where the horses had been left, where he had directed the guide to await his arrival. He found him in a state of tipsy silliness and inconsolability, from having, in the absence of his master, found his way to a bottle of brandy which had been brought, by way of precaution, among the other stores.

Our traveler found, on his return to the villages, that his visit to the region had become known, and had made quite a sensation among the peasants—so much so that wherever he stopped, at any way-side cabin, the people came running with the utmost eagerness from their work of hay-making in the fields, to see and hear the stranger. Some came running on foot, with their scythes and rude pitchforks on their shoulders. Others mounted horses, when they were at hand, for greater speed. The means of communication, however, with the stranger when they arrived on the spot were very limited and unsatisfactory, being confined altogether to dumbshow. They had at any rate the satisfaction of looking upon a foreigner who had come some thousands of miles from beyond the seas to ascend their mountain.

GOING INTO THE CRATER.

Indeed, he travelled on day after day, on his return toward his port of embarkation, our traveller found the hospitalities of the country somewhat embarrassing. He returned by a route lying nearer the sea than the one by which he came, and that led him through a somewhat more thickly settled portion of the country; and at every hut that he stopped at the dogs about the door and on the roof would bark in noisy welcome, the horses would stop, the guide would dismount, the peasants' whole family would come to the door and insist upon the traveler's going in. On accepting the invitation Mr. Macnay would be ushered into the best room, refreshments would be spread before him, consisting of coffee, and of bisc: ts made of Indian meal, and the whole family would stand around questioning the guide, and listening to his stories, while Mr. Youngster himself would partake of the refreshments in silence —not being able to offer any of his hospitable entertainers a single intelligible word.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE WEDDING RING.

ONLY a well-worn hoop of gold,
Unlit by any glow
Of sunshine gem, a ring that told
Its story long ago.

Only a circlet dimm'd and thin
With wedded years of life,
Whose nameless circle met my soul within
With sorrow-shaded strife.

Only a cincture clasping fast
Two separate lives in one,
That calls to mind the sunny Past,
Yet leaves me still alone.

Only a relic of the joy
In days no more to be,
Of thoughts Regret alone can cloy,
Never again for me.

Only a treasure from the hoard
No more to rest in mine,
But pass'd into the voiceless land,
Beyond the hills divine.

Only a pledge of mutual love,
Of love that ne'er shall fade,
Though Death has call'd all those he drove
That sacred plightings made.

Only an earnest of the truth
Nor Time nor sught can bend,
But ever still will bind us both
Unwavering to the end.

Small as the circlet is, it bound
All else her love to mine.
Now life is gone, but steadfast round
My soul its pledges twine.

Never again its gold shall thwart
Her yielding finger's move
Never—not e'en when graves their dead
Have loosed from sleep below.

Never again! But as one thought,
In realms of perfect peace,
Our hearts shall beat, with rapture fraught,
When Death gives me release.

THE WRECK OF THE "SIREN."

IT was a Sunday morning in June, and the large ship, newly built for the African trade by Messrs. Watson and M'Cash, thriving Glasgow merchants, stood ready in the dock for launching on the Monday. The figure-head of the Siren, with its fair, beguiling face and long, streaming hair, facing the Clyde, seemed smiling defiantly at the thought of the dangerous in which it was to share. The fine lines of the vessel, the strong, graceful curves, the massive proportions of the united ship, were being especially exalted in by two men of the crew, who were walking round her, and eying her with all the studious unction with which dealers eye a bloodhorse.

"I tell you, Mr. Mackay," said Patterson, the elder of the two, a grim old "Sandimonian" bostwain, "that there'll never be a finer craft afloat, that, instead of bearing the name of one of the great prophets or kings in the Old Testament, is to be christened after one of Queen Victoria's wards, a grand-daughter, sae dout, of that Scarlet Woman mentioned in the Revelations, and there so very deservedly censured."

"Tut, tut, man!" said his companion, a young, bright, frank-looking fellow, with honest, manly hair, who was to be first mate; "don't you know it is the likeness of Mary Cameron, our captain's young wife? She is as beautiful as an angel, and quite as good. She would bring a blessing on any ship. She is going out with us."

"All the worse for us, Mr. Mackay; there's always mischief where there's a woman. Even Eve downward, they were always kittle-cattle. I'm sorry for it, Mr. Mackay, very sorry. I never sailed with a captain's wife but once, and then we ran on the coast of New Holland, and half of us were eaten by cannibals. I call it very presumptuous, putting the face of a real woman on the figure-head of a vessel. It's joost makking an idol of the glut."

"Stuff! I only wish I had been the man who carved and gilded it. Hong me, but I'd have kissed it at parting! She is the smartest, winsomest wee thing, I tell you, that ever trod the planks of the Clyde!"

"And who may this paragon of yours be, Mr. Mackay?" said a voice which made the young man start, turn round, and perceptibly redden. It was Mr. M'Cash, with the captain and the captain's wife. They had at that moment come suddenly round the corner of a stack of timber.

"I was only speaking of a young lady I know," said Mackay, "and, I think, I said then that she was rather like the Siren's figure-head."

"Do you hear that, Mrs. Cameron?" said the old merchant, turning round, smiling. "Why, there never could be two people like our fair siren, I should have thought, to be jealous."

"I dare swear, Mary," said the captain, "that there will not be a man on board my ship, I fancy that the Siren is the exact image of the woman he loves best—wife, sister, or sweet-heart. You mustn't make my lady vain, Mr. M'Cash."

"This is to be your 'last voyage, Captain Cameron, are you sure to hear?" said the merchant.

"Well, so I promised Mary when we joined hands; but I shall find it hard, I think, to leave so good a ship. What is there wrong, Mary?"

"And holds more than any vessel we have."

"Still, skim like a swallow," said the captain's wife. "Don't you think she'll be very fast, Mr. Mackay?"

A slight blush rose on the cheek of Mrs. Cameron as she kindly put this question, to prevent the young man feeling left out of the conversation.

"Yes, I think she'll be very fast," said the mate, with an air rather of veneration than respect; "she has all the look of it."

"Ay, I tell you she'll show them the way," said M'Cash. "She'll be faster than the Petrel, and that's saying a great deal, a very great deal, for the Petrel's the fastest thing out of Glasgow."

The launch took place the next day. There was great cheering as pretty Mrs. Cameron dashed the bottle of wine against the ship's side, and called out in her fresh, young voice,

"I name this ship the Siren."

Then the flags flew rejoicingly, hats and handkerchiefs were waved, six small ship's cannon were discharged to announce the important event, and the new ship glided into the water, all eager to venture on her new element. Every body was smiling, shouting, or congratulating somebody else; but Mackay was still absorbed.

"Nae, nae, he said, "it's a pagan business, and will never bring luck to Christian people, Siren, indeed! What was a siren but joost a hizzie that ought to have been whipped at the cart's tail? It's no patience with such blasphemy. There's no luck in it. I feel that. No—no whisky, Mandy; I'll not drink the dregs of the heathen christening, though mayhap I'll take a double cuddee to-night to the ship's health."

"There's no wrong Patterson," said a sourlooking creole, who was to be second mate, and who had stood near the mate during the christening; "such a sad pig-headed fellow. How pretty the captain's wife looked at the launch! By Jove! that's the finest girl I ever saw in my life that she ought to have married a duke!"

"Yes, she is pretty," said Mackay, half reluctantly.

"That's very cold praise; why, man alive, you used to be far more enthusiastic."

"'Tis all the praise I care to give just now, Watson."

"Oh, please yourself," said the creole, with a glance that made the white part of his eyes become a reddish tint. "I only hope, Mackay, you were rather smitten with her, for you talked of nothing else after we first met her together at M'Cunlig's office."

"I do not care to remember the foolish things I then said."

"Oh, you don't," said Watson, spitefully. "Very well, then, don't: but I shan't forget them." And then to himself, as he turned on his heel, he muttered, "Nor shall the captain, I fancy you and him shall have a little upstart fool, who tries already to crow over me."

II

It was beautiful to see the young wife in the morning, just after the ship had got under way, happy as an angel; the men following her with admiring glances, the very ship's boys eager to run on errands for her. At the first meal or two after the coast of Africa an awning was raised over the quarter-deck, and the captain's wife used to sing in a way that even old Patterson said was enough to melt the heart of a shark. The very sailors loitered had been swift and gracious. One night the captain came on deck suddenly to see their discipline getting on. He was leaning over the bulwarks, conversing with a placid content, when Watson came up and began talking to him of the ship's crew for the first time.

"Why, Watson," said the captain, who had twice asked him a question without receiving an answer—"why, what's the matter? You look sulky as stitch-water. You can't be in love?"

"I'm quite well, Sir," said Watson, listlessly.

"Now, look here, man; as your superior officer, I insist on knowing what is on your mind," said the hearty captain, laying his hand on the creole's shoulder.

Watson was still sullen.

"I shall be very angry, remember, Watson, if you do not tell me; indeed I shall grow suspicious of some mischief. There's no mutiny among the men? No danger about the cargo? No fear of fire?—nothing wrong, I hope?"

Watson assumed an air of frankness as he turned round to his interrogator, his face lightening up.

"Captain Cameron," he said, "I do think it would have been happier for you if you had not brought Mackay as first mate this voyage."

"Why, what of him?" said the astonished captain. "He's one of the best of fellows—bank, gumesse; we have become quite friends. Besides, he is musical, and that's a great deal when a pleasant companion when we are together in the evening."

"Captain Cameron," hissed the creole in his ear, "I have a painful secret to tell you. I am afraid Mackay has done you a deadly injury. I'm not say his love is returned, but I am sure that he loves her: indeed, he his told me so. I feel there must be a man on board for you this."

The captain staggered back against the bulwark, and clutched at, or he would have fallen.

"Watson," he said, after a long silence broken only by a groan, "you are my friend indeed; and yet what you have told me has cut my very heart in two. But Mary's true—she's true! He, you say, told you he loved my Mary?"

"He said so to me last night when we were joining together, just after you left us to turn in."

"Watson, I know he had dared to tell me his love, I would throw him to the sharks. Give me your hand. I'll see to this. But Mary is true as the sun of that; nothing shall shake me in that—she's true. Fool that I was, not to see what that fellow's smooth speeches and sly manners meant! Ah! I remember now; yes, I've seen him colder when they met."

The pause was now long and fast. The unhappy man, tossed in a moment from heaven to hell, strode down and up the deck. The two were talking. Cameron listened guiltily—for he was ashamed of his meanness—before he opened the door.

"Now do tell me who she was that you were dreaming in the ship-yard," said his wife's voice. "I always felt so curious to know who the lassie was who had stolen away your heart. Were her eyes blue, Mary dear? Was her hair golden?"

"Her hair and eyes were nearly of your color."

"You were saying, I remember, that her face was like the siren's, so she must have been like me—you could not conceal that from me."

"Well, she was very, very unlike you: but don't ask me any more. I don't want to tell you who she was. That's my secret."

"Then I shall find it out as try 'Auld Robin Grey' again."

Then the door burst open, and the captain appeared. "Mary," he said, "enough of that singing for to-night. I've got a headache. Mackay, go on deck and see to the rigging and attend to your duties: you must not spend so much time away from the mess. It's hard on Watson. Go up at once."

Mackay, startled at the change in the captain's manner, left the cabin, after waking Mrs. Cameron good-night.

"Why, Lizzie," said Mrs. Cameron, throwing her arms round his neck, "what ails you? You do not look yourself to-night. Let me kiss your dear old forehead—let me kiss it, dearest—that'll soon make it well."

"I want no nonsense, Mary. I feel a bad pain at my heart, I tell you, a very bad pain."

In a moment the woman's nature was roused. She flew to her husband, knelt by him, held his hand, and rested his head on her shoulder. She was the patient, loving nurse; her girlish playfulness was all cast aside.

"If I didn't know the captain so well," thought Mackay to himself, as he walked to the lonely helm, the lump of which was just lit, "I should really have thought he was jealous. I hope he's not going to make a fool of some infernal African fever. Why, his eyes quite glitter."

"The captain is out of sorts—quite rusty, I declare," said Watson, as they met soon after on deck. "I never saw him so before."

The next morning the captain wished to alter the ship's course. He was sure there was an error in the reckoning, and that they had passed Cape Algo in the night.

"I still think that Cape Algo is before us, captain," said Mackay, in his frank, sleepy way. "Those were only clouds we saw at daybreak. We've gone over the next land, Sir, quite to the east of the usual track."

"Do you dare to teach your captain?" burst out Cameron. "Do you dare to ignore my understrolation mooring my mast? You bear witness, Watson, that my mate has insulted me in my own deck. Another word, Sir, and I'll strike you to the ground."

The mate's hand caught his uplifted arm. It was his wife's.

"Donald," she said—"Donald! Oh, think of what you do! Mr. Mackay has done nothing to deserve this anger. He only suggested a doubt. It was his duty, you know, to do that."

The captain grasped his wife by the wrist till she groaned for pain, and drew her toward the cabin stairs.

"I'll have no interference in these matters, woman. I know whom I can trust and whom I can not. An American captain would have shot that man down. Mr. Mackay, henceforward I only wish to speak to you when on duty. I said that."

"The captain's lost his head," said Patterson to Mackay. "He's joost clean demented, or he'd never have used those words. We're far out of our course. The lock's against the Siren now. God help us, for man can't! And that loving little wife will be clutched for sure!"

Well, if it is not the drink, there must be some thing wrong in his brain. Never mind, Mr. Mackay, he'll come like you, Sir, and we'll stand by you when we get back. He'll be sorry for this to-morrow."

"But we shall never be friends again," said Mackay, "and I suppose I must not speak to that noble wife of his any more. Heaven send me strength to bear this injustice, but it is hard."

"So hard, my dear Mackay," said Watson, who stood by his side as the captain left the deck, "that some men would never brook the fellow for being so savage, and raising his hand at you as if you were a dog. 'Tis brave revenge."

"No; I'll never turn mutineer," said Mackay. "My conscience is pure, and I can clear myself in the owners. As to the captain, Watson, do you think, that some villain has been infusing suspicious of me into his mind?"

Watson was silent for a moment; then he said,

"The men all like you. Perhaps it's that false wife of Cameron's."

"No," said Mackay, with generous warmth. "I'd as soon believe that a voice from one of the stars had told him that I was a mutineer, or that something from the sea had said that I was dangerous to the ship."

III.

Mackay was right. One hour after midnight, in the midst of a storm, the Siren struck, with tremendous shock that shattered the unhappy vessel, on a great reef two miles to the south of Cape Algo. The water instantly poured in with such terrific force that before more than twenty of the crew had escaped, screaming and shouting, to the mainyards, the ship had filled far over decks. But with driving storm, in the darkness and the terror, no one of the half-clothed men who flew to the rigging knew at first who was saved, except now and then that a name was shouted or replied to. The captain and his wife were there, Mackay was saved, and Patterson and Watson were also among the survivors. Patterson soon after the ship's keel had struck stood to the rigging higher up than the rest; the mainyard waves roared ceaselessly below for their prey.

When day broke lividly on the unhappy band it shone on the pale face of the captain, who had been injured in his efforts to save his wife, and with difficulty been rescued. He was wildly delirious. His brave wife held him up in her arms, and was by turns to vain to soothe him. They had made a sayanga's heart bleed to see her wiping away the clammy moisture that kept arising upon his brow.

"They're starving me!" he cried; "they're starving me! They tell me that I killed her and her lover, curse them!—tied me here to starve! They've tied me in reach of the sharks. There, I see one now coming at me; he is turning now. Oh, save me! gracious God, save me from this horrible death! Mary, you do think better of me? What, Mary! let me strike her in the face, the wanton; let me kill her; she has come to mock me!"

And he was, for madness could have struck the poor weeping woman who clung beside him, had not Mackay and another sailor held him back.

"Mr. Mackay," she said, "for the love of Heaven, tell me if any one else but Watson has saved any food, and would give me only a mouthful for Donald! I may eat no more, but I have any hope?" (She said these last words in a whisper.)

"There is but little hope, Mrs. Cameron," said Mackay, in a low voice—"but little hope. We have no food, and unless we are picked up within hail within a few hours we must one by one be washed off in the first storm that rises."

Mr. Mackay asked the simple truth. Some, sullen with despair, and huddled together, cold and shivering, would not utter a word in reply. Others were fed. One man had had a bit of bread and meat he had found in his pocket when the shock occurred, and one he had eaten. Then Mr. Mackay shouted to Patterson and the boy.

"Not a crumb, Mr. Mackay," said Patterson. "The last piece of bread that I gave me I've wetted as I was in the land of Goshen, by which I meant Bethelem! I'll go, Mr. Mackay, food's no use now; it's but a short time we have to live!"

The boy shouted that he had two biscuits, but he meant to keep them.

"Go up and kill him," said Watson.

Mrs. Cameron threw herself on her knees.

"Mr. Mackay," she said, "I know you are generous and brave; you will help me to save Donald. I have a little waistcoat-case in a belt; that belt contains five thousand pounds of the owners' money. Offer the boy money for one of those biscuits."

Mackay took the belt, the captain all the while screaming, "I will not die! I will not die!" and sent them to murder me and steal my money! The sharks are waiting for me! I see their teeth glitter in the foam; they are close to me now; merciful God, save me, save me!"

"I only wish they had you light," growled Watson.

Mackay took the money, and held up half a dozen sovereigns to the boy, who leaned over and glared at the money.

"Ay, Sir," said he, "I'll give you six sovereigns for that biscuit.

"Go up and tear it from him," said Watson.

"Won't take it," said the boy. "There!"

"A dozen?"

"I wouldn't to keep my own life in. What use is money to me now, mister?"

"Twenty? Think of twenty pounds for a biscuit!"

"No, Mr. Mackay, it's not enough. I know the value of the grub; it'll keep me alive for a day.

"Fifty—fifty, Tom?"

"No; life's as dear to me as to you. I tell you I don't want to part with the biscuit."

"A hundred?" Mackay shook the belt.

"No; my life's dearer to me than the captain's is."

"Two hundred?"

"No."

"Five hundred?"

"No."

"Eight hundred?"

"No; but give me a thousand," shouted the boy sullenly, yet greedily, "and I'll take my chance of a vessel coming or not. Here it is; hand up the money. If I'm saved, I'll go home to London a rich man. Hoorah!"

"Bring down the biscuit."

"Yes, likely! and have you snatch it before I get the money. Not likely!"

Mackay, faint as he was, clambered slowly to where the boy lay tied to a spar, and angrily handing the money, received the biscuit.

"Ah, man," said Patterson, who was too weak to rise, "what did I say about the Siren? Didn't I always say there was no luck about her? A curse on her and she who named her! But no, no; I won't curse the bonny lady. Look at her, yonder, bless her! See, she's praying for us!"

"Mary," said Mackay—for danger seemed to render his naturally natural now—"Mary, there is the biscuit. Let me crush it into a paste with some salt-water, and give it poor Donald."

Mary wept for joy when she saw the food, pressed Mackay's hand, and crept toward the delirious man with the treasure.

But he pushed her savagely from him.

"No, he said, "no; it's poisoned. I heard you tell your lover there that you'd soon get rid of the old man. No, no; better die here."

Two of the sailors at last forced a little down the madman's throat; then he forgot his fears and ate it greedily.

Near sunset he grew worse. He fancied himself at the village church with Mary, and his own fireside. His last thoughts were of returning up the Clyde after a happy voyage.

"I have, Mary," he said, "been on the wharf. Look, there's Al Gaffog waving his hat to us, and M'Cook, too, is waving into a boat to come on board. Stand by the gangway there, some of you! But look now! why, the shore-lights are all gone out! I hear a bell striking. Where is Mary, where are you? There's something wrong on shore. Help! help! the vessel's sinking, Mary! Mary!"

Then he relapsed into a torpor, from which he never woke. At daybreak they found him dead. Mary's head resting upon his breast. She had become insensible from hunger and fatigue.

Mackay felt his heart: it still beat. Then he took her in his arms, and ordered the two strongest men among us to unshackle the captain's body and let it fall into the sea.

"He ought to have gone there a day sooner," said Wason; "he won't swell half so much now. If I loved a man's wife, I wouldn't so much care what became of the husband. But what matter, we shall none of us last another day."

"Who was that fell off in the night?" said Mackay to the miserable wretch whom no suffering could soften. Death was familiar to them now.

"It was that fool, Tom. Much good his thousand pounds did him," said Watson, very faintly, but still in his bitter way.

There were only six left alive now.

By the faint moving light of the third day Mackay saw that the miserable woman who lay by his side. She looked very beautiful in her sleep, calm and peaceful, as if sorrow never had shadowed her brow. Her glorious hair was dishevelled and entangled with the rigging. Mackay freed it with a knife's care. Then he gave love unutterable and hitherto repressed filling his heart.] Her eyes opened slowly, a smile of peace passed over her face. He pressed her hand softly and uttered her name.

"I am ready for death now," she said; "I'm ready to join Donald. I have been dreaming that he was calling me from heaven to join him."

"There is no help for us," said Mackay. "Mary, now in this our last hour let us recommend ourselves to God. All hope is gone."

She placed her hand calmly in his, and they prayed together fervently for a speedy passing of death. Then a faintness seized them, and they fell asleep. It was just then that Patterson above gave a faint cry of joy, but they heard him not.

IV.

English voices aroused them. English hands were unclasping them from the raging sea. An English vessel, the Swiftsure frigate, had seen the fragment of the wreck and its flying signals, and borne down to their help. It was a sight of careful nursing restored them to some reasonable strength. Mary Cameron, to Mackay's great joy, recovered quickly.

The first night of their convalescence Watson came to their cabin and drew him upon deck.

"Mackay," said he, "I see you'll marry that young widow, but I don't envy you. I look to more substantial prizes. Come, I want my share of that four thousand pounds in the captain's belt."

"That belt I shall restore to-morrow to Mrs. Cameron; it is none of mine."

"Two thousand pounds I mean to have, whether you choose or no. I want to start fair again after this cursed business."

"Then get the money if you can; I shan't help you in it. Is nothing to M'Gaffog and M'Cook, and to them it goes."

"Only Patterson, man, knows it has been saved; and we'll soon buy secrecy. You can't affect sanctity at your time of life. Come, let's share it, Jnl."

"Watson, I tell you once for all you mistake me. I shall surrender that money to-morrow."

"Then, Mackay, you shall repent it as sure as the sun rises, for that money I mean to have."

"Do your worst."

"I will do my worst, and bad it shall be."

And so, with mutual threat and defiance, the two men parted. The frozen snake had soon revived.

"Take care of that man," said Patterson; "he's a limb of Satan, and, depend upon it, he made that murderer fix upon the captain. He was always jealous of you. Aweel, aweel, the Siren was an unlucky craft for all of us."

In those long, burning days and those stormy nights, when the waves beat in drifts of white fire around us, and one by one the dying men let go their hold or died lashed to their places, one thought cheered me, one only," said Mackay in the evening to Mary Cameron, as they sat together watching the moon rising above the great sea-waves. "and that was Patterson's faith, while my heart still beat I could guard you, Mary."

The answer was a woman's answer—silence. But there was hope for Mackay even in that silence: there was for Mary Cameron a new heat in union; love was rising bright above their path.

Mackay would say no more then. At a future time, when her grief lessened, he would press his suit; for the love Mary Cameron bore Donald

At that moment the captain's boy ran up, and requested Mr. Mackay and Mrs. Cameron would come to the captain's cabin. They went, and found the chief officers assembled, and Watson sitting near them at a table. There was a malignant congression about his lips as they entered.

"Alexander Mackay," said the captain, "we rescued you five days ago from a situation of extreme peril. You had escaped from the wreck of the Siren incredible—cold, heat, hunger, thirst, and wreck. We rejoiced, as any Englishman would, that we had been the means of saving a fellow-man to us as first mate of the Siren, bound from Glasgow to Bonny for palm oil and gold dust. But I see no reason why you should have been found too, owing to the captain having rejected your services. You were, I am told, on the wreck when on the reef by accident, after having, by help of the woman whom we saved, murdered the captain, aided by this man, Patterson.

"That's a d——lie!" said Patterson, who was standing among the seamen.

"Silence there!" roared the first lieutenant.

"Four thousand pounds belonging to the last named you now have in possession. I am told that you say so to this charge? Do you deny that you have that money about you?"

"I do not deny it," said Mackay, boldly, pleasing Mrs. Cameron, who had fainted, on a seat, and giving her in charge of the chief officer, who had watched her with the intensest solicitude from the first moment of her coming on board, for the money. The rest of the story is the wicked invention of this man" (turning round to where Watson sat, in a position to conceal from the surface). "It was he who threatened me unless I shared the money with him. He is to tell you that I fear, of mine. Does this innocent woman look like an accomplice in a murder? Oh, captain, have mercy on her!" Mackay's voice could not yet be found to clear us of this charge, brought against us on the evidence of only one man."

"And he a man of character," said Patterson; "a regular limb of Satan, if ever there was one, and didn't I wish right heartily I had?"

"But still on this evidence I am bound to order the two men, Mackay and Patterson, to be placed in irons as suspected murderers of Captain Cameron, of the Siren merchant vessel, bound to Bonny. Further evidence will be taken under restraint."

"Still," said the doctor, who suddenly came forward, "that I might throw some little light on this case, and somewhat serve the prisoners. Let me ask a few questions?—Mr. Watson, were you ever at Cuba?"

"Never, sir."

"As I thought. Six years ago, captain, I was doctor on board the Xanta frigate, then stationed at Havannah, when a merchant vessel came in over to Cuba, and there visited the court of justice, just then occupied with the trial of Mark Jackson, a mulatto clerk, who had robbed and murdered the merchant who employed him. He was sentenced to be garrotted, but escaped, by bribing the guards the night before the execution."

While the doctor had been speaking a dreadful change had taken place in Mackay's face. He had turned white as a corpse, then livid, as if about to be pulled down with a fit.

"That man," said the doctor, suddenly turning round and pointing at Watson, "was the leader I had ventured to describe. You see in him not deny it. Can you, then, believe the wild accusation of such a man against his own companions, one of whom, indeed, charges him with having endeavored to persuade him to steal and scuttle the ship?"

"Arrest that man Watson," said the captain "as the evidence is sufficient to arrest either the other prisoners for the present."

But before he could be seized Watson, with a yell of madness, had drawn a long Spanish knife, and fought his way up the cabin stairs. Several seamen ran to strike him down, but before they could reach him the desperate fellow had thrown himself over the side of the vessel. As the men looked there was a shark in the water, and they saw Watson and fallen: one sidled scream; a mist of blood, and a frightful ravenous swirl in the water, ending for their prey; then a long trail of blood rose upon the waves that had closed over the murderer.

"These sharks were waiting for the rascal," said Patterson afterward; "that's as evident to me, Mr. Mackay, as if I saw it written in the sun. He had lived his time. He was wanted, eh, man? An inch sooner, and he'd have had his guilty in me. God be thanked for that escape!"

The innocence of Mackay and Mary Cameron was now evident. A year from that day Mackay and Mary Cameron were married. Messrs. M'Gaffog and M'Cash last year appointed Mackay captain of their largest vessel. Patterson goes out as his bootswain. There is not, as every one in Glasgow says, a more reliable captain in the merchant service than Alexander Mackay. After that time of bitter trouble the rainbow of peace had risen above Mary and her husband. They still often talk of that Sunday before the launching, when they both went to see the new vessel, and Patterson predicted evil of the ghostship the Siren, whose figure-head bore to great resemblance to the mysterious object of Mackay's admiration.

SURF-SWIMMERS.

CAPTAIN COOK, whose "Voyages" is now a book seldom read, gives the following spirited account of the surf-swimming of the Sandwich Islanders, which will not improbably be new to many of our younger readers: "The surf, which breaks on the coast round the bay, extends to the distance of about 150 yards from the shore, within which space the surges of the sea, accumulating from the impetuous flow of the water, are dashed against the beach with prodigious violence. However, from custom, or practice, or some peculiarity in the sense or the texture of the skin, the inhabitants of this country are so much accustomed to it, that they can, without any other assistance than a board, swim through it with the greatest ease, and even with safety. The method of doing this is as follows: Each man provides himself with a board, which is made in the figure of a long parallelogram, but rounded off at the ends, set out together from the shore. The first wave they meet they plunge under, and, suffering it to pass over them, rise again beyond it, and make the best of their way by swimming with both the hands. The second wave is commonly met in the same manner as the first, the great difficulty consisting in seizing the proper moment of diving under it. But the third wave the person is caught by the surf, and driven back again with great violence, and all his dexterity is then required to prevent himself from being dashed against the rocks. As soon as they have passed, as their expression is, the smooth water beyond the surf, they lay themselves at length on their board, and prepare for return. At the surf commists of a number of waves, of which every third is remarked to be always much larger than the others, and is called the king of the surf. The best seeking in the intermediate space, their first object is to place themselves on the summit of the largest wave of the third; they are driven along with amazing rapidity toward the shore. If by mistake they place themselves on one of the smaller waves which break up before they reach the land, or should not be able to keep their pleds in the proper direction on the top of the swell, they are left exposed to the fury of the next, and the whole of their labor is lost. But to get brea

From an Original Drawing by Mr. J. F.

of Munich, Bavaria.—[SEE PAGE 806.]

WAR TIME IN BAVARIA.

BAVARIA, the largest and most important of the South German states, was, until after the war of 1866, the firm ally of Austria, and her most influential support against the rivalry of Prussia; but with the humiliation of Austria at Sadowa popular sentiment in Bavaria underwent a sudden change. Court and people saw that it would be useless to struggle against the manifest destiny of Prussia, and the idea of forming a part of the new German empire projected by COUNT BISMARCK at length overwhelmed the unwilling Bavarians. Accordingly, when, owing to the expectations of NAPOLEON and his cabinet, Bavaria entered hostility upon the side of the defense of Germany against French aggression, and her troops have played an important part in the wonderful campaign that has laid prostrate the military power of the "grand nation." The siege of Strasburg was conducted by Bavarian soldiers.

To commemorate the share of this little kingdom in the war, we give our readers this week an admirable picture, drawn expressly for Harper's Weekly by MR. J. H. GOODWIN, a German now resident in Munich. But few words of explanation are necessary, as the picture tells its own story.

The large figure on the left, holding a wreath, is that of the famous "Bavaria," the colossal Schwanthaler statue, which overlooks the "Volksfest" grounds at Munich. It is ninety-five feet from the base of the pedestal to the highest reach, the statue itself being sixty-five feet in height. It was cast in bronze from cannon captured from the Turks. In the head of the figure is standing-room for several persons, and from loopholes hidden from view and security in the folds of the hair one may have fine views of the city, while in the distance loom up the picturesque forms of the Tyrolese Alps.

The other large figure is that of the Crown Prince of Prussia, the soldier-prince and hero whose steps already take hold on the future with fiery tread. He prefigures the destiny of his nation.

In the centre of the picture is a view of the Odeonsplatz, Munich, on which, at the Theatiner Church, the equestrian statue to LUDWIG I., of Bavaria, and various palaces and public edifices. The day our artist took his sketch flags were displayed throughout the city in honor of the surrender of Strasburg, and the Bavarian Jägers, who were leaving for the front, were marching through the Platz.

In the upper corners are suggestions of those whom mother age nor sex can exempt from the keenest miseries of war. Underneath, to the left, the Marian Platz, where people assemble to pray before the statue of MARY, and "Die Wacht am Rhein"—a realistic illustration, taken from the famous poem.

At the bottom of the picture War, in the shape of a hideous female fiend, gathers the vintage of 1870, and crushing the grapes in her hands, transmutes them into hayonets and bullets.

Scenes of quiet banner are not infrequent in Munich, two of which have been painted by our artist. Near the royal palace are some captured cannon that excite continual curiosity among the peasantry that come in from the country. The metropolitans especially are examined with wonder and awe. Some days squads of conscripts daily thronging into the city are many who seem to think going to the front a very unpleasant business, especially when they meet with wounded soldiers returning from the front, and listen to their stories of the awful struggles before Sedan and Metz.

HEAPING COALS OF FIRE.

TAKING revenge by heaping up coals of fire may be shown in many ways. Let us take one, by no means uncommon in a country town or home—that of excessive and exaggerated patience during and long after a temporary attack of illtemper on your part, and of an unrebuking obedience to your transient wishes, if they have been petulantly expressed. Most people, at times afflicted with peevish humors, and you are not exempt from the ordinary feelings of humanity. But your temper was temporary, and you are heartily ashamed of it, and sorry that you gave way to it as you did; and when it has passed, and you are again in your right mind, you wish for nothing so much as a candid oblation on both sides. You are ready to make any apology that may be needed, and you would hear meekly even an encouraging stinging if only it were in frank forgiveness and forgetfulness. But your cool-temper does not forgive, and can not forget, and takes great care that neither shall you. If you plunge head foremost into an apology, you are received with the loftiest, the most intimate expression of meekness and forbearance. "My dear," deprecatingly, "why say a word about it? I assure you I bear no ill-will." And next day, and I hope I shall have strength given me to do it; so may you be able to say, "Pooh with the addition, smiling plaintively, "Am I not accustomed to it?"

Another form of cool-heaping is an exaggerated attention to your hasty words. See you have found out by watching your wife or housekeeper, or something that has gone wrong in her special department; say even that, because of a temporary derangement of your health, with derangement of temper to correspond, the fault found was disproportionate to the offense committed; yet all you meant to inculcate was the necessity of a reasonable reform in a slight misdemeanor, and better ordering in some affair of minor importance. Your heaper-up of burning coals is determined that the reform shall be reasonable, and that in it its excess shall be your punishment. You have committed the offense of remonstrating against certain wastefulness in the home commissariat—something which has been absolutely wasteful, and quite beyond all harmony with your means; your cool-temper stints herself in elemental comforts, rigidly cuts herself off from her fried bacon at breakfast and her glass of wine at dinner, on the plea of your not being able to afford it; and if you remonstrate with her, and tell her she is ridiculous, she answers meekly that "you told her to keep down the bills, and she does not know in what else to retrench—as she is sure no one can keep house more economically than she does"—she has indeed, in this matter, the best of the situation. Another case makes you miss like Benjamin's, and redoubles your most aggressive sorrow, which may be just.

One great weapon of a woman in this kind of secret warfare, this heaping up of burning coals, is to pretend to be utterly lost for husband, and not only to carry to the extreme any wish he may have expressed, but to do it with a certain exaggeration of fear, as if he were the ogre of whom she was in mortal dread, though sweetly resigned to her fate all the same. As the ogre, a tyrant, whose good-will she seeks to propitiate by works of supererogation, all the while she is quivering with fear and anticipating the worst. The children play a large part in this special manner of cool-heaping. You are constantly in their power, but you do not think it necessary to give up all the gravity of life, the important cares, or even the pleasures. And you do not think it hurts them to be snubbed if they are troublesome, and put in their right place, but both ought to be horse whipped" he said, fiercely, interrupting me, "and no fear of your being cruel. I exaggerate to a boy like you—I will even go so far as to say a whipper-snapper like you—"

"A whipper-snapper, sir!" I cried.

"I repeat it, a whipper-snapper" cried old Rowley, becoming very red and apoplectic in appearance. "I decline to listen to your preposterous proposal for one instant. Clara, only you will grant the invitation, and I will not—be a mere child."

"But we shall both grow older, Mr. Rowley."

"Ah, and more sensible, I hope. Good morning."

"Good-morning, Sir."

I did not wait to tell him of my expectations from my grandmother, or to reason with him on his want of justice and consideration. I went away crest-fallen and heart-broken. I dashed down the library-door, and brought my fist forehead against that of my beloved with a concussion that was nearly the means of stretching our senseless bodies beside the tyrant's den, the victims of his cruel obduracy. Clara, naturally interested in the issue of my interview with her guardian, had forced her pate but anxious soul to listen at the library keyhole. I had retired from the field, and Clara had gone after.

"Oh, my gracious!" she sobbed forth; "I did not know you were coming out like that. Oh, my head! Oh, how dreadful! Oh, Alphonse, we must part forever!"

She had placed one hand on my shoulder, and shed many tears. I kissed away her tears; I patted her head fondly, hoping dear of her heart which I had raised there. I could scarcely see her goldenen hair for tears myself—the water had risen into my eyes immediately we had met each other. I sought to calm her emotion. I bade her be firm, and I recommended vinegar and brown paper for her damaged brow. I said that I should try them myself when I got home. I told her that I would go rather than submit to part; she said the same thing in a burst of uncontrollable emotion; we renewed our vows of eternal fidelity, and took ourselves from each other's arms, confused in spirit, but strong yet to resist unjust oppression.

I told all my troubles to my friends, my bosom friend and adviser. Jack and I had been school-fellows together; we were going into the same profession together presently: my father had resolved that I should walk the hospitals in advance of the bar, and Jack had a fine taste in story, and said that he would not have stood half of old Rowley's nonsense; but what he would have done with the circumstances he did not impart to me at the time, and I forgot to ask him afterward.

Clara and I met clandestinely. We were lovers; we had been lovers from our youth: the thirty bored Rowley, whom he had outlived, and all passion was not to stand between our fresh young souls.

I met Clara in the village; I scaled the park fence, and met her in the green wood: and Jack, my friend, kept watch on the door of the Hall and old Rowley's library windows with a telescope, lest the old tyrant should get an inkling of the event. Clara and I passed much of our time talking of what we should do when she came of age, and could inherit her own, and her grandmother favored me by departing from this earthly scene. That is a story we always winter, and our teeth chattered over our prospects. Jack and I used to arrange our meetings in this wise. Clara had a governess, the same keeper, Peter Simcox, an invaluable man, with a weakness for tobacco, and with a heart of adamant toward his fellowcreatures. Peter was always getting up memorials for his fellow-creatures in the village; and Clara, with his weakness for tobacco—I kept him entirely in tobacco—my pocket-money have had Peter's heart. Still he had a good heart, and was kind to us. He took charge of our correspondence, which was carried on by a circumlocutory but sure process. Clara gave it to her maid Selina, another confidante—who, alas! proved herself a perfidious snake—and Selina intrusted it to Peter, who took it to a guarded monarch of the forest—an oak-tree in fact—and concealed it from all human gaze in a small hollow cavity some ten feet from the ground, where, at a later hour, I found it, and deposited my answer, to be conveyed by the same process and my dearest Clara's hands.

He had given an awful cough of a double-knock character, that was all. He kept his glasses on his nose, and forsaid me, and the operation was unpleasant. He was not pleasant in his reception of my statement either; he was decidedly unpleasant, not to say desperately disagreeable. But then he was a cross, ill-grained old fellow; every body knew it in Wolvesham, and I have no particular reason to disguise it here.

I recommenced my statement; I poured forth the best feelings of my heart, and with an eloquence that I am sure would astound me if I confessed to him that Clara was my one ambition. As I have said already, I knew that it was no use with me, and I had a poetic eye in the midst of my despairing consciousness.

Mr. Rowley, who had his newspaper, drew his chair an inch or two closer to me, put his great hands—rather disposed to be gouty like his feet—upon his knees, and surveyed me from head to foot contemptuously.

"Mr. Jack your age, young man?" he said.

This was my weak point of defense, but I told him.

"Seventeen."

"And how did you first become acquainted with my Clara, who is a year your junior, the 17th of—"

"Well, Mr. Rowley, it has been a long acquaintance. My holiday school at Beechborough was situated opposite her finishing school, and we saw each other at church; and I think—"

"Upon the whole, that you ought to be horsewhipped" he said, fiercely, interrupting me, "and no fear of your being cruel. I exaggerated to a boy like you—I will even go so far as to say a whipper-snapper like you—"

"A whipper-snapper, Sir!" I cried.

"I repeat it, a whipper-snapper" cried old Rowley, becoming very red and apoplectic in appearance. "I decline to listen to your preposterous proposal for one instant. Clara, only you will grant the invitation, and I will not—be a mere child."

"But we shall both grow older, Mr. Rowley."

"Ah, and more sensible, I hope. Good morning."

"Good-morning, Sir."

I did not wait to tell him of my expectations from my grandmother, or to reason with him on his want of justice and consideration. I went away crest-fallen and heart-broken. I dashed down the library-door, and brought my fist forehead against that of my beloved with a concussion that was nearly the means of stretching our senseless bodies beside the tyrant's den, the victims of his cruel obduracy. Clara, naturally interested in the issue of my interview with her guardian, had forced her pate but anxious soul to listen at the library keyhole. I had retired from the field, and Clara had gone after.

"Oh, my gracious!" she sobbed forth; "I did not know you were coming out like that. Oh, my head! Oh, how dreadful! Oh, Alphonse, we must part forever!"

She had placed one hand on my shoulder, and shed many tears. I kissed away her tears; I patted her head fondly, hoping dear of her heart which I had raised there. I could scarcely see her goldenen hair for tears myself—the water had risen into my eyes immediately we had met each other. I sought to calm her emotion. I bade her be firm, and I recommended vinegar and brown paper for her damaged brow. I said that I should try them myself when I got home. I told her that I would go rather than submit to part; she said the same thing in a burst of uncontrollable emotion; we renewed our vows of eternal fidelity, and took ourselves from each other's arms, confused in spirit, but strong yet to resist unjust oppression.

I told all my troubles to my friends, my bosom friend and adviser. Jack and I had been school-fellows together; we were going into the same profession together presently: my father had resolved that I should walk the hospitals in advance of the bar, and Jack had a fine taste in story, and said that he would not have stood half of old Rowley's nonsense; but what he would have done with the circumstances he did not impart to me at the time, and I forgot to ask him afterward.

Clara and I met clandestinely. We were lovers; we had been lovers from our youth: the thirty bored Rowley, whom he had outlived, and all passion was not to stand between our fresh young souls.

I met Clara in the village; I scaled the park fence, and met her in the green wood: and Jack, my friend, kept watch on the door of the Hall and old Rowley's library windows with a telescope, lest the old tyrant should get an inkling of the event. Clara and I passed much of our time talking of what we should do when she came of age, and could inherit her own, and her grandmother favored me by departing from this earthly scene. That is a story we always winter, and our teeth chattered over our prospects. Jack and I used to arrange our meetings in this wise. Clara had a governess, the same keeper, Peter Simcox, an invaluable man, with a weakness for tobacco, and with a heart of adamant toward his fellowcreatures. Peter was always getting up memorials for his fellow-creatures in the village; and Clara, with his weakness for tobacco—I kept him entirely in tobacco—my pocket-money have had Peter's heart. Still he had a good heart, and was kind to us. He took charge of our correspondence, which was carried on by a circumlocutory but sure process. Clara gave it to her maid Selina, another confidante—who, alas! proved herself a perfidious snake—and Selina intrusted it to Peter, who took it to a guarded monarch of the forest—an oak-tree in fact—and concealed it from all human gaze in a small hollow cavity some ten feet from the ground, where, at a later hour, I found it, and deposited my answer, to be conveyed by the same process and my dearest Clara's hands.

Peter was a lank old man, and very wiry; he could climb a tree like a squirrel, and I was agile myself. The whole conception was romantic, if you will, but grand! I thought so, Clara thought so. Peter thought so. The idea was from Milton's picture, which we had both carefully studied; and if Peter had not generally deposited his small notes to myself at the same time, asking my "kind consideration, as a gentleman born with a warm heart, to an affecting case in the parish," the romantic would have been quite unalloyed.

Clara defied the obdurate guardian for two months; it was February when the meetings betrayed us. I was advancing, in an innocent and unsuspecting manner, to the secret post-office of Peter Simcox, a mile from the Rowley House, when I became conscious of the whole perfidy. I was close upon the tree—the tree of the oak which had held so many secrets—when voices in another direction filled my soul with horror. They were the voices of Samuel Rowley, Esq., J.P., and Peter Stokes, my Mercury. I sank down in the long grass—there was no rapid thought that morning, and the dump struck to me at once—and trembled for my love. I was not an unsuccessful lover; their footsteps became me. Mr. Rowley's right foot was nearly upon me also; he shared my features by a hair's breadth, and passed on. In the hollow part of his cane was my sacs an instant afterward.

"You don't consider yourself an abominable scamp, I suppose," Mr. Rowley said, "an unprincipled old vagabond, to act as a go-between to a silly young girl and that idiot Jack Ash?" You never thought of the harm of encouraging this, did you?"

"I'm worry sorry, Sir," whimpered Peter.

"Teaching my ward to be deceitful for the sake of a few shillings, I suppose?"

"I've never had a ha'penny, your honor, much more a shillyun."

Neither had he. They were generally half crowns he was in the habit of receiving from me.

"You deserve to be kicked out of the village, Stokes—drummed out of the village, for a wicked old hypocrite."

"They was worry fond of each other, Sir, and Miss Clara used to ask me so beseeching; and I felt sure that her uncle was hard in writing to Master Huskinson without her dear guidewan's knowing any think about it, the elders said it was for the best time, so—really."

"If it was not for your age, Stokes, I'd send you about your business this very day."

"I'm worry sorry, Sir," Stokes said again, shedding many tears.

"Is this the tree?"

"Yes, Sir, that's the tree."

"Then I'll take a last letter is up there now, eh? In that hole? Now no more lies!"

"Yes, Sir, in that hole."

"And how did you get at it?"

Master Huskinson climbs up there, Sir, for his answers, and fetch down Miss Clara's letter in a mint."

There was a small epistle of his own he wished to destroy, I think, perhaps; or it was possible that his noble mind had suggested some scheme to him to secure Clara's missive from prying eyes. But Mr. Rowley suspected this old survivor.

"Stop where you are, Stokes!" he roared forth; "I'll have no more of your monkey tricks. Give me that letter."

"Give you a vot, Sir?"

"Send your back, you rascal, and I'll jump on it, and you'll like better to-night."

"Jump on it!" repeated Stokes, with a look of dismay at Mr. Rowley's portly figure; "it don't strike me that I can bear your weight, master."

"It will be only for a minute," said Mr. Rowley, with a chuckle; "and if I break your back, it will serve you right enough. I'm not an elephant, man, and I will have no more of this nonsense."

Mr. Stokes resisted no further. He made his back as if desirous to commune with the ground, lying with a justice of the peace; and, with more agility than I had given Mr. Rowley credit for, he ascended the tree, and, after within an ace two of our letter-box.

"Now, Sir, I shall you be long, Sir?" asked Mr. Stokes, groaning softly to himself.

"Raise your shoulder, you rascal, a little more," said the employer.

Stokes did so, and from my hiding-place I saw the heavy foot of Rowley—his wife some difficulty—for it was a fat, gouty hand—have already sold—to force itself into that casket, which had contained so many of dear Clara's epistles. Samuel Rowley was an excitable man; for he swore a little in his efforts, and turned very red, and moved his feet restlessly upon Stokes's back.

"I have got it!" he cried at last. "The artful jade—the cunning, plotting little minx, to serve her own guardian in this— Oh!"

"What's the matter, Sir?"

"Wait a moment, Stokes—don't shake. Oh, he, have mercy upon us! Oh, damn it! Oh, fear, what is to be done?"

"In any think particuler the matter, Sir? Not broken, I hope, or a nest of serpents, or any think?" and old Stokes hid his head a little more screwed in his tipsyaway we called at school—to conceal his laughing and sardonic countenances.

"No, Stokes; it's something much worse, I'm sorry to say."

"Wus, Sir?" said Stokes, who left off laughing immediately.

"Yes; I—I can't get my hand out!"

"The devil you can't, Sir!" cried Stokes, in dismay.

"It's twisted somehow, or swollen, or the wood has gripped me. Wait a moment, Stokes—Oh, he, it's all up with me! I can't!"

"Take it quiet, Sir. Keep cool or you'll never do it—don't hurry yourself; but for God's sake look sharp. I'm a-cracking."

"Don't move, Stokes—as you owe a man, don't move! If you move to drop, I can not imagine what would become of me. It will be all right in a minute."

"Make it less, if you can," groaned Stokes; "all the blood's got into my head, orful. Oh, lor, what is to be done? Are you out, Sir?"

"No, I'm not; I'm fixed, Stokes. I'm a dead man if you move. I am indeed."

Stokes burst into tears, and howled with all his might; and Mr. Rowley shouted a great deal, and swore a great deal too. Stokes's howls first run for it, probably, for he was succumbing fast to the dead weight above him, had not Mr. Rowley held him by the throat with his boots, and fixed him too. In another moment I had sprung to my feet, and was rending the door open.

"I am really very sorry, Mr. Rowley; can I be of any assistance?"

"Assistance, you—you—young dev—! Yes, you can, my dear child. Run for a ladder, and a saw, or something, as quick as lightning, to the house."

"Hi—hi—hollo!" shrieked Stokes, as I prepared to obey Mr. Rowley's commands. "Don't run; come here, and let me run, or beat up I must! Oh, lor, Master Huskisson, don't leave me any longer—do come and take a turn. He's not so heavy when you're used to him—he isn't indeed."

I saw the necessity of advancing to the rescue at once, and so did Mr. Rowley. I was tall for my age and tolerably strong, and, I flattered to take the place of Mr. Stokes, which I did with great exertion on all sides. Behold me at last hearing the guardian of Clara on my shoulders, and feeling terribly the weight of my responsibility as he stood with his face to the tree, still endeavoring his ingenuity to get his hand out of the trap.

"I hope it may not too heavy for you, Master Huskisson," he condescended to say, politely, for the sight of me was even pleasant to witness.

"Not at all," was my cheerful answer. "You'll make yourself as light as you can to oblige me, perhaps?"

I had not quite done growing, and man is fragile during that process. Mr. Rowley was very heavy, and Stokes was wrong in his observation—wickedly wrong.

"This is all your fault, mind you, Huskisson. This might have been my death," he said, reproachfully.

"Yes, Mr. Rowley, if I hadn't been in the way," was my happy rejoinder.

"Ah! but"—he looked round with difficulty, and found Stokes still there, making every human effort to straighten his back before flying on his mission. "Come it, Stokes, you're not the life—don't stand there, you wretched lunatic, another instant!"

Stokes ran away, and I was left as the one support of Mr. Rowley. Stokes had not been gone more than a minute and a half, when I wished that he had remained and shared the weight with me. I tried to keep firm, but the difficulty was immense.

"Boy, you're giving; Don't shake so. Keep yourself more against the tree," Mr. Rowley called down.

"All right. I'll do it for Clara's sake, if it's possible: but I'm giving."

Then I remembered that he had called me a whipper-snapper; and so did he, too, I think, and was sorry.

"Oh, you'll keep up," he said, offering me every encouragement in his power. "You're a big boy for seventeen, and I'm only nine stone ten—not a great weight. I've seen you at exercises do like a kind of thing for hours, you know."

It was a gross exaggeration, and I felt it to be one. I was getting faint also. I had breakfast on too much; and his language at times was still violent, as he endeavored to extricate his hand.

"If I should die, Sir," I said, feebly, "will you please give my love to Clara? And that I did all I could to bear up—and to bear you up. Oh dear! Did you say nine stone ten?"

"I did."

"I should have thought you had been nine-ty," I murmured.

"You're giving!" he roared again, with a vehemence that revived me. "Keep up a little longer, my dear boy. I can hear Stokes coming in the distance."

Which was another falsehood; but no matter. Mr. Rowley was not a truthful man. I set myself firmly against the tree, according to his instructions, but it was of no avail. I felt, in a few more minutes, would slide gracefully away from me, I was certain, and the greatest pain that Clara would be swinging about by one arm, like an early Christian martyr. His blood would be on my head, and I would be, if I came down with his whole weight—perhaps armless—on the top of me.

"Keep up!" he cried, in a great fright now. "You shall see Clara when you like, my boy. I will not say a word against the match any more. You're a fine, strapping, brave fellow, that you are—a young Hercules!"

"Thank you, Mr. Rowley," I answered; and his words did sustain me a little, and helped me to sustain him.

But I was sliding, slowly but surely, from under his feet when assistance arrived—men with ladders and saws and chisels; and Stokes, too, wild with fright, and with tears streaming down her cheeks.

"Oh, my poor gardy!" she cried. "Oh, you wicked Alphonse! it's all your dreadful fault."

This was the last feather on the camel's back. I fell forward, and a grand rush of the servants at Mr. Rowley's legs only saved the gentleman from summary dislocation on the spot. He was got down with difficulty; and once down he was not grateful.

"A pretty fool you have made of me!" he said to Clara as he walked away rubbing his wrist; "and a pretty pair of fools you and that boy are, too!"

Still, after all, he was not so bad as I had expected to find him. He was a man who kept his word, and for that I have always respected old Rowley. Clara and I saw each other in a more rational manner. I went to the Hall once or twice; she was at my house on my eighteenth birthday, at a little party which my mamma absurdly called "juvenile" in the invitations; and there Jack Edwards was too attentive to Clara, and raised a jealous feeling in my breast.

I went to London shortly afterward. Clara and I were to be engaged when I passed, and if we were of the same mind, her guardian said. But we were not. While I was walking the hospitals a letter from her arrived, breaking off with Clara, and I do not think she resisted in the least.

It was an excellent match, though he was forty-seven, and very stout. I went down to the wedding, and returned thanks at the breakfast for the bridesmaids, one of whom has promised to be mine when I set up in business for myself.

MARGUERITE.

TENDROM silent watches of the night,
From dewy eve till morning's light,
I sigh for her, the fair, the bright,
Who never more will gaze on me.
Sweet Marguerite!

By sea and shore, by wood and wold,
By haunted river and mountain old,
By moss-grown beech, whose aged boughs
Their russet garb of green unfold,
Dear Marguerite!

I trace her footsteps' gentle tread,
Her path amid the poppies red;
And still I hear the words she said—
"They'll bloom above me when I'm dead."
Poor Marguerite!

The joyous voice, whose mellow fall
Made music in the ancient hall,
That sang like linnet on the wall,
And shed a lustre over all—
Fond Marguerite!

Now, where the elms their branches throw
Athwart the sliding streamlet low,
Where star-of-Bethlehem bud and blow,
My soul's ideal sleeps below—
Lost Marguerite!

A MYSTERIOUS LODGER.

IN one of the circumnavigating streets which curve to a general focus in the vicinity of that famous tavern, the Elephant and Castle, there stands an old-fashioned and rather stately looking house, which, from a strange contrast to the hosts of busy yet grubby-looking little shops in its immediate neighborhood.

The building, though old, is yet in good repair, and has probably been the suburban residence of some city alderman a century or two ago, when Kennington Butts was a place of resort on high-days and holidays for London apprentices and their sweet-hearts. It has the appearance of having been made use of subsequently as a warehouse; but it appears to be shut up, and only partially inhabited. The occupants of the two or three tenanted rooms to it are an old lady who acts as housekeeper to the proprietor of the building, and as put in with a view of exhibiting its capabilities to any intending tenant; and her son, a bank-clerk, a fine, well-conducted young fellow of five-and-twenty.

It was Christmas-eve, and Mrs. Marsden and her son were sitting comfortably at their tea, the hour being half past seven.

The widow was a cosy, plump-looking body, midway between fifty and sixty, dressed in the neatest of black stuff gowns, and the whitest of net caps; and as she handed the plate of toast for the second time, with a well-aimed nod, over a ring or two sparkled, she did so with a comfortable motherly smile that would have won any one's heart. The old lady's figure had held a good position in the Costean-house, and with her widow's dower and her son's salary of £100 a year, besides living rent-free, the pair were very comfortably off. Mrs. Marsden kept one servant-of-all-work, to whom she was tenderly indulgent; and altogether no happier little community existed than that which occupied the top floor, including, deserted old house.

"Your Aunt Barbara's sent us a picture of a turkey, Harry dear," said the lady, as, replacing her son's tea-cup with great complacency ("Aunt Barbara" was a farmer's wife in the country); "and we missed the pudding myself, and made plenty of mince-pies: and if your friends don't get themselves into a fix, I'm pleased, that's all."

"Oh, no fear of that, mother. I defy any body to beat your cookery. What tea you do make, too!" he said, sipping his cup. "And as to living—why, bless you, mother, you're worth all the 'girls of the period' in creation!"

The old lady had two weak points: the one was her cookery, the other that she should be considered "to carry her years well;" so she put on quite a Mrs. Nickleby air of self-satisfaction as she said,

"Well, my dear, as to that, though I don't pretend to be young, I do of the good old-fashioned style—"

"No doubt at all of it," put in Harry, archly.

"And my mince-pies were considered by Mr. Bloxam, your poor dear father's uncle—"

"My dear mother, don't I say so?" interrupted the young man, who had heard the story of Mr. Bloxam and the mince-pies about five hundred and fifty-five times.

"Now, Harry," returned his mother, in an injured tone, "why do you interrupt—"

But at that moment a cab drove up, with the intention so peculiar to London drivers, whether or in West End thoroughfare or a Borough bystreet, and so terrific a knocking ensued on the closed shutters of the old house that the empty rooms echoed again with it.

"Bless me, my dear!" cried Mrs. Marsden, turning pale, "An express come to say your poor Aunt Barbara's dead!"

"Nonsense, mother!" said the young man, who was nevertheless a little pale himself.

"Dear, dear!" suggested the old lady; "perhaps the bank's on fire?"

Henry Marsden, recovering from his first surprise, rose to ascertain the truth, sensibly thinking that the easiest way of solving the question. But he was interrupted by the hasty entrance of the maid-of-all-work in considerable trepidation.

"Lor, ma'am! here's a gent and lady as wants to take the house—leastways part of it—"

"What, at this time of night?" exclaimed Mrs. Marsden, indignantly.

"Yes'm, and he's as ferogious a looking gent as ever—"

Here a loud impatient voice demanded from without, in angry tones, "Are we to be kept waiting in the street all night?"

Young Marsden hurried out with the light, and to his surprise found the passage already blocked up with piles of luggage, while the cabman, after the unconcerned manner of his species, was about to proceed to package with a celerity which threatened shortly to prevent ingress and egress altogether.

The young man at first felt inclined to resent this cool assumption that the house was necessarily at the disposal of the new-comers; but happening to observe the beautiful and delicate-looking girl who was leaning wearily on the arm of a tall, dark, fierce, and hotly-heated man of middle age, he refrained, and said, as mildly as he could under the certainly provoking circumstances,

"Excuse me, Sir, but we have not come to terms yet."

"Terms!" thundered the other, scowling. "Aren't you the letter of rooms?"

"Oh, George!" remonstrated the young lady, looking appealingly at the speaker.

"Annie! I tell you of rooms, I say!" asked the visitor again.

Henry Marsden felt his wrath getting the better of him; but an imploring look from the young lady caused him to say, quietly,

"If you please, have I any apartments to let, Sir. I certainly have; but—"

"What apartments?"

"A drawing-room suit, dining-parlor, kitchen, and four bedrooms," replied Henry Marsden, carefully. "But we did not at all fancy his would be lodger."

"What rent?"

"Twenty guineas a week," said the young man, hoping, as he afterward told his mother, by the largeness of the demand "to sell off the old brute.

The visitor paused a moment, evidently surprised; then he said,

"I take them—I take them all."

Marsden, Jr., almost quite light Marsden could see was crammed with bank-notes, and which made the cabman's eyes glisten. "Then I'll trouble you for the five-pound notes, and giving them to young Marsden, said, haughtily,

"Here, Jane, you can send up the change and the receipt in the morning."

Marsden bowed. There was nothing for it but to obey him. It was quite evident this man was accustomed to be obeyed.

The last luggage was carried to the cabman: "Half a sovereign for you to bring these boxes up stairs."

"I'll do it, Sir, if there was twice as many on 'em!" cried the delighted driver. "Lord, he pays like a lord!"

Marsden called for the servant-of-all-work to show the way. Then he said, respectfully,

"Shall I help you into my mother's parlor, Sir, until a fire is lighted up stairs?"

"No, I am not cold."

"At least, the young lady—"

"The young lady will do nothing of the sort, Sir," cried the lodger. Then aside savagely to the girl, "Don't stand staring at that young fellow. Follow me;" and he strode up the stairs.

The lady lingered behind him for an instant, and threw a timid, piteous and appealing glance at the young landlord that, as Harry Marsden subsequently declared, he then and there lost his heart.

"I'll send my mother up in ten minutes," he whispered.

"Thank you, thank you!" she said, hurriedly, and sped up the old oak staircase.

The young man gazed after her a moment, as if he scarcely knew whether he were awake or dreaming; and then turned abruptly into his mother's parlor.

Mrs. Marsden sat by the fire in visible perturbation, with both curiosity and anxiety depicted on her comely face. She had heard the altercation in the house, and had been afraid of the consequences thereof on her son's somewhat fiery temperament. Moreover, she wondered greatly that she—she, the presiding authority in the house—had not been referred to in the matter. Therefore, as the door opened, she turned eagerly to her son:

"Law, Harry dear! whatever is it all about?"

"She's an angel, mother!" said the young man, enthusiastically.

"She! who, my dear?" asked the bewildered matron.

"Oh, I forget," he returned, relieving a little. "She—that is, they—have taken the rooms."

"Who are they?"

"Ah! that's what I should like to know. An ugly foreign-looking brute and his daughter, I suppose. And yet, no! she called him 'George.' She wouldn't call her father 'George,' you know."

"Of course not."

"He called her 'Marietta.' Isn't that a pretty name, mother?"

"Yes, dear. But I want to know more about these people."

"I declare I've told you all I know, mother, except that he paid the first week's rent in advance. And here it is;" and he placed the bank-notes in his mother's hand.

"Why, Harry, are you mad?" she exclaimed.

"You've given me twenty-five pounds!"

"I asked twenty guineas," he said, drumily, "and we're to give change in the morning."

"Twenty guineas, my dear boy? and the landlord told me to ask four!"

"I know it, mother; but I didn't like the look of the brute, and wanted to get rid of him. So I asked a price I thought would stop him."

"Well?"

"Well, bless you! he just scowled at me for a moment, and then agreed to it directly."

"Law!"

"And then stalked up the stairs as if the whole house belonged to him."

"Bless me!"

"Ah, bless me, indeed! I can't make head or tail of the matter."

"But, my dear, we can't take twenty guineas a week for rooms only worth four. It's not honest, and can't be."

"Well, what's to be done?"

"I'm sure I don't know," cried the old lady in strong perplexity.

"Well, we must think it over to-night, mother, and see what's to be done in the morning."

"Yes, yes."

"And now, mother, please to go and see that all is made comfortable for the young lady, as I said you should do."

"Oh, of course, my dear!" and she went.

Mrs. Marsden ascended the old staircase in rapidity in which my figure would allow her to do, and tapped somewhat timidly at the principal sitting-room, the only suit allotted for new lodgers. A gruff "Come in!" was the answer to her knock, and she entered.

There was a very handsome set of rooms, hung with red damask; but the walls were discolored and the furniture with huge dingy blotches, choking smoke which filled the apartments did not add to their comfort, and in spite of all her efforts to the contrary, Mrs. Marsden felt like a violent fit of coughing.

The maid-of-all-work was on her knees, nervously endeavoring to coax a stubborn fire to show some signs of flame. On the hearth-rug beside her stood the new-comer, evidently at her to no measured terms. His fine, stalwart figure was drawn up to its full height, and with his head bent, gleaming white teeth, and fierce black eyes, he was no bad embodiment of Mephistopheles. Mrs. Marsden afterward declared that the first sight of him "gave her the horrors, and made her feel quite all of a creep."

The man, a big, half bloating, in a large old-fashioned red damask-covered fauteuil, the cruinsheen of which contrasted vilely with his shoddy fashionable dress, which had fallen loose upon one arm of it, was a fair girl of not more than twenty, who, with her head thrown aside the numerous wraps in which she had previously been enveloped, it could be seen that she was richly and expensively dressed. A robe of costly blue silk, trimmed with fine, soft black lace, and a black velvet mantle of the same description and if her companion was no inapt representative of Mephistopheles, she might herself have been the original of Marguerite. Poor Mrs. Marsden even, with her throat filled with smoke and her eyes full of tears with vexation at the fire, could not help noticing with admiration the expression of loveliness opposite her.

"I don't wonder Harry called her an angel," she thought; "but, Lord save us, how like that man is to Sir Giles Shrewd!"

Then she busied herself in setting right the matches which the inexperienced maid-of-all-work, superintending the poor young woman's efforts with kindly and reassuring voice.

"Soon coal, Maggie; it is all that coal that makes the smoke."

"Smoke!" interposed the gentleman, irascibly. "It smokes like the funnels of ten thousand infernal steamboats!"

The girl went down directly, Sir," said Mrs. Marsden, mildly. "And you, my dear madam, pray let me show you to a bedroom where there is a fire, and you can refresh yourself before supper."

The young lady half rose, and looked at the gentleman, who nodded a gruff assent.

"That'll do, Maggie," said Mrs. Marsden; "the fire's drawing nicely now." Then turning to her lodger: "You would like tea and supper as soon as possible, I suppose, Sir?"

He relaxed somewhat of his moroseness, and said, with a courteous bow,

"If you please, ma'am."

"Very well, Sir. You shall have a fowl, eggs, cold, and tea in half an hour, if you please, ma'am."

And she gave the necessary orders to Maggie, who departed, apparently nothing loth to be rid of the presence of the dark-looking lodger.

"Oh, my! ain't he a Tartar, just!" she said, as she went down stairs, resolving to "show him up," as she called it, to her "young man" the next Sunday.

Mrs. Marsden addressed the young lady:

"Now, ma'am—or should I say miss?"

"Say ma'am, please," said the young lady, faintly.

"If you will follow me, there's a fire in the Yellow Room, and I'll have one made ready as soon as possible for your papa."

The gentleman colored furiously, and looked like a thunder-cloud, as he said, in a voice whose tones resembled the growling of a bull-dog,

"The lady is my wife, ma'am!"

"Oh, law! Bless me! I'm sure I ask pardon," cried the poor old lady, startled out of her propriety. "By what name shall I call you, please, Sir?"

"Call me Monsieur Moira. That lady is Madame Moira."

"And what—"

But the lodger's patience was exhausted.

"Get out, you chattering, cross-examining old fool!" he cried, in a towering fury. "I and you, Mariette, don't answer any of the prying idiot's questions!" And he turned and poked the fire savagely.

In great consternation Mrs. Marsden made signs to Madame Moira to follow her, and bent a precipitate retreat from the apartment.

Having shown her guest to a small bedroom in which a cherry fire was burning, she furnished her with every requisite of the toilet, Mrs. Marsden descended again to her parlor, and to the society of her son.

"They'll never do for us, my dear, n-e-v-e-r!" she said, shaking her head in an aggrieved fashion.

"I don't think they will, mother; but what now?"

"Fancy, Harry—that brute called me 'a chattering old fool!'"

"How dare he!" exclaimed the young man, indignantly, and yet hardly able to help laughing.

"He's a gruesome man," continued the old lady; "and I declare, my dear, the whole affair put me in mind of one of those fairy stories of enchanted castles I used to read when I was a girl."

"Does it?"

"Yes, of a grim demon, or baron, or something, carrying off a lovely young girl, and locking her up in the turret-chamber of some horrible trouble-down place till she promised to marry him."

"Ah! I don't think this young lady 'll ever promise that."

"But, my dear boy, she has."

A thrill of disappointment shot through young Marsden as he said,

"Why, what do you mean, mother?"

"She has married him—she's his wife."

"Impossible!"

"Oh no, dear, not impossible. He said so, and so did she, also."

The young man groaned slightly.

Then he said, suddenly,

"Mother dear, there's something very strange in all this."

"All what, Harry?"

"Why, in people tumbling into lodgings at this time of night, paying twenty guineas a week, like dirt for rooms not worth five, without a murmur, and bringing all that luggage without a single servant."

"My dear, people often take lodgings suddenly."

"But don't pay four times their value."

"No," said the old lady, hesitating; "I don't think they often do that."

"Not they! And then, if that man's her husband—"

"Well, Harry, young girls often marry men much older than themselves."

"So they do. But young ladies of her evident rank and wealth don't travel about without a lady's-maid. Why, you can see she is not used to wait upon herself."

"That's true."

"Then what dread she has of him!"

"Well, my dear, that is no argument at all. Some violent men do frighten their wives, you know, without actually ill-treating them. Nor, even your poor dear father—"

"Yes, yes, mother; I know father had a hot temper, and so, for the matter of that, have I. But then, he never ill-used you."

"Of course not."

"And I have never ill-used you."

"My dear child, what are you thinking of?"

"Whereas," continued the young man, "this poor girl shrank and trembled when her husband looked at her."

"My dear boy, that is no proof of bodily ill-treatment. I don't suppose he beats her."

"Beats her!—beats that superb creature!"

"Well, my dear, I don't suppose he does."

"But the mere thought of such a horrible thing! Did he tell you his name, mother?"

"Yes—Monsieur Monsieur and Madame Moira."

"That sounds like a Portuguese name."

"Is it?"

"Yes, or Spanish."

"Oh, law, Harry, I hope they're not Spanish!"

"Why, mother?"

"Oh, because the only Spanish lady I ever knew—such a lovely creature, with a black lace veil tied over her head, you know, and all that—"

"Yes, yes, I know."

"Well, my dear, she was stabbed by her husband in a fit of jealousy, poor thing."

"This man certainly seems all that."

"All what?"

"Jealous."

"How do you know?"

"Why, mother, he scowled at me because I asked if his wife would come in here and warm herself."

"Did he?"

"Did he! The man's a veritable Othello."

Here the lull rang violently half a dozen times, and Mrs. Marsden bustled into the kitchen to help Maggie in the dishing up of the supper.

Harry Marsden lighted his pipe, and sat with his feet on the fender, lost in deep reverie, until his mother returned.

Christmas morning broke cold and frosty, but with that indescribable foggy haze nowhere seen save in London and only there in autumn and winter.

Mrs. Marsden and her son were early risers, and unusually so on this particular morning; for, not only were the comforts of the new lodgers to be seen to, but several of young Marsden's fellow-clerks had been invited to join the old party's dinner-table, and she had much to do before she could don her best silk dress for church.

It was, therefore, but a little after seven when the lion-keeper and her son were seated at their early breakfast, and the Christmas pudding had already been put on the fire to receive its finishing touches (for it had been partially boiled days previously). Maggie was below, cheerily chirping a Christmas song while she moved amidst the pots and pans: for the new lodgers were not to breakfast until half past nine, and the little maid-of-all-work had not yet gone up stairs to arrange their sitting-room.

Mrs. Marsden, supping her coffee, was (after her usual fashion on Christmas morning) recording to her son a host of reminiscences of her earlier days—now regretfully recalling some past recollection, now cheerily laughing over some pleasant memory. There are many persons besides old ladies who have this habit of looking back to the past on the anniversary of great festivals; and, indeed, Christmas-day is an important station on the road of life for us all.

The mother and son, having slightly alluded to the festivities of the coming evening, had discussed the new lodgers, but could come to no resolution concerning them.

"It is rather awkward they should have come just now," said Mrs. Marsden. "I wonder what they'll want for dinner! Certainly there are three pheasants your aunt Barbara sent with the turkey."

"And there's a fine bit of beef, mother."

"My beef, indeed! Oh no! We can send 'em up a pheasant and some mince-pies; and quite good enough too for such strange people, who take one unawares."

"Perhaps they'll dine out."

"Ah, perhaps they will."

"I'm afraid we can't keep them here, mother. Certainly we can't continue to take twenty guineas a week. By-the-way, mother, have you four pounds in your purse for Monsieur Moira's change? And I'll write out the receipt."

The old lady rose to see, saying that Christmas expenses had left her very low. However, she managed to produce the four pounds while her son wrote the receipt.

"There!" he said, resuming his seat. "I'll take it up myself when Maggie takes up their breakfast."

"Oh, by-the-way!" exclaimed Mrs. Marsden, as if a thought had struck her. She opened the door, and called out, "Maggie!"

"Yes'm," returned that young woman's voice from the regions below.

"Hadn't you better light the fire in the sitting-room up stairs and arrange the rooms?"

"Directly, m'!"

"Yes, go at once."

And Mrs. Marsden resumed her seat, and took another piece of toast.

But not five minutes had elapsed when such a shrill scream from up stairs rang through the house that mother and son simultaneously sprang from their chairs in alarm and dismay.

ARRIVAL OF THE MYSTERIOUS LODGER.

"Good Heavens! what can be the matter?" cried the young man, horrified; while Mrs. Marsden, white as a sheet, sank back in her chair, wringing her hands.

Young Marsden rushed up the stairs, and found Maggie on the landing of the first-floor, trembling like an aspen leaf, and almost unable to speak.

"Good God! what is it, Maggie?" he asked, excitedly.

"The bedroom-in't been slep' in, Sir," stammered the servant-girl. "And—and—look here!" she added, pointing to a dark, crimson stream, which was slowly trickling from under the sitting-room door.

"It's blood!" he cried, horrified.

"Yes, it is, Sir," returned the girl, clinging to the banisters, and overcome with terror.

"Go down to my mother, Maggie. I'll go for the police," said young Marsden. "The door must be broken open."

To describe the consternation of Mrs. Marsden when informed of the state of things would be impossible, while poor Maggie, as frightened as she, clung to her, sobbing. Thus the two terrified women awaited the advent of the police.

Unlike what usually happens in such circumstances, they were not long in coming, and then the party proceeded up stairs.

The door of the sitting-room was broken open, and a terrible spectacle met their gaze.

Lying across the rear the window, her long fair hair soaked in blood, lay Madame Moira. She was still dressed in the ball-dress which she had worn on the previous evening, and in one of her small white hands, which was slightly clenched, was a handful of coarse black hair. A large wound in the region of her heart had evidently been the cause of death, but that it had not been instantaneous was sufficiently proved by the fact of her having made resistance to her murderer, as the hair in her hand and the state of her dress witnessed. The inspector, however, after regarding the body a moment, sent one of his men for a doctor.

"What is the use of that?" asked Marsden, in a hollow voice, and pale as ashes. "She's dead, isn't she?"

"Oh yes, she's dead enough," returned the inspector. "But it's always the rule, in such cases, to send for a medical man."

However, when the doctor arrived, to the great surprise of them all, he announced the fact that the lady was not dead, and, more than that, she was not likely to die, unless fever should set in in the system. She was in a state of syncope, he said, from loss of blood.

Examination proved that the weapon with which she had been stabbed had glanced aside from a steel corset which she wore, and thus avoided the heart, within a few inches of which, however, it had gone.

By the doctor's directions, Madame Moira was undressed and put to bed, and a practiced hospital nurse sent for to attend her.

Moira was of course sought for high and low, hand-bills were circulated, and a reward offered; but, after all, he strangely enough met his fate by accident a few days subsequently to his attempted murder of his wife. After having been perdu a day or two his body was discovered on the lines of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. It was supposed that, being unacquainted with the neighborhood, he had endeavored to make a short cut across the line after dark, and been knocked down and killed by a passing train.

The account which Madame Moira gave of herself was a singular one. She stated that she was a Swede, and had been brought up at Stockholm by an old lady whom she had always supposed to be her aunt. No expense or luxury had been spared for her, and she was highly accomplished. (It was afterward ascertained that she was the illegitimate daughter of a Russian nobleman.) At a soirée given by her reputed aunt she first met with Moira, a Portuguese merchant, and a man of good family, who became captivated by her singular beauty. Strongly urged by her aunt, and moreover impelled by that strange fascination which sometimes induces women to marry men utterly repulsive to them, she at last accepted the offers of the Portuguese merchant, who, on the sudden death of her aunt, brought her to England. Madame Moira affirmed that though her husband was jealous and morose to a degree, yet he did not actually ill-treat her. Where they had lodged in London she could not tell, being utterly a stranger in the city. All she knew was that, on the night of their removing to Mrs. Marsden's, her husband had told her to array herself for a dinner-party at the house of a friend of his (it was concluded that he did this to lull any suspicion which she might form; for a letter found in one of his valises left it beyond doubt that he had taken his wife to an obscure place on purpose to murder her, his jealousy having become unbearable), and that she had obeyed him. She said that when she received a cab laden with the luggage of herself and her husband she was surprised, and was about to question him, when he stopped her with a peremptory gesture, and desired her to get into the vehicle; that she, well knowing his morose disposition, did not dare to disobey him.

While at supper on the night of their arrival at Mrs. Marsden's, Madame Moira stated that her husband, although a moody, reserved man, was of an unusually kind and tender disposition, and that he was extremely jealous of her. There could be no question that Moira's incessant dread of a rival had rendered him quite insane on this point. He no doubt looked upon young Marsden, though he had never him but an hour, as that rival.

Madame Moira declared that she had never felt more at ease with her husband in her life, and that she imagined she was going to overawing him into a genial humor, when he paralyzed her with terror by suddenly jumping up and seizing her by the hair, declaring that she was "a faithless wife," and that she should "live to see him murder another." This remarkable utterance, seeing his fierce black eyes gleam with the light of a demoniac fury, she considered had the effect, considering to hold him away from her. She was too terror-stricken to give any alarm. Then she made a desperate, fierce push, which sent him reeling to the ground. The weapon with which he had attempted to kill her, a penknife, fell from the floor, the hilt of which was richly studded with sapphires and diamonds.

None of the boxes of the deceased man were found to contain a large amount of valuable property. Besides plate and jewelry, there were large quantities of moidores, double doubloons, English sovereigns, and foreign and English bank-notes. No relations of Moira ever putting forth claim to any of these valuables, they became the property of his widow, who continued to reside with Mrs. Marsden.

Naturally there could be but one end to all this, and that was one which caused the young bank-clerk's companions to term him "a lucky dog." Within one year of this memorable Christmas-eve Mariette Moira changed her name for that of Marsden.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 729.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1870. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT. PRICE TEN CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

AMERICANS LEAVING PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 819.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1870.

☞ With this Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY is published a SUPPLEMENT, containing a HALF-SHEET

WAR MAP OF FRANCE,

on which are shown the chief Cities and Towns, with their Railway and other Communications, Rivers, &c., together with a statement of the Military and Naval Resources of France, and a Table of the Principal Events of the War.

☞ The Splendid EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENTS commenced in the last Number of this Journal will be continued in every issue of the WEEKLY for the present, thus making it not only the Best and Cheapest, but the CHEAPEST Illustrated Paper in the World. The price will remain the same—Four Dollars per Year; Single Copies Ten Cents.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscription to the Paper with much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient, AMONG THE EXPERIENCE OF THEIR NEAREST SUBSCRIPTIONS. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

GOOD SENSE IN POLITICS.

THERE is a remark constantly made by those who were not really opposed to the rebellion, and which is much too often echoed by those who supported the government with all their hearts, that the old issues are settled. We are exhorted to believe that there is no possible relation between yesterday and to-day, and that those who half a dozen years ago were either forcibly supporting the authority of the government or quietly conniving at it may be now safely trusted with its control. There is no profounder error, nor one which the country will more bitterly rue if it should become more general. The old issues are not settled, simply because the old spirit survives. The action of Governor WALKER, of Virginia, in regard to the President's Thanksgiving proclamation, and the KU-KLUX demonstrations in Kentucky, show decisively, if any proof were needed, that just in the degree that the Democratic party in the Southern States gains power, in that degree the ugly spirit at the South makes itself felt. And it would attempt the restoration of slavery next not to suppose, but that it would be as much as it could be can not be doubted.

It would keep the country in perpetual agitation. It would abuse the colored population in every practicable way. It would threaten and swagger in the old manner; and the country would most anxiously deplore having created the situation theoretically and not practically.

There is one thing, and one thing only, which is the sure guarantee of that safety essential to which is now imperatively necessary, and that is the constant conviction upon the part of all disaffected that the country will unquestionably what it did in the war, and means to secure it to the utmost. To insist that the old issues are settled, that the rebellion was suppressed a few years ago, that slavery is abolished, and the reconstruction acts are law, and that, therefore, it is wise to elect JEFFERSON DAVIS to the Senate, or to take TOOMBS into the cabinet, or to turn over the country to a Copperhead administration, because some of its members hold certain opinions upon certain other subjects, is to trifle with the very gravest peril. Those Republicans, therefore, who, upon a theory that revenue reform is the most vital and paramount of all issues, would willingly bring in the Democratic party under cover of voting for Democratic free-traders against Republican protectionists, assume a very heavy responsibility. Suppose a representative denies the validity of the amendments, shares the Democratic hostility to the negro and hatred of the Southern Union men, and winks at the revival of the old Southern spirit of jealousy of the Union, and of the principles and tendency of the Democratic party, how is he less desirable or dangerous because he may be a free-trader?

It is not a great many years since 1860, when General GRANT was elected. Then that free revenue reformers, who are also Republicans, have not forgotten the scenes and speeches in the Tammany nominating conventions, and throughout the Southern States during the campaign. In prospect of the possible success of the Democratic party, which they had so often proved their power to control before they had washed off the blood of the war, the Southern leaders showed precisely what was the spirit of what they meant. It was the perception of that fact which so stirred the country, and so triumphantly elected Grant and Colfax. The election drove those leaders into their lair. The spirit of disturbance withdrew into silence. But it is not extinct. The best observers always show it to be just as much alive as ever; and when the next Presidential contest begins those leaders will appear with the same battle-cry. And if the Republicans have permitted themselves to separate, under the delusion that old issues are settled, they will very probably find that the old issues will settle them.

Amidst all the criticism and dissatisfaction which there must always be in all parties, there is one thing to be borne steadily in mind, and that is, that the political alternative is very simple. If the Republicans lose power, the Democrats will take it, and what the Democratic party is every man knows. The man or the paper, therefore, that believes, notwithstanding the mistakes which the Republican party may have made, that its ascendency is desirable for the general welfare, will so criticise as not to destroy the party. If a man, however, thinks it so rotten and reactionary as to promise nothing better than the Democracy, he will naturally regard its overthrow with complacent indifference. If, on the other hand, he distrusts a party which has so defied human nature and the universal conscience in common sense, and in spirit and leadership remains unchanged, he will be very careful that no word or act of his conspires at so immeasurable evil. A fortune as a renewed Democratic control of the government. Such a man will understand that a friendly tone in censuring Republican faults is serviceable to the cause he has at heart than the most satirical jeer.

If there were no political necessities, if the most radical differences were settled by the passage of a law, if diverging tendencies were harmonized because one party was in power and the other, if there were but one simple, single question before the country, the duty of every good citizen would be equally simple. But no practical politics a man is morally bound to do the best that he can, not by relaxing his ideal, but by measuring what should be the strength ing that he must decide upon a survey of the whole field, and choosing that which upon all the probabilities promises most for the future general welfare. To mount a hobby and ride furiously out of the line may gratify a very sincere conviction, but it will not help to get the victory to the enemy. It is fine, like the charge at Balaklava, but it is not war.

LOUIS BLANC AND THE WAR.

LOUIS BLANC has published an extraordinary address to the defenders of Paris, congratulating them upon the failure of the armistice. He says that they have "refused to accept a peace with an enemy upon the soil of France. But surely misfortune is not dishonor. It is curious that LOUIS BLANC does not see that the folly of prolonging a war which is destroying the country is criminal. Without reminding him that the French people are not the only ones wanton and cruel way, and assuming even that they are now bravely fighting in the noblest of causes, what is the object for which they contend? what can brave men do but yield? If they are forced to terms which seem to them hard and unjust, they will know how to bear with the misfortune in the field. But when the armies are defeated, and Paris is starved into surrender, and then peace is made upon ver Public affairs from MR. SUMNER's truths, and we are sure that Count BISMARCK's boots would be very willing to give a pleasing turn to an interviewer. Or "enterprise" might lay an ambush for his valet—the next friend, in a certain sense, of the statesman. The public would believe much more readily that they were reading "almost the exact words" of BISMARCK's body-servant than of BISMARCK himself.

It is a pity if money is paid for sending such stories over the ocean, because a much better article of news, as the dealers say, could be made to order upon this side of the Atlantic. Yankees are equal to the most desperate guesswork, and will give odds to any European. We have forgotten the most exquisite stroke in the BISMARCK business. It was that the organ of the correspondent who brought the proof paper to confidential administration another correspondent that, by an abortive effort to relieve himself upon a cleft of gentlemen, he had lost the opportunity of publishing their conversation.

SELF-RESPECT OF THE PRESS.

The newspaper press, however powerful, will never have its rightful influence so long as it is not respected by its own members. The grossest personalities and bitterest articles with their opposed writers, and to measure the force of an argument by a feeling toward the person who urges it, is the way to be the best power of the press. The advantage of the anonymous article is that it is judged wholly by its merits, and not by the reputation of its author. But this merit is undoubtedly stronger, as EMERSON says, when it has a man behind it. But he is not speaking of anonymous addressed solely to the reason, in which all personality is impertinent and prejudicial. A man may be of notoriously bad judgment, yet his views of particular subject may be sound, and his reasons in a certain case unanswerable. It would be a great injustice to the public which is to be the final judgment by a gibe at himself. And certainly newspaper writers themselves ought to guard the advantages of their position, as secured and interested in insisting that, so far as practicable, public questions shall be considered upon their merits. This is generally unquestionable, but the anonymous newspaper makes it feasible.

The identification of a great paper with a single person is a fatal error at the beginning, as it appear to be a mere speaking trumpet in the hand of a man who may be of no character or weight. But the paper is, that a great paper really the work of many men, each contributing a special talent. Indeed, the most conspicuous of daily papers hitherto, the London Times, is the result of the labors of the most accomplished men in the kingdom upon various subjects, and therefore the editor, who does not write. Our own system is different. The responsible editor is very often the writer of the most important articles in the journal. But he is entitled to the courtesy of the anonymous pen, unless he chooses to relinquish it, and it is a curious result of a high order of courtesy that deprives him of it. The public, of course, regard the exposure of the personality of one newspaper writer by another as a surrender of the argument by the last. If you feel that you can show a man's argument to be weak, you are certainly not entitled to dismiss him as a fool or a coxcomb, because coxcombry is not in discussion, and because, even if he be a coxcomb, his argument may be sound.

So to desert the argument, to sneer at an opponent as a foreigner, is to condemn your own cause. We have seen a journal taunted in discussion of public questions in this country upon the ground that its editor was an English man. What had that to do with the subject under debate? It did not follow that the arti cles were written by the editor; and if they were, it certainly was not to be assumed that they were unintelligent because of the nativity of the writer. The best political survey of this country was made by a Frenchman; and it would not be easy to find a fuller and more truthful statement of the political and social problem which ended in the war than "De Tocqueville on Democracy in America." The character and power of the press are in the hands of newspaper men." If they can not see that they hurt the system of which they are parts when they personally sneer at superiors, writers, or when they insist upon treating the views of a journal as those of an individual, the American press must yet wait for more humiliating development. Little by little, according to its guide-book, was the most remarkable place in its own or any other country; but somehow the little Pedlingtons were always ridiculous.

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

We are told by those who were present that General BUTLER's speech in Boston was received in expressive silence, except from a part of the hall where there was evidently a group of his supporters. It has certainly failed to have the least effect upon the country, and it shows how little hold the General has of the popular heart. This is all the more striking because the feeling of hostility toward England is too deep and extended to be disregarded. There are thousands of intelligent men—much too intelligent for such dispositions—who eagerly watched the Russian question from the first, with a hope that England might be involved in war, and that we could seize an opportunity of revenge for our Alabama and other losses during the rebellion. But just as surely as we are ready for peace, and have treated upon English liberty and civilization, just as surely would the spirit of which we speak react upon America. A nation can not indulge evil passions with more impunity than an individual; and political morality is as essential to the peace of nations as personal morality to that of domestic society.

The intelligent Englishman who comes to this country and examines honestly the popular feeling is surprised to find, with all the personal kindness shown him, a deep sense of injury. And that injury in England which most excites a war policy must ask itself with some uneasiness whether England has a friend. A more terrible and humiliating position no nation could ask itself. Nor is it sentimental merely. The sympathy which universally saluted the heroic struggle of the people of our own race has been a most significant moral support of the German arms. Could England, under any circumstances, have ventured upon the policy of a secret heavy sympathy from public sentiment in any country? And if not, what is the reason? It is that the attitude of England toward the whole world has been too much what that of English captains upon their quarter-decks used to be toward the sailors upon other parts of the vessel—the attitude of the masters of the seas? Yet this position has been officially given to England—for, of course, the root is in the love of the sea, for which we belong—by the spirit which has been and is now steadily opposed by the real liberals in England. It is the unconscious desire to take the advance of civilization, which depends upon international good sense and honorable understanding, will bear steadily in mind that the real friends and true spirits in England, as here, contesting the masters.

The better spirit constantly advances; and what has any thing which is truly American to gain by the overthrow of England? Beneath all jealousies and rivalries lies the deep underlying consciousness that we are essentially the same race—in the same line of civilization, with the same great ideas of human development—the right and the left hand of constitutional liberty—to-day; and under the inspiration of that maintenance of the principle of the future, the better England, which believed and trusted us, and which held the hand of British Toryism and aristocracy from striking us when we were in power. The sympathy between the countries ought now to be closer than ever. An American can not visit any great metropolis and be unmanly as to join in an unreasoning and reckless cry against England. Of course we believe this to be the favorable moment for the formal settlement of our difficulties; and they would begin under the most promising auspices if England would only take the initiative. Any thing helps a government more than magnanimity. That is conceded in many points, as in the treatment of political offenders. It is equally true of its whole action. Both countries want a peaceful feeling as well as the form of peace.

NOTES.

The popular lecture system has now become so extended in the country that the Lyceum Bureau is found to be essential. It is an institution which can not exist of itself, since both to the speaker and to the Lyceum Committee, the intermediate agency of the bureau is the best. For a certain time, naming his conditions, and all the correspondence is managed, without further trouble to him, by an authority which is familiar with distances, routes, and all necessary details. It is a system which, like almost every other one, can be abused, but its uses are very evident. The chief of these bureaus hitherto have been Mr. JAMES REDPATH's in Boston, and the Literary Bureau in New York. But Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM has recently established a new bureau, which is to be known as the Independent Lyceum Bureau, and has many very popular names upon his list. The advantage of such a bureau for any lecturer who proposes a Western tour are obvious.

A CORRESPONDENT in Jefferson City, Missouri, assures us that it is a mistake to suppose that the Democratic party in that State is split in the Republican party. The Convention of September 3 divided upon the question of re-franchising the rebels. Many Republicans favored universal suffrage upon principle, and most of the Democrats favored amnesty; and both united in support of Mr. BROWN. That gentleman is a disciple of Mr. BENTON's upon the tariff question; but in the estimate of our correspondent not ten thousand of the hundred thousand who voted for him were influenced by sympathy with his views upon the tariff. Thus in the fifth Congressional district, while Mr. BROWN received more than two thousand majority, Mr. BURDETT, a protectionist, was returned to Congress by a Democratic majority. Such is the situation, and his statement is undoubtedly correct. But the result of the election, as interpreted by Mr. BROWN in his serenade speech, is the restoration of Democratic ascendency. We shall, however, be very glad to find that we are mistaken.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

CAPTAIN C. F. HALL, the celebrated Arctic traveler, who, as is well known, received a grant from Congress at the last session of fifty thousand dollars for polar explorations, is now engaged in examining several screw propellers, with the view of selecting one for use in his forthcoming expedition. His choice seems likely to fall upon a vessel belonging to the government, now at the Washington Navy-yard, one of great strength, built expressly for an ice-boat on the Delaware, and especially capable of adaptation for the purposes in view. The captain expects to start on his journey early in the coming spring in the screw will permit.

DR. PETERMANN (the geographer), of Gotha, announces some very interesting results of very recent polar expeditions. In a late article he gives us a short summary of the German expedition to East Greenland, consisting of the steamer Germania and tender Hansa, which reached the latitude of 75° 31', the party penetrating to 77° 1' on sledges. The most important geographical result seems to have been the discovery of a fiord extending deep into the interior of Greenland, and the finding of the ground covered for many miles. A snow-capped mountain, Carlsberg, Mount Haidy in height, was also met with. The accessibility of East Greenland was considered to be pretty well established by the discovery of Henry Hudson in 1607, and by visits made since then by SCORESBY, CLAVERING, and others, prior to that of the present.

Of the expedition under VON HEUGLIN and Count ZEDLITZ to Spitzbergen, which they explored from 77° to 79° of latitude, mostly in search of coal, Dr. PETERMANN says that the discovery of an extended main land about thirty-six leagues to the eastward of Spitzbergen, and extending at least sixty miles from north to south, being picked by numerous mountains and peaks. This, if continuous with Gillis Land, was believed to be at least equal in magnitude to Spitzbergen. This discovery is considered by Dr. PETERMANN to be one of the most important results of polar explorations for many years. Numerous important collections were made by VON HEUGLIN, including specimens of the eggs of birds. Additional facts might have been secured had Mr. BENNETT Gris, learning of the war in Europe, in the month of September hastened to return to England instead of proceeding to France.

Another expedition was that of the royal Russian corvette Warjang, which was accompanied by VON MIDDENDORFF, and which made many interesting investigations in the Polar Sea, between Nova Zembla and Iceland. The interesting fact was established that the Gulf Stream, as far as Nova Zembla, possessed the very unexpected high temperature of 34° Fahr.

Besides these more important explorations reported to by Dr. PETERMANN, it appears that about sixty Norwegian vessels visited the eastern half of the Polar Sea in pursuit of whales, exploring the whole region to the westward, eastward, and northward of Nova Zembla and the Kara Sea. During the past year this sea was found perfectly navigable in the height of summer; and LAPTEFF-SARYTSCHEFF, who for years before had skirted its entire shores in a sail-boat and about fifteen feet during last summer passed completely around Nova Zembla, and discovered that it extends considerably to the north of the generally indicated on the maps, namely, to 77° 81' north latitude. He found there Norwegian glass bottles, from which, for the first time, the existence of long currents on the Polar Sea coast was established, as the region has not been visited by any intelligent human since the time of the celebrated BARENTZ in 1594. In view of the facts thus adduced, Dr. PETERMANN thinks, in his article, that the knowledge of the polar region has been materially furthered during the past year, as well as that of the coast of East Greenland, East Spitzbergen, and of Eastern and Northern Nova Zembla have been visited, and remote parts of the sea, which have hitherto been considered as frozen, have been found to have become to be navigable. At the date of the communication no information had been received by Dr. PETERMANN from the Swedish expedition to West Greenland under NORDENSKJÖLD, their results, as well as those of various Norwegian explorations in the north, being awaited with much interest.

It is known to many of our readers that Congress, during the last session, made an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars, in addition to a preliminary one of fifteen thousand, for the purpose of having observations made of the total eclipse to be communicated by telegraph to the principal stations on the sea-coast and the lakes, with the view of furnishing indications of the approach of storms. The matter was placed in the charge of the Navy Department, and entrusted by the Secretary to the Signal Corps; and several parties were organized by General MYER, the head of the corps, in selecting and occupying the points of observation, and in their positions, as well as in organizing the general details of the service. About the 1st of November the machinery was put into practical working order; and since then the reports have been received three times a day, and furnished to such newspapers as desired them. We have every reason to believe that this series of observations is destined to be of signal benefit to the country from the warning of impending storms.

An expedition, under the direction of Lieutenant WHEELER, of the United States Engineers, has recently left San Francisco for the interior, for exploring and surveying portions of Nevada and Northern Arizona, with the view of determining their topographical and geological features. One object of the exploration is to ascertain more particularly the character of the great canon of the Colorado. The expedition is accompanied by a botanist, practical geologist and naturalist, and will, no doubt, by means of the collections and maps they make, add materially to our knowledge of the country.

The Russian government, it appears, is about following the example of some other nations in establishing a complete system for meteorological observation throughout the empire. It is proposed to divide the empire into separate districts, with a central observatory, furnished with self-recording instruments, in each. These such establishments are now in existence, at St. Petersburg, Helsingfors, and Tiflis. Talakend is to be the central station for Turkistan. These institutions are to be quite independent of each other, each being surrounded with its own auxiliary stations, and publishing its own results.

Visitors to the Dublin Zoological Gardens have been much interested in some living specimens of the Australian fish found in the Mammoth Cave, recently carried there, and now in perfect health. The small specimens are so transparent that the vertebral column, the heart, and optic bulbs may be distinctly seen. In the largest fishes are also to be seen the optic bulbs, which, it is suggested, are due to their having been kept in an iron tank, which may have given color to a rudimentary pigment of the membrane.

Many of our colleges have Natural History Societies connected with them, established by some enthusiastic professor or student, but not retaining their vitality for more than a few years. To this Williams College, however furnishes an honorable exception. Its Lyceum of Natural History having been in active operation for quite a long period of time, and continually exhibiting evidences of growth. Every few years a party is organized to go out on the far explorations in some region not represented in its museum; and in the list of places visited on these occasions may be named Florida, Labrador, Greenland, Vancouver's Island, etc. We are glad to learn that a new expedition has just started, consisting of five members of the present Senior Class, which expects to do good work in investigating the region between the Saline and Rosalia Pass. Their stay will probably cover a period of several months, and the members of the party expect to return with a rich collection of material during the coming spring to take part in the graduating exercises of their class.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

On Wednesday, November 30, a sortie was made from Paris under General Ducrot against the Vendemy Division on the east. It resulted in leaving the French in possession of the plateau of Avron at Marne. At one time the French formed a line to the right and left of Neuilly-sur-Marne, from which they were finally driven back with heavy loss. Had not the Wurtemburgers been engaged in the bombardment of the French attack, the line of investment might have been broken. As it is, the French have gained a strong foothold on the peninsula of the Marne.

Another sortie was made on the same day north of St. Denis, where the French attacked the Fourth Prussian Corps. The attack was repulsed with heavy loss on both sides.

On the 91 of December the Germans made a desperate attempt to force the passage of the Marne at the villages on the east bank of the Marne from Noisy-le-Grand to Champigny, back across the river. Ducrot withdrew within the peninsula formed by the curve of the Marne through Champigny, Joinville, and Creteil, thus covering his flanks by the stream. As the Germans advanced, the attack they were met by a terrible fire from the forts of Nogent and Rowy and the Mount Avron. The contest was maintained for a moment, but were soon rolled by their officers, who were unable to withstand the great slaughter the French were inflicting. The largest brigade of the second division of the Saxon troops lost 1,500 men.

At noon a heavy fire from the forts of Paris crossed the bridge near Brie, and drove the German troops thence. At three o'clock the firing ceased, the French returning to near the east bank of the Marne, and not recrossing it, but holding the bridges. Numerous on both sides were heavy. The German losses were the greatest on account of their attacking the fire of the forts, and attacking the French in their chosen position.

The advance of the Army of the Loire, which was intended to have been cooperative movement, has been checked by huge masses of German troops concentrated between Orleans and the army of the Loire. The President is said to be to remain at Etampes, thirty miles south of Paris, to prevent the advance of General Trochu's army. Here, according to the London Times correspondent, the French, numbering 80,000, attacked the Germans, 100,000 strong, on the Paris road at Etampes, and were repulsed, with heavy loss.

The German army evacuated Amiens. They blew up the bridge between Albert and Acheux to protect their retreat, and the Commander of the Fifth Corps have abandoned his movement northward, and to be marching toward Paris.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Russian question remains unchanged. English popular opinion is the situation grimmer.

According to a London telegram, the Suez Canal is to come under the control of Egypt. A railway will be formed, with the Duke of Sutherland, probably, as its director.

New gold discoveries are reported in Mexico, about seventy miles from Chihuahua. A rich placer has been opened in the Sierra Madre Mountains.

General De Rosas has resigned his position as Captain-General of Cuba, and is succeeded by General Valmaseda.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The third session of the Forty-first Congress began on December 5.

The public debt of the United States was decreased during the last month $7,429,869 90, and since the 1st of March $30,000,000. The decrease of the bonded debt alone, from March 1, 1869, to November 1, 1870, was $20,000,000.

The official returns received at the office of the Secretary of State at Albany show that at the late election in this State 1,364,000 votes were cast. The two governor, and Woodford 360,449.

It is stated that a movement is on foot for the annexation of the Mexican State of Sonora to the Territory of Arizona.

The Commissioner of Agriculture has received over four hundred varieties of apples from the Imperial Botanical Garden of St. Petersburg.

A census of the city of Memphis, ordered by the Recorder of Memphis, Tennessee, for living with a negro woman, has resulted in the discovery that there are 40,226 persons the city, setting his demurrage at $10,000.

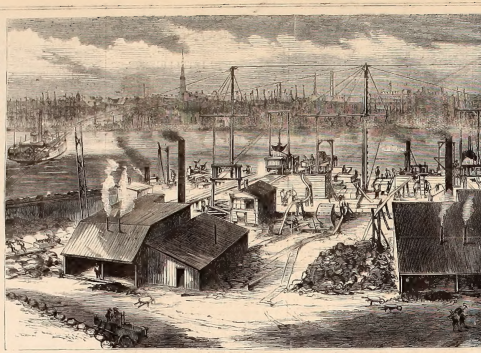
The Attorney-General of Maryland is of opinion that the laws of that State distinctly forbid shooting water-fowl bodied in flocks from any kind of craft or bouby blind, at a greater distance than one hundred yards from the natural shore.

Frank Gardner, Australia, has lately been the scene of several shocking murders. The latest case was that of a wealthy farmer, aged 36, Dew Worthington, who had been in the habit of living alone, and keeping a considerable amount of money in the house. The house was broken into and considerably excited over the matter, and seriously contemplate the organization of a vigilance committee.

THE EAST RIVER BRIDGE.

On this page we give several views of the Brooklyn caisson of the East River Bridge, which a few days since narrowly escaped destruction by fire.* The interior of the caisson is divided into chambers by temporary partitions of planking calked with oakum. It was in one of these partitions that the fire occurred. It originated from the blaze of a candle held too near the partition by a workman. Once kindled, the fire was driven by the immense force of the compressed air within the caisson with such rapidity as to defy all ordinary methods of extinguishment; and it was not until the interior was flooded with water that the engineers of the work felt satisfied that they had effectually subdued the mischievous element. It is thought that the injury to the caisson can be fully repaired at a very slight expense.

The caisson, as our readers will see from the sectional view, is an immense wooden box, without bottom, covering a space of 102 by 168 feet, or about three-eighths of an acre of ground—nearly seven city lots. Its present height is 24 feet 6 inches. The roof is of solid timber 15 feet thick (except that the upper ten courses have narrow spaces filled with concrete, to increase the weight). The sides of the air chamber are V shaped, and are of solid timbers bolted very firmly together. The lower edge is heavily shod with iron. This V is 9 feet 6 inches high, 8 inches thick at the bottom, and 9 feet thick at the top. The timber joints, from the edge to the top of the fifth roof course, are thoroughly calked and pitched. Between the fourth and fifth roof courses is a sheet of tin, which is continued down the sides underneath



THE BROOKLYN TIER—GENERAL VIEW OF FOUNDATION.

WORKING BENEATH SHOE OR EDGE OF CAISSON.

AIR CHAMBERS FOR THE INGRESS AND EGRESS OF WORKMEN.

SENDING UP DEBRIS THROUGH THE WATER SHAFT.

the outside sheathing; this is intended to prevent all escape of air from the inside.

The air or working chamber is divided by massive timber trusses or frames into six rooms, in each of which fifteen to twenty men are employed. Some are drilling the immense beds, to prepare them for blasting, others pulling stone from the trenches by means of tackle; gangs of men are wheeling material that has been excavated and dumping it into the pools under the water-shafts, and here others are constantly shoving the material under the shafts, from whence it is taken by the dredging buckets.

The interior is lighted by fourteen calcium lights; the gas being led into the caisson through pipes connected with reservoirs placed outside.

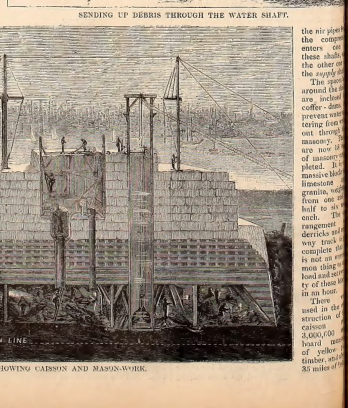
The caisson is supported mainly by blocks of 12 feet square in the trenches, and wedged tightly to the frames. As the lowering is effected by removing material from under the V, and in taking out and blocking and replacing it, a little lower, etc. The movement downward is imperceptible, but goes on steadily at an average of three inches per day.

The water excavating machine essentially a tube, or cylinder, measuring accurately the power of air in the caisson.

A shaft is also a barometer to which is filled with water instead of mercury, and placed at the bottom of the cylinder.



SECTIONAL VIEW OF FOUNDATION, SHOWING CAISSON AND MASON-WORK.

ery pound above the atmospheric pressure (which is, of course, bearing on top of the column) in the water a little more than two feet higher this tube. At the present time the pressure inside is 12 to 15 pounds in excess, and the water column is therefore 27 to 34 feet high.

The two smallest shafts shown in the sectional view, called supply shafts, are for the purpose of passing cement, sand, and gravel into the caisson, after the excavation is completed. The whole interior space will then be filled with concrete, made from these materials, forming a massive stone.

The two remaining shafts are the air doors through which the laborers descend by ladders to the chamber below. The enlarged cylinder at the top are the air locks, and it is in these that the change of pressure is experienced either ascending or descending. In changing the gangs about twenty men enter each locks at one time, and the time occupied in shifting the entire force is less than half an hour. On the air pipes the compressed air enters the caisson. These shafts, on the other hand, are the supply shafts.

The space around the shafts are inclosed in coffer-dams, to prevent water entering from without through the masonry. These are now in process of masonry completed. It is of massive blocks of limestone and granite, weighing from one and a half to two tons each. The arrangement of derricks and the way track on the completed portion is not an ordinary thing to behold and some idea of the quantity of those stones in an hour.

There were used in the construction of the caisson 3,000,000 feet board measure of yellow pine timber, which is 35 miles of

THE LAND OF NOD.

...dozing warder by the half-shut gate
...nts his dull head and dreams of sinner-time;
...d round that portal, where mute phantoms wait,
...ream the gay flowers of Oriental clime:
...and from far off there comes the sleepy chime
...of silver bells from a blue mountain height;
...the only sound besides, the measured rhyme
...of a near fountain dripping drops of light—
...dream-region of the Syrphs!

...ed often in the sleepy afternoon
...falls down half lazily among the flowers
...ed velvet, King Summer's priestly boon.
...lipped by yesterday's last sunny showers,
...it shakes the bee from the hollyhock towers;
...soon, like bales that frets itself to rest,
...drop doth revisit it in its sweet bowers,
...sunk into slumber on its mother's breast,
...the sun turns crimson in the west.

...cordless June glows in the cloudless blue—
...cordless except one loitering snowy hill
...getting vapor, cruising either through,
...and promising a sunset that is still
...slow to come, though yet we know it will:
...broadland all the clouds do on their piease;
...soft whisp'ring secrets, murm'ring till meets rill;
...poppy leaves blow by on every breeze;
...low dream-voices stir among the trees.

...ed all around this quiet peaceful place,
...Where never trumpet blew nor shone a sword,
...ar summer's meadows, o'er which race,
...Glazing o'er cowslip cups and emerald sward,
...light sunbeams from rich Summer's golden board;
...rough waves of fluttering flowers they careless play,
...While soft against the face of Dreamland's lord
...ps the grey down the thistles cast away—
...harvest of the day-dreamers, as some say.

...beyond these pastures, far to east and west,
...Stretch great green forests never traversed;
...but there no sound disturbs the wild deer's rest
...But the slipped acorn pattering on his bed,
...or the crisp beech-mast crackling at his tread.
...he hunter's horn scares this birds' paradise,
...Nor beat of echoing hoof; no shalt is sped
...By darting woodman; nor in any guise
...Do fowlers hide here with their lures and lies.

...ind moaning by the flower-strewn river bank,
...No sad friends bring dead in distant lands;
...to some misty glade watch rank on rank
...Of shrouded lovesmen, mothed face and hands;
...And in the lonely forest walk oft mind
...One loved long since, and now how sad and wan!
...A sorrowing angel, who at Night's commands
...Flies ere indeed she well is looked upon:
...So April rainbows melt before the sun.

...his strange land, found only in one's dreams,
...Led by a clew that never yet betrayed,
...wright, through woodland bowers and dells and streams,
...For the great monarch of each hill and glade;
...And after leagues of checkered light and shade
...Stand, in dim alcove by man untrod,
...A Giant throned: face hidden, head down-weighted,
...Propped in star-spangled robes. Behold the god,
...The sleepy ruler of dream-world, KING NOD

THE LAND OF NOD.

TOO BRIGHT TO LAST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

LUCY DARWENT played the walking ladies, and sometimes the juveniles, at the Theatres Royal, Slowmington, Combely, and Driffford, on which circuit it was my humble lot to be engaged as leading lady and woman and general utility. It must not be supposed that I really was an utility person. I only played old women because my appearance was rather unattractive, my stage wardrobe somewhat scanty, and my aspirations of the humblest. I came of a theatrical family: my father had been a clown, and had lost his life in consequence of an accident during the run of "Harlequin Gulliver and the Fairy Queen of Lilliput," a very splendid pantomime, at one of the East End London theatres, in which Mr. Malvern's celebrated troupe of infant prodigies appeared. The infant prodigies have grown up now, and are great hulking men and women, hanging on to the theatrical profession in very subordinate positions.

My father performed in the heyday of his professional career, leaving my poor mother with three helpless children, of whom I was the eldest. She had been a principal dancer at one of the small theatres when my father married her, and a very pretty woman; but the coming of the children put an end to her dancing, and her beauty faded very quickly with the cares of her married life. I am compelled to admit that my father was not the best husband in the world, though he was the easiest and most good-natured of men, and loved us all dearly. But he was just as easy and good-natured with his loose companions, and was always getting into bad company somehow, and coming home in the early dawn—oh, so tipsy, so helpless, with such a white sodden face and such limp arms and legs!

My mother went back to the stage when she was left a widow; but her beauty being quite worn away, she was at a disadvantage with the managers, and was obliged to fill into a very humble position. She danced a little, and sang a little, and played small parts; sometimes representing a lovely young heiress of seventeen, with her poor faded face and thin wasted figure and shabby dress, sometimes an old woman with wrinkles and a red nose. They used to send her on for any thing, poor dear, knowing that it was life and death to her to be employed, and to get bread for her three little ones.

She wore herself out at last, and when I was about sixteen I lost her. Heaven knows how bitter that loss was to me, and how all the sunshine and youth seemed to vanish out of my life when she was gone. I was an old woman from that moment, and any little talent which I may have had for the stage—and I had been rather successful in childish characters, and had received a good deal of praise in my time—all went with my happiness and hope. I had hoped for a time in which I might succeed as a leading actress, and earn a salary that would keep my mother in comfort. I had fancied the life we should lead, and the bright happy home we might have; but this hope was gone now; I had nothing left but duty. I had my younger sister to work for—the boy had been taken in hand by a brother of my poor mother's, a small tradesman at Brompton, and was doing well—so I had only Amelia Jane to think of. She was a very good girl, and used to travel every where with me, and to act occasionally; but I was very careful that she should not waste her time hanging about the theatres when she wasn't wanted, and I used to send her to a day-school in all the three towns on Mr. Ponsonby's circuit.

Perhaps I am saying too much about myself, as the story I am going to tell has nothing to do with me or my affairs. I was a very humble individual in Mr. Ponsonby's company. Whatever beauty I had ever had—and up to my fifteenth birthday I had promised to be like my mother in her best days—had all gone, after a severe attack of small-pox, that nearly cost me my life as well, and put an end to all my hopes of ever doing much as an actress. I was only two-and-twenty, but I had a grave, old-fashioned way that suited the old women, people said; and I took to that line willingly enough, being glad to earn a living any how for Amelia Jane and myself.

I used to redden my nose night after night, until I scarcely knew what it was to appear with that feature of its natural color; though I really don't know why it is that dramatic old age should always be distinguished by that particular infirmity; but if on any time I did venture to omit the reddening process, I was pretty sure to be told that I had no real love for my profession, and no appreciation of character.

"Character, my dear, is what you've got to think about, if ever you want to advance a step beyond your present position," the stage-manager said to me; "and there's nothing like a touch of vermilion at the end of the nose to give character."

I had been jogging on in my quiet way for some years, and had got to be looked upon as a very useful person in the company. Amelia Jane was grown up by this time, and was rather a pretty girl, with a sweet soprano voice and a good deal of dramatic talent. She played all the chamber-maids, and her salary was much larger than mine—not that she was ever proud or stuck-up about that; for she was the shrewd, simplest little creature in the world, and fancied there was no one like her sister Martha. She had been on the stage three years—in Mr. Ponsonby's company all the time—and I had passed the twenty-seventh birthday, and was beginning to fancy myself quite an old maid, when Lucy Derwent came to us.

I think she was the loveliest girl I ever saw in my life. I don't mean to say that I have not seen women with more perfect features, but Lucy's face had a brightness of coloring and expression that bewitched one at the first glance. I never knew any one fail to admire her. It was such a girlish lovable beauty. Eyes that were really blue—the bright azure blue of a cloudless summer sky—and with an innocent confiding look in them that was even lovelier than their color; the sweetest mouth that ever smiled—and this one was always smiling; a little dimpled chin; and a complexion that was all lilies and roses, and upon which the stage paint seemed a pollution. She was tall and very slim, with none of those points which are supposed to constitute a fine figure, but with a youthful grace which to my mind more than made up for any deficiencies of that kind. Altogether she was a most charming creature, and when Mr. Ponsonby engaged her he told us he had secured a treasure. She was quite a young lady, we found; had been educated at a boarding - school, played the piano, and spoke French and Italian and German with more or less proficiency. Her father was a barrister, a disbarred, extravagant man, who had a large family, and was always in embarrassed circumstances. So, his children being compelled to look about them and think of getting a living for themselves, Lucy had elected to become an actress, having a passion for the stage.

MR. MACDONALD'S CONFESSION.

Of course I did not learn these things all at once; they came out little by little as Lucy and I got to be intimate. She took to me wonderfully from the first, as I had taken to her, and used to ask my advice about her dresses, and so on, and seemed to think a great deal of my experience. She had only been on the stage twelve months when she came to Mr. Ponsonby, and had made wonderful progress in that short time. I do not say that she was a genius, but she was very clever, and had a gracefulness, over way in every thing she did that won upon her audience, and made her a favorite at once. Her pretty lady, Miss Juliet Varasour, otherwise Mrs. Mole, who was rather a ponderous person of eight-and-thirty, with a husband in the provinces and a family of children at home, was not too well pleased with Miss Derwent, and was very angry and jealous when Mr. Ponsonby cast her my important part.

There never was a more light-hearted, joyous creature than Lucy when she came to us at Stowmington. The household at home was earning on in a streaming, easy-going kind of fashion, as I gathered from her talk. There were ever so many brothers and sisters, and a fond of one another, and still fonder of the mother, who was the centre of all things for them; and they contrived to take life very pleasantly, somehow or other, in spite of all shortcomings on the part of the master of the house.

Lucy was full of wit and fun, dear girl, and her coming among us seemed quite to brighten our lives, as Amelia Jane and I used to tell her often. She lodged in the same house we lived in at Stowmington—a queer, old-fashioned place in a shady court at the obscure end of the town—and little by little she got to live with us altogether, sharing our meals and dividing our expenses, declaring that I was a wonder of management and economy, and that I was the first great deal of money by my careful ways. She was always well dressed, both on and off the stage; for she had a whole tribe of rich and fashionable cousins, who sent her great boxes of clothes in excellent condition, and she was never at all ashamed to tell us the source from which her handsome wardrobe had been derived.

"If I reside with papa to supply me," she used to say, "I should have to wear the same gown from year's end to year's end," she said, laughing; "but, luckily for me, my cousins are rich and generous, and I get the reversion of all their hall and dinner dresses—much to the aggravation of their maids, I dare say."

She was such a bright, winning creature that the simplest dress took a grace from her beauty. I was never tired of admiring her and all her gay, fascinating ways. She was much liked and admired by the gentlemen of the company too, who used to gather round her in the green-room, and make quite a little court of worshipers; but she received all their compliments with a kind of gracious indifference, and seemed to be as much at home among her heart to any one of them. We used to tease her a little about these admirers, on which she would always tell us that she had no room for them in love, and never should be in love as long as she lived.

"What, Lucy," cried my sister, "do you mean to say that you are going to be an old maid?"

"I don't know about that, Amelia Jane. I may marry without being in love, you know. If any one were to offer me a handsome house, and a carriage and pair, and plenty of servants, and all that kind of thing, I think I should be very much inclined to accept the proposal."

"Why, Lucy, is it possible that you could be mercenary?"

"Could that be mercenary?" she asked, laughing. "Well, I don't know. If the gentleman was not very nice, and if the carriage was a shabby one, I might refuse him; but if it was a barouche, and he had dark eyes, I think I should say yes."

"And what is to become of the 'Sighing Shepherd?'" I said. "I am afraid there is no hope for him."

Our manager was a single man, not quite forty years of age, and had proved rather liable and capricious in his relations with the fair sex up to this time. But he had shown himself desperately smitten by Lucy Derwent, and we all of us knew that she might be Mrs. Ponsonby whenever she pleased. He was a very good fellow, too, handsome by any means, but with a kind, pleasing countenance, and he was a great favorite on the Stowmington circuit, both in his private and public capacity. He was the soul of honor in all his dealings, and very kind and liberal to his company. Amelia Jane and I thought that Lucy Derwent might do worse than marry George Ponsonby. He was a very clever knight errant—had acted in London for two or three seasons with considerable éclat, and was reputed to have saved a good bit of money.

"What!" Lucy cried, with a little scream of horror, "marry that old man?"

"My dear child, he is not forty."

"If he isn't, he's awfully close to it—quite double my age at any rate, and a widower. Why, Patty, I might as well marry my grandpapa."

"But if he is devotedly attached to you, my dear, as I'm sure he is, and would make you a very good husband—"

"I don't want a good husband, you tiresome Patty; I want a barouche, and it must have C springs, and he must have dark eyes. Mr. Ponsonby's are green, or at least they were green when he was young and there was some color in them. They are quite washed out now—a pale drab, like white-brown paper—and his hair is exactly the same shade. And oh, if I was his wife, how tired I should be of seeing him play Charles Surface, and all manner of French marquises, in light blue cotton velvet! Perhaps he would want me to sit in the box-office and take the money, or to stand at the wing and prompt him when he didn't know his part."

"I am sure he would make you the star of his theatre," I said, "and that you might have a very happy life."

I had been brought up so entirely among theatrical people that I thought to marry a prosperous provincial manager was almost the highest fate a young woman could aspire to; but Lucy Derwent only laughed at me when I told her this, and it seemed as if there was very little hope for Mr. Ponsonby.

He seemed less hope for him by-and-by when Mr. Roderick Macdonald came to Stowmington for a fortnight's starring engagement.

It was summer time when this gentleman came to us, the beginning of June, and the country would about be in its prime with all its flowers. I don't think I can remember finer weather than we had just then in all my life. It was not like so many mean November weather for a country theatre; but oh, what delicious days, what cloudless skies, what a fountain and glory in the mornings, what a tender, calm, and pensive beauty in the dewy twilight, when the stars came out in the soft, dark, unpolluted heaven, and there was a rosy flush over all the west till nine o'clock at night!

Stowmington is a fashionable town, a great hunting place in winter, and a kind of inland watering-place in summer. There is no mineral spa, but I don't think many people drink the waters; and there is a fine old cathedral, where there are fêtes and archery meetings; yet at its best the town is quiet, and the visitors have rather a dull time of it. The surrounding country is exquisite, and there are more walks and drives than one can ever finish. The river runs by the town itself, and the villas sprinkled on the green wooded slope on the western side of the town, there is a most charming air of domestic elegance not often seen. Rich merchants and manufacturers from the great city of Birmingham have their country houses here; and the place has the wealthy, drowsy air of a town that has never had to fear the bad times.

Mr. Roderick Macdonald had been starring all through England before he came to try his fortunes at Stowmington, and had met with varying success in the course of his wanderings. He was a genuine Scotchman, of the Perth Scotch family, an ex-captain of dragoons, who had run through a handsome fortune, and had taken to the stage as a last resource. He had always had an excited considerable curiosity on account of his antecedents, and was generally looked upon socially as a distinguished amateur, who acted from pure love of dramatic art. No doubt Mr. Macdonald was fond of the profession, but he must be confessed that he wanted money very badly, and looked to his dramatic genius as a source of income.

We were very curious about him at Stowmington, having heard many stories of strolling about his desperate goings-on during his military career, and he had been the theme of every gentleman of the dramatic profession with whose opinions he happened to disagree. He had been unsuccessful in his performances in several towns to answer for this little weakness also. Having heard this of him, we expected to find him a disagreeable, haughty sort of person, and were prepared to hold our own against him, and to throw the cold shoulder to his superior rank by every means in our power.

He played light comedy, eccentric comedy, and the broadest low comedy characters in his répertoire from a very wide field, and without reference to any particular line of business. He had been knocking about in the profession for something less than three years when he came to Stowmington, and had acted for a season in London, but with no marked success.

How well I remember that memorable afternoon on which I first saw him! The company had waited for him till quite late in the afternoon, in order to rehearse "one or two pieces for Monday." We had almost given him up, and were talking of going home to tea, the actors grumbling about him angrily, and saying that it was like his impudence to keep us all waiting in this manner.

The green-room at Stowmington was not quite a little bit of garden, where there was a few gooseberry bushes and a lime-tree. I was such a garden as one would have thought something of in any other situation; but it was quite a valuable addition to the green-room, a cooler room, and in fine weather we used to sit out here when we were not wanted on the stage for rehearsal, and it might be pleasant to smoke their pipes here in the pauses of the performance.

Lucy and I were sitting on a little bench under the sycamore when the star made his appearance at last, coming down a narrow passage leading from the stage door, with the manager by his side. He was a tall man, with a fine, round the common height of men, and had a bright, fair face, with brilliant blue eyes, and dark brown hair curling crisply all over his broad forehead; it was rather a Byronic head, if I thought, and was undeniably handsome, but with a patrician air about it, and a youthful brightness that was very attractive. Our manager introduced Mr. Macdonald to us, and acknowledged the introduction graciously enough, and glanced at us all very carelessly, I thought, until he came to Lucy Derwent, when his eyes brightened all at once with a surprised, admiring look, as if he had never seen any thing prettier than the picture before him. And, indeed, it might have been so, for Lucy was looking her loveliest that afternoon, as she sat under the sycamore with her hat lying on her lap, and her sunny hair falling loosely about her face, while the shadows of the leaves flickered upon her light muslin dress.

She was to act a good deal with the stranger, and Mr. Ponsonby made this particular introduction with more empressement than he had shown in making the others. He wanted to insure courteous treatment for his favorite. Perhaps when a few nights had gone by, and those two had acted together in a great many pieces, Mr. Ponsonby may have been inclined to think there was a little too much courtesy in Roderick Macdonald's manner to Miss Derwent.

The engagement did not prove a very successful one. Mr. Macdonald was far from being a favorite of curiosity, I think, anxious to see the tall ex-dragoon; but after that the audiences dropped off, and the receipts were very thin. The provincial gardens, and the rural walks and drives round Stowmington, have a more attractive on those lovely June evenings than the prettiest theatre in England.

Mr. Macdonald bore this neglect with supreme good-humor. He had not knocked any one down yet, and had not committed any breach of the very agreeable manner. I do not know whether he was really a good actor; but I know that he was a very great deal on the stage, and played more than his audience ever laughed at him; but then provincial audiences are apt to be timid. He was full of fun and nonsense, mixed up the most ridiculous sayings of his own with the language of the author in the wildest way, made all sorts of absurd remarks about the audience sotto voce, and contrived to keep your Lucy a perpetual titter all the time she was on the stage with him.

He was pleased by her laughing so readily at his jokes, he was pleased with her beauty, pleased with her gay, winning manners. So long as he was pleased with her he seemed not to care how empty the house was, or how cold the audience. I don't think he knew that the emptiness at such times; I think the boxes were peopled and radiant for him when those two were on the stage together, and that the shrill and unkind hisses and tenderness, so natural in her girlish confession and sweet simplicity of love, that it was difficult to believe there was any acting in the business. He told her so much one night; but she laughed, and said I was the most unconscious creature in the world. At the wings those two used always to be together, and in the little garden where the sycamore-tree was growing at eleven o'clock, Mr. Macdonald had been a great deal abroad, and talked French and Italian perfectly well. He had used to converse in those languages with Lucy, and was charmed with her own imperfect schoolgirl French. She was always encouraging to make many blushing apologies. It is not to be supposed that such a flirtation as this could escape notice in a theatre, where people are all eyes and ears. That confidential talk in foreign tongues outraged propriety in the breasts of our company. Miss Juliet Varasour was especially indignant with what she was pleased to call Miss Derwent's goings-on. If people were not ashamed of what they had to say, they would speak English, she said; and she could not understand what Miss Derwent could expect from such a flirtation with a man like Mr. Macdonald, who, of course, could have no serious or honorable intentions, and was only amusing himself at her expense. I defend to my dear reader's sympathy what Miss Varasour said these bitter things; but she went on saying them all the same, and was as angry and jealous as if she had been young and single, and had wished to win Mr. Macdonald for herself. I must own, however, that the provincial did seem rather a desperate one, and I took occasion to lecture Lucy very gravely about her conduct, and to tell her that she must not let her enemies even beginning to say about her. When I had finished my remonstrance she threw her arms round my neck, and hid her blushing face upon my shoulder.

"Oh, Patty, you're cruel," she said. "I love him so dearly. It is not a flirtation; it is the most serious thing in the world; it is for life or death."

"Oh, my dear, my dear!" I cried, grieved beyond expression to discover the desperate state of the case. "Does he know it? Has he told you?"

"No, he has not told me in so many words, but he has asked me to be his wife?"

"Oh no, Patty. Things have not gone so far as that. And I know that he loves me, he has told me so a hundred ways. I think you can see how much he is with your own eyes, you serious, anxious old Patty."

"Yes, my dear. I have seen that from the first night when he was introduced together. But I don't like the business, for all that, Lucy, and I am sorry you should get yourself talked about on account of a person of whom you know so little. If you were to marry Mr. Macdonald, I don't think it would be a good match, or that you would ever ride in the barouche you talk of."

"I resign the barouche forever," she answered, laughing. "I would go on dragging and toiling all my life as an obscure country actress for his sake. And children my own, perhaps, and play old women. What is there in this world I wouldn't do for his sake? Oh, Patty, you don't know how strong I am, and what a heroine there is in his voice and manner when he talks to me."

"I know that he has turned your head, Lucy," I said, "and that's about the only sure thing I do know of him."

It was nearly the end of the fortnight by this time, and still those two were always together. Mr. Macdonald would escort Lucy home from rehearsal, and would come into our homely old fashioned parlor, and sit there talking to us for an hour at a time, and making himself so agreeable that I could not bring myself to be uncivil to him, however doubtful and anxious I might feel; and I was very anxious, for I saw what a hold he had upon my poor girl's heart, and dreaded the issue of this affair. At night, in the soft summer moonlight—the moon was at the full at the end of that fortnight, I remember—we used to find him waiting for us at the stage door; and he used to walk by Lucy's side through the gaspy streets, while my sister and I were obliged to be helter-skelter in a heap behind them. This new radiance from her happiness past them; I fancied she grew lovelier every day, and I could not wonder that another could behold them with no more invisible—steadiness and truth and honor. A good trooper, and a valiant heart. He had, to me knew about the aristocratic Scotchman, except that he spoke French and German exquisitely, and had a Byronic head and bright blue eyes!

It came to the very last day of his engagement, and I thought Mr. Macdonald looked very gloomy as the time of his departure drew near. He was to leave us on the Wednesday at Stowmington on Monday, and was to travel there on Sunday morning, after acting with us on Saturday evening, and spending the Sunday in the entire state on Sunday morning, and I ventured to ask her if Mr. Macdonald had spoken to her of his departure. They had been ample time and opportunity for him to do so had he been so minded. I think the question startled her a little, and the light of dreams in the sweet young face made me feel myself a monster of cruelty.

"No, Patty," she answered, after a pause, "he has said nothing yet. I think there are obstacles in the way, and that's why he has kept his exact state of his circumstances, perhaps. You know men are not so courageous at women in these things. They are not the poverty in can for the sake of any one we love. He speaks of himself as a man of little, and I am afraid that I can not tell what his troubles are, and I do not like to question him about them."

"Oh, my dear, my dear!" was my silence. My darling was very pensive. All the brightness and laughter of the first few rehearsals seemed to have vanished—the time of parting was so near, the sweet, brief midsummer dream was coming to its close.

"I wonder whether I shall ever see him again, Patty, after he leaves us?" she very sadly said to me when we were close to the stage door.

"Of course you will, dear, if he loves you, as I am sure he does," I answered, for the plainest look in her face went to my heart.

"I don't know that he spoke of our parting last night as if it was to be forever—as if it was a good thing for both of us, somehow, that we were going to part."

That Saturday was the warmest day we had had yet—blazing sunshine, and scarcely a breath of air stirring. We were crowded into the little garden where the gooseberry bushes grew. Roderick Macdonald was lounging on the bench under the sycamore-tree, with one newspaper in his hand and another on the ground at his feet.

The Stowmington press had not been kind to him in his engagement. His performances in both the newspapers which had come out that bright June morning. He read the critiques aloud, and laughed with a bitter, sarcastic laugh, and cursed the critics of Stowmington very freely. He was so engrossed by this that he did not look up or hear me and Lucy in the garden. Yes, the dream was over; this Saturday was unmistakably the wreck of it. I went into the green-room, and Lucy sat down in a corner to study her part. She had a very important character in the comedy to play that night, and think her mind was so full of other things that she found it hard to concentrate all her powers into her poor little bend. We were quite alone in the green-room, but we could hear the voice of Roderick Macdonald and Roderick Macdonald's bitter laughter. He came in by-and-by, and threw the newspaper on the floor with a happy talk in foreign languages between them two to-day. Of course the Stowmington critic were utterly insignificant and contemptible in he eyes, as he declared they were, but I think the subserve criticism galled him a little nevertheless. and then his engagement had been altogether a unprofitable one. It was scarcely strange that he should look thoughtful and gloomy this next night.

The rehearsal was a long one, and dragged on for two several hours. The last thing to be rehearsed was a farce, in which there were very few characters—only Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Warren the walking gentleman, Lucy Derwent, and myself. We were rehearsing this quite late in the afternoon, and Lucy and I were seated in the green-room while the two men were on the stage, when Mr. Macdonald was missing from his little treasury, where he transacted all the business of the theatre, with the casts of the piece for the week, and the bills, and all the thing that up in the little frame over the chimney-piece. Yes, the world was to go on all the same after Roderick Macdonald was gone, and pieces were to be studied and acted, and all the common round of daily drudgery was to continue, just as if that bright bowie in Lucy Derwent's life had never come. I knew she was thinking this if she looked up wearily at Mr. Ponsonby, without a spark of interest in the plans for the coming week, about which she would have been so cool ems and eager a fortnight ago. The manager loitered a little over his task, whistling softly to himself, dawdling for a purpose, I fancied; and in that moment a nervous feeling came over me, just as if I had known that there was something painful coming.

"Macdonald seems rather out of sorts to-day," he said at last, with his back still toward us, as he stood at the mantel-piece. "They certainly have walked into him awfully in the Mercury and Midland Chronicle; but it does seem rather hard for a critic to see that the man's no actor. I suppose he'll go home to his wife after his Stoggerham engagement, and that she'll comfort him for all his failures."

"His wife!" I cried, turning cold and faint.

"Is Mr. Macdonald married?"

"So it seems," Mr. Ponsonby answered, looking round at me for the first time, "I don't know it till this morning, or I should"—he hesitated for a moment, looking at Lucy—"I should have let others know it. I had a letter from a friend in London by to-day's post, telling me a good deal about our friend Macdonald. He has been married ever since he was quite a lad to a Frenchwoman ten years his senior. I don't know if they live together; but she is a very handsome woman, I hear, and was on the stage in Paris when he first saw her. I suppose it was this marriage that gave him a fancy for turning actor."

I don't know whether he meant to be cruel; jealousy and anger against the Scotchman had made his heart hard, perhaps, even to a true friend that the blow struck home. The fair young face grew white to the very lips, but the betrayed her trouble by no other sign just then. There was a dead silence in the room, and we heard Roderick Macdonald's step on the stair, and the little garden outside as he came out of the theatre. What a leaden gloom there seemed in the place, which was wont to be so quiet and cheerful, lous with the talk and laughter of the actors!

Lucy got up from her seat presently, and went slowly out of the room. I knew that she was going straight to speak to Mr. Macdonald, to ask him whether this thing was true or not. He was sitting by the window, and could see him as he lounged on his favorite seat under the sycamore, with his elbow on his knees, and a look on his face, scratching figures on the gravel with the point of his cane. He looked very miserable, I thought, with that melancholy expression on his pale face softening the bright blue eyes; and there was a pang for him that almost equaled my own. Mr. Ponsonby thrust his hands in his pockets, and planted himself with his back against the empty fire-place in a dogged kind of way.

"She ought to know it," he muttered. "It is only right for her to know."

"I think you might have broken it to her a little more kindly," I said to him, with some indignation.

"Broken it? stuff and nonsense!" he answered, angrily. "What breaking can there be wanted in such a case? What can she care about a man whom she has only known for a fortnight—a dve bad actor into the bargain? I'm sure his behavior and gagging in young Marlow were beneath contempt."

I did not reply to this; I was looking out at the scene under the sycamore-tree.

Lucy had gone slowly up to Mr. Macdonald, and had asked him some question. I could see the pale line upon her cheek, the worn look of pain and faint that I could not bear a murmur. I saw him look up at her with a start, and with a more than sharp anguish in his face, that made it haggard and old-looking all in a moment.

"Lucy," he said at last, "the murder's out. It's true. Some kind friend has told you, I suppose. Yes, it is true;" and then, as she turned face him silently, he stretched out his hands to her in a pleading, despairing way.

"Oh, my love, my love, forgive me!" he cried.

Lucy Derwent gave a little gasping sob, and fell down at his feet in a dead faint. I ran out to the garden directly, the manager after me. Mr. Macdonald raised her from the ground without that time, and was holding her in his arms, imploring her to forgive him, and calling himself a brute and a villain.

"Yes, you may well say that. You have shown yourself a most consummate villain to her!" Mr. Ponsonby said, savagely.

The other turned on him fiercely, with his fists clenched, and I remembered that my sympathy for knocking people down for which this gentleman had once need with a sympathizer.

He did not attack Mr. Ponsonby, however, and bore the reproof meekly enough.

"I can only plead guilty to that, in a gloomy tone. "You needn't hit a fellow that's down. I'm low enough, God knows, to-day, and to have been a villain to her, but not a deliberate villain. I love her with all my heart and soul. If she would trust herself to me, I'd make her a slave, would sacrifice every hope I have in the world for her sake. Yet I love her so well, that I would rush her to do that for my life. She is as innocent and pure as the angels, and I have not said a word to her that I should mind to say my sister. But I love her—oh! my God, how I love her!"

He held her all this time, supported by one strong arm, and with her head lying on his breast, happily unconscious still. He looked down at her—oh, so tenderly!—as the sweet, pale face lay there.

"No, my love," he said, with a smile, "I will not wrong you by so much as a kiss unawares."

She came back to life presently with a convulsive sigh, and I think the fullness of her trouble flashed upon her with the first moment of returning consciousness.

"Let us go home, Patty," she said, quietly; "the rehearsal is finished, isn't it?"

It was not quite finished, but Mr. Ponsonby nodded to me, and said, "Yes, get her home."

Mr. Macdonald had withdrawn his arm from her the moment she recovered. He stood a little way apart now, watching her with a look that was half tenderness, half despair. I have no doubt I ought to have been very angry with him for the duplicity that had cheated me into his net, but I could not for the life of me feel any thing but pity for him.

We walked slowly home in the afternoon sunshine, Lucy leaning on my arm. I did not speak to her once in all the way. I knew that such a grief as hers would be best suffered in silence, and that any attempt at consolation would be worse than useless. She went straight to her room when we got home, and I promised to take her a cup of tea there presently. We were in the habit of having our meal—and dinner, too, late rehearsal, in the homely fashion that was then like; but I felt quite sure that Lucy would eat little or nothing this afternoon.

When I went to her with the tea, I found her sitting with a large book on her lap, staring absently at the page. She had not even taken off her walking dress. I took off her hat and mantle, and got her to bathe her face in cold water, and sat by her while she drank a cup of tea, and ate a little piece of bread-and-butter to please me. Then I persuaded her to lie down upon the bed, and rest until it was time to dress for the play.

It was no good trying to study—the words would come to her somewhat at night, I had no doubt. She sank down on our three-cornered way, and I darkened the room for her, and left her lying down, with her face turned to the wall. It is to this time and the thought of her lying there that the tears came all at once now; for, when I crept softly to her side in the evening, I found her low, suppressed sobbing, and I was not sorry that this relief should come to her.

At six o'clock she came to our dining-room, with a pale, fixed face, but no obvious traces of her tears, dressed ready for the play to begin. We walked there together, she and I, my sister not being wanted till a later hour. How the fashionable life of Stoggerham lurred upon us that evening!—the gayly dressed people walking and driving in the sermon-making hour, the sunshine, the aspect of happiness that there was in the place.

I don't think Lucy Derwent ever acted so well as she acted that night. I had been afraid that she would break down—had only hoped, at the best, that she would get through her task somehow. But the fever and excitement of her mind gave a new vivacity to her face, and she threw herself into the character she was playing with an utter abandonment. Mr. Ponsonby stood at the wing, wondering at the brightness which best ensures the peace and comfort of domestic life would grow up in my quarters, for a long time. I knew that she was faithful and true, and that she would neglect no duty which she pledged herself to perform before God and man; but the solemn old parish church. Nor was I mistaken in this. She made him fairest, brightest home that ever a lonely bachelor had known for himself, and her husband seemed to grow prouder of her and fonder of her every day. She was very generous to her too, and she told me she was now able to send frequent help to the poor overtasked mother at Brighton.

They had been married nearly six months, and we were in the bitter remorseless winter, the very black and smoky, where the inhabitant consumed enormous quantities of pork-pie in the pit and gallery during the night's entertainment; indeed, if the times were bad, and these people could not afford ready supplies of pork-pie, they would stay away from the theatre altogether, preferring to abstain from the drama rather than witness it unrefreshed by their favorite refreshment. We were at Drifford, and it was the end of March—gloomy, blustrous weather, with cold, gray sky, and frequent showers of wind-driven rain that used to beat into my face, and almost blind me as I left the walk from my lodgings to the theatre—and I think I remember this time especially on account of an event which happened to me in the middle of it.

I was at rehearsal on one of these cold rainy mornings, when the theatre was unusually dark and dismal appearance, and when every member of the company seemed either out of temper or out of spirits. I was standing at one of the wings, trying to cram the words of a long, unpardonable part into my head, when the manager came up to me.

"Oh, Patty," he said—he had taken to calling me "Patty," like Lucy—"I wish you would just step round and have a little chat with Lucy; she's not quite herself this morning, and I dare say you can cheer her up if you try."

"I should be very pleased to go to her," I said, "but I've got through this piece."

"Never mind that; it'll be rehearsed again to-morrow, you know. Wilcox shall read you up the part, I'll run along, that's a good soul, and see after Lucy."

I could see that he was very pale, and had a troubled look that I had never seen in his face before. I hurried out of the theatre, and to Mr. Ponsonby's lodgings, which were very pleasant rooms, not far off. I knew the drawing-room used to wear a very splendid appearance, which I fancied any lady might have been proud to occupy. But then I had not seen many drawing-rooms, and this may have appeared to me grander than it was. Lucy made very light of her luxurious surroundings.

She came to me a few moments after I had been shown into this room, pale to the lips, and with an unspeakable sadness in her face. She had a newspaper in one hand, and she was still holding that in a nervous way, as I met my arms, and hid her poor white face upon my shoulder.

"I heard that you were ill, dear," I said, "and Mr. Ponsonby sent me here to see if I could be of any use to my pet. You know how anxious he always is about you."

"He is very good to me," she answered, in a low, tremulous voice; "oh, so much better than I deserve. He knows now how unworthy I am of his goodness. I kept my secret from him till to-day, but he knows all now."

"All what, you foolish child?"

"He is dead, Patty," she answered, with a hush in her voice.

"Who is dead?"

"Roderick Macdonald. It was in the paper this morning. He died at Melbourne, a rheumatic fever. He was only twenty-nine. Oh, Patty, I told you I should never see him again. And to think that he should have prayed so hard for that one last kiss, and I refused it! He is dead, Patty. Oh, if I could only have kissed him in his coffin!"

"My darling, this talk is so foolish—wicked even. I am very sorry to hear of Mr. Macdonald's death; but if he had lived, no good could have come of a meeting between you and him. You have no right to grieve for him like this, Lucy."

"Oh, I know that," she answered, impatiently, "No right! I tell you, Patty, he was the only man I ever loved in all my life."

"Oh, Lucy! And your poor, good husband!"

"I told him I had no heart to give him. I only promised to do my duty."

"And you will keep that promise, darling, and love will come by-and-by. I will come, my dear, I am sure of that; and you will forget that you ever cared for Roderick Macdonald."

She shook her head sadly, and then we sat down side by side, her poor weary head resting on my shoulder. She showed me the brief paragraph in the London paper by-and-by, and I let her talk as much as she pleased about her dead lover. I knew somehow that things would come right in time; and so they did. I should have required a harder heart than Lucy's to keep it self-closed against such an unselfish, faithful husband as Gerard Ponsonby. That time dislikes now, and seem to me a perfectly happy couple. And I think even Lucy herself must know Lucy's thoughts slip away from the little one on her lap, and there rises before her the vision of a fret that shall never be seen again upon this earth.

BLOOMING GROVE PARK.

It would strike a European as something very odd that, in a new country like ours, where only a few years ago wild game was so plentiful, it should be necessary to create an artificial sporting park, where game may be bred and protected at all times. The forest of Fontainebleau and the Grand Duchy of Baden: but the same want of thrift and forethought which has emptied our mountains and rivers of fish, owner of streams has also destroyed all the large kinds of game. In this respect, and compelled the use of the chase to seek the gratification of his pleasure on the plains of the far West. But this is only for gentlemen of wealth and ample leisure, or for regular sportsmen. There are thousands who have a strong love for wild sports whose business limits them to briefer excursions; and for their special accommodation two gentlemen well known in sporting circles and the public generally, FAYETTE S. GILES and GERRO C. SCOTT, a year ago conceived the idea of providing a game preserve within a reasonable distance of New York.

Great difficulty was experienced in finding a sufficiently large tract of land near this city that contained the necessary requisites of stream, lake, forest, and meadow and forest; but at last one was found perfectly suited to the purpose in Pike County, in the northeastern corner of the State of Pennsylvania. Here fine streams were found running through pleasant valleys, and mountain-ranges within easy walking distance of each other, and a range of high wood-ed hills crowned the southern end of the tract. The streams were already stocked with splendid trout, and the tract seemed really a sportsman's paradise. One of its greatest advantages was its proximity to New York, being distant from the city only four and a half hours by the Erie Railway.

Here about 12,000 acres of land were purchased in the vicinity of Shohola Township, Pike County, and Greene, and an association was formed, called the Blooming Grove Park Association, whose chief corner stone aspirant it proposed to erect a large and commodious hotel in one corner of the tract named, and for the exclusive use of the members and their families, the presence of the ladies being expected and especially desired. The hotel is already under way upon the tract include the back bear, wild-cat, otter, mink, fox, opossum, and the smaller species of the order of squirrel and rabbit, while the varieties of game bird embrace the woodcock, ruffed grouse, quail, and wild pigeon. The lakes, eight in number, are already well stocked with fish of different kinds; and in the lower sheet of water, which is nearly three miles in circumference, a large number of black bass have been placed. Secretarial work is now in progress from which trout and otter fish can be bred by millions and turned into the lakes and streams, keeping them always well stocked. The different varieties of game will be bred in large numbers in inclosures adapted for the purpose, and the young, as soon as they are able to take care of themselves, will be turned into the main park.

Under proper management Blooming Grove Park can not fail to become one of the most popular places of resort within reach of New York. Its scenery, and the facilities it affords for sport of every variety, are illustrated in the sketches on page 820.

IN THE TRENCHES.—[SEE POEM ON PAGE 818.]

VICTORY.—[DRAWN BY MR. ALFRED FREDERICKS.]

IN THE TRENCHES.

(See Illustration on Page 816.)

I saw you, when we went away
With all the martial clang and rattle
Of trump and drum, the trim array
Of uniform, bedecked for battle;
I saw you, in the Market Place
You stood and cheered in lusty fashion,
A glow upon your honest face,
Your heart all big with martial passion.

Too thought—at least such thoughts I found
If I then read aright your features—
How poor your trade of tilling ground
To that of killing human creatures.
How mean your blouse by our gay coats,
How dull your life, how small your chances,
To those that come from cutting throats,
Or winning fame and glory 'mid glances.

You thought of us in time of peace,
A lounging, lazy lot of fellows,
Carousing, laughing without cease,
And making worthy people jealous;
Imagined us in time of war
As living in a camp of pleasure,
And winning battles by the score,
As gayly as we tread a measure.

And thus your thoughts were shaped, my lad:
"When I have grown a little older
I'll throw away my pick and spade,
And take a musket on my shoulder.
I'll be as brave and fine, in sooth,
As any who have sought the glory."
Ah, friend, you know but half the truth,
And half the truth is but a story.

There's toil and hunger, cold and wet,
Deep trails, bleak nights, and sodden trenches
Sharp sorrow, disease that's never yet,
Damp lodging, and death-breeding stenches.
Think twice, my friend, before you go!
To strut in War's grim play as soldier:
For there's a little girl, I know,
Would leave you, if you would, but ask her.

And there was once a girl I knew,
I asked her, and was not refused:
She loved at first, and so was few
Then loved me, for the coat I carried;
She loved me for my martial air,
But better love soon grew upon her,
And now she hates the coat I wear,
And so should I—had it not won her.

Citizens at night, when all sleep,
My thoughts fly homeward, and I wonder—
Ah, loss of mine, now I am gone
Does your soul long for me and ponder?
And wearily the time doth trail
He lagged the more most mechanically.
Ah, friend! if reason can't prevail,
Let love persuade you of your folly.

We dig and delve like you, my friend,
But for the harder toil is ours;
And we dig for another end,
Of death and plague we are the sowers.
Be happy, friend, and think not then
The soldier better than the peasant,
For 'tis not always thus, my friend,
And being killed is still less pleasant.

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE MINE AT MIDNIGHT.

MR. BALFOUR, for so we must call him now, since he is entitled respectably, from his father's dead, and, moreover, even looks like a gentleman, did not go to the Midlands, as he had given out was his purpose, but took his ticket to Plymouth, to which place the railway had just extended in those days. He brought neither luggage nor newspaper, but sat in the corner, with his hat drawn over his eyes, for the whole nine hours, thinking. From Plymouth he posted to Turlock, where he arrived late at night, and without having broken fast since morning. He took no pains either to divulge or conceal his name; he asked no questions, but when asked any except by whether he preferred to sleep between sheets or blankets for Turlock was still an out-of-the-way region, and the little inn about three-quarters of a mile up turbey behind our modern caravanseries, with their "daily fly-bills" and "electric light."

After dinner, which he scarcely touched, he wandered out—it was his habit to do so, as he told the landlord, who was also the chief chemberlain—and did not return till long after midnight. He observed, as he gave the man half a crown for sitting up for him to let him in, how that the moon looked very fine upon the sea.

"You must be a painter, I guess, Sir," said the hostler, with a grin of intelligence.

"Why?" asked Balfour, sharply. "What makes you think that?"

"Well, Sir," returned the man, apologetically, "I mean no offense; but it is always the gentlemen-painters—or, at least, so they say at Sethin, and I with more of 'em came here—as is so free with their money, and so fond of the moon."

"Lunatics, eh?" said the new arrival, with a loud, quick laugh. "Well, I'm no painter, my friend."

Then he took his candle and retired to his room, but not to bed. He disarranged the bedclothes and rumpled the pillow; then walked softly to and fro in his slippers until morning. On the following day he made no attempt to visit his newly acquired property, but strolled about the harbor, or stood in sheltered nad, therefore, secluded places in the rocks, watching the winter sea. His meals at the inn were sent down at most as they were served up, yet he showed no sign of weakness or fatigue, but in the evening sallied forth at before. The night was very cloudy, with driving showers, and the landlady, good-naturedly warned him of the danger of venturing on the cliff-path, which was narrow, and had been broken in places by a late storm.

"I will take care," said he, mechanically.

"Perhaps you would like supper—some cold meat, or something—since you have eaten so little, and place in your sitting-room against your return?

"Yes, yes," said he, approvingly; "you are right; I shall doubtless be hungry to-night." Then he went out into the black night.

He hung about the harbor as before until near eleven, when all the lights of the little town had faded away, save that at the inn, which was burning for him alone; then he climbed the cliff, and pushed cautiously and stealthily on against the dangers of which he had been cautioned. He walked fast, too, with his gaze fixed before him, like one who has an appointment of importance for which there is a fear of being late. Presently he came to the Lizard Down, where he began to move less quickly, and to peer cautiously before him. All was dark: the grass on which he trod was black, until he sank, until he suddenly arrived at a large circular patch of it which was black, and made the circumference of which he counted by paces. This was the mouth of a great pit; and he sat on the brink of it, with his face to ocean, and his ear in his hand, listening. Nothing was to be heard, however, but the occasional scud of the rain, and the ceaseless moan of the distant waves. Far out to sea there was a round red light, which fell upon him as he sat, casting a shadow making the place which it had filled more dark than elsewhere. It had a weird effect, so though some evil spirit were watching him, upon him; he knew it for what it was—the revolving lamp of a light-house on the main. He rose from position as the red light, he perceived a white one, which, though moving slowly, was certainly advancing toward him; nor did it, like the other, become obscure.

"It is coming," said Balfour to himself with a great sigh. He had begun to have doubts of the other's keeping his appointment; though, indeed, it was not yet the hour that he had himself fixed for it. The light came on, quite close to the ground, and with two distinct curves as well as white. It was that of a lantern, which guided then the footsteps of a tall stout man, who bore upon his shoulders a burden so long that it both projected above his head and trailed behind him. Balfour rose up, and stood erect also in the pit of the mine-mouth, till this light fell full upon him. "Hollo!" cried the man, a little startled by the white figure that had so suddenly confronted him, although he had been looking for it. "Is that you, Mr. Balfour?"

"Yes, Frank! There is no need to mention names."

"Quite true, Sir; but you gave me quite a turn," remonstrated the other, "coming out of the darkness like a ghost. This Wheal Dunes, at midnight, gives one the creeps, and no mistake."

"John Trevethick was not afraid of coming here," observed Balfour.

"Well, so he always said. He told me at the last that he only pretended to believe in any of the foolish stories that folks had got afloat, and in favor of which he used to argue. But he's dead and gone, and I don't think he's much the better. We shall see, however, and pretty soon. I hope, whether that notion can not be got over. Come in six months' time we ought to have a hundred men at work here."

"I hope so. But in the mean time you say nobody comes here even in the daytime, eh?"

"Never. The place lies out of the way, you see: about midway between the parish and the road."

"That's well," said Balfour, mechanically. "And you have not been babbling to any one of our prospects, Mr. Coe—nor of me, I hope?"

"Certainly not, Sir; that would be no part of our partnership, as I understood. Not a soul in Gethin but knows of Trevethick's death [and] or of your coming; they think I'm fast asleep at my own house, this instant. But it's been hard work keeping this cursed lantern alight in such a breakneck night as this, I can tell you, and I am glad enough to get rid of it."

"Well, it's all over now, Mr. Coe."

"Except that I have got to take it back again," grumbled Solomon.

"True, I had forgotten that. We must not leave it here, must we?"

"Of course not. I do not complain of the trouble, however, only you must admit I've kept my trust under little difficulties—oh, partner!" and Solomon chuckled self-approval.

"You will be paid in full for all, my good Sir," answered Balfour, gravely. "That is," he added hastily, "if the mine should turn out as you predict. Then, indeed, the ladder of yours will surely never reach the bottom."

"No, indeed. Did I not tell you that there are three levels, each more than a hundred feet? The copper lode lies at the bottom of the last, in the northeastern corner. You will find I have concealed nothing from you. Well, I have got my breath again now. Are you ready, Mr. Balfour?"

"Quite; but walk slowly, I beg, for your lantern is very dim."

"Yes, yes. But wait a minute; I came here yesterday and hid something." Solomon seated himself upon the edge of the pit, and, with his hanging over, and began to peer and feel about him.

"Take care what you are at," cried Balfour, eagerly; "you may slip down and kill yourself, sliding along like that."

Solomon laughed contemptuously. "Never fear, Sir; I have had too many matches with mines to fear them. I have fallen down such places, and been shut up in others for deeper and darker than Wheal Dunes without food or candle, for a week, and yet lived through it. The shaft has not yet been dug, I reckon, as will prove—. Oh, here's the torch."

He dragged from under the overhanging rim of the pit a piece of wood like a bludgeon, one end of which was smeared with pitch, and placing the lantern with its back to the wind, pushed the stick inside, which came out a torch, flaming and dropping flame.

"There's our corpse-candle!" cried Coe, triumphantly; "that would keep us without wittpurpose even if any one were so bold as, in a night like this, to venture near Wheal Dunes, to trespass on Tom Trelawney's ground, where we shall pick up the gold and the silver." There was a wild excitement, quite foreign to his habit, about this man, as he waved the torch about his head in flaring circles.

"Keep your wits steady, if you please," observed Balfour, sternly.

"It is over now, Sir, and I am in the counting-house again," answered Solomon, submissively. "I felt a little exhilarated at the prospect of plundering the fruit that has been ripening for fifty years, that's all. This Wheal Danes is the very alos of mines, and it is about to blossom into wealth. Now, I had better take the torch myself, the lantern will serve for me; but just show me right here where I place the ladder."

Balfour held the blazing pine aloft, and disclosed the gaping mouth of the old pit, its massive walls of granite, and its sheer sides slippery with the damps of ages.

"It is long enough to get down without this contrivance," observed Solomon, grimly, as he carefully adjusted the ladder, the foot of which was thrown down; "but it would take us some trouble to find our way back again without wings."

"It is daylight, however, I dare say it looks easier," said Balfour, carelessly.

"It may look easier, but it isn't. Nothing but a sea-gull ever goes in and out of Wheal Danes; even the bats keep there, where indeed they are not to be found at all."

"It doesn't feel very warm at present," replied the other, and yet he does not seem to be in a hurry to explore this unpromising territory.

"Ay, but you wait till we get to the lower level, Sir, and then, if there, if the rats would let you, for a whole winter, and never need a fire."

"Oh, there are rats, are there? Why, what do they live upon?"

"Well, that's their look-out," laughed Solomon; "they are welcome to be glad to have us, no doubt. It would be only just in my case, for I have lived on them before now; with rats and water a man may do very well for a week or two."

"What! there is water laid on in this establishment, is there?"

"No; the low levels are quite dry. But come, let us not talk of ourselves. We are losing time. I will start first, and do you follow close upon me, but without standing on my fingers;" and Solomon placed his heavy foot upon the first rung.

"No, no," said Balfour, drawing back; "I will not trust myself on the same ladder with a man of your weight. When you are at the bottom give a call, and then I'll join you."

"As you like, Sir," responded Solomon, civilly; but his thick lips curled contemptuously, and he muttered to his mate in a lily-livered affair all; so much the better: it is well to have a coward for a partner."

A deep oath answered his descending form was lost in the gloom.

Balfour waited, torch in hand, until an "All right," that sounded like a voice from the tomb, assured him that his companion had reached terra firma. Then he descended very carefully, and joined him.

"Now, close to the wall, Sir, while I move the ladder," said Coe; "your hand don't seem made for these deep places. Ah, here's the spot. This is a drop of twenty feet."

"And what is the depth of the last level?"

"Five and twenty. But don't you be afraid; the ladder will just reach it, only you won't have so much to hold on by at the top. It's only the getting down that is unpleasant; you'll find going back quite easy work. And then, just think of the lode!"

Solomon began to be anxious lest his companion's fears should induce him to give up the exploration altogether. It had never entered into his mind that what was so easy to himself could prove so formidable to another; and, besides, he had somehow concluded that Balfour was a man of strong nerves.

"Mark me," said the latter, in the tone of one who has achieved some mental victory: "let us go through with it."

In a few minutes [and it was perceptibly warmer. Dark, noiseless objects began to flit about the torch, and their unaccustomed soft strush against Balfour's foot, and then scampered away.

He looked behind him, and not a trace of light from the mine-mouth, while before him was the impenetrable gloom, except for the feeble gleam of his companion's lantern. Above him the roof was just discernible, from which long strings of fungi, white and clammy, hung down and brushed against his face as he slowly descended.

"Come on!" said Solomon, impatiently, whose spirits seemed to rise in this familiar scene. "We are only a few score yards from Golconda."

Balfour stopped short. "I thought you said there was a ladder?" There was a sudden sharp look of disappointment in his face, and even of rage.

"Yes, yes, and here it is," cried the other, putting down the ladder, which he had carried from place to place. "It is only depth that separates us from it. They dug well, those Romans, but left off, as you shall see, upon the very threshold of fortune. They were only to be a little deeper, because the ladder does not quite reach."

He descended first, before, in advance, while Balfour followed slowly and cautiously. "How steep and smooth the rock is!" observed he, examining its surface.

"Yes indeed; it is like a wall of marble. But what matters that? It baffles the rats, but not us. Here is the land of gold, here is—. What the devil are you at?"

Solomon, in his impatience, had stridden on to the object of his desire, and Balfour, having midway in his descent, suddenly retraced his footsteps, and having reached the top, was dragging the ladder up after him.

Solomon heard the noise, with which his ear was familiar, and his tone had a new alarm in it as he cried out, "I say, no tricks, Mr. Balfour."

There was no reply. He hastened back to the spot he had just left, and from thence could dimly perceive his late companion sitting on the verge of the mine-shaft, peering down upon him.

"Come, come, a joke is a joke," remonstrated Coe. "What a fellow you are to be at such games when an important matter is at stake! Why, here is the lode, man."

"It is very valuable, I dare say, Mr. Coe, but it is worth more to one man than to two."

"Great Heaven! what do you mean?" cried Solomon, while a sudden sweat broke from his forehead. "You would not murder a man to dissolve a partnership?"

"Certainly not. I shall leave him to die, that's all. He and the rats will have to settle it together in this mountain fence, perhaps; but it may have a picnic here, and explore the place. Then we shall find, when you are now standing, some well-picked bones and the metal part of your lantern. That will cause quite an excitement; and the coroner's jury, and all in the northeast corner there will be found a copper lode. I will take your advice for that."

"Mr. Balfour, I am sure you will not do this," pleaded the wretched man. "It is not in man's nature to be a fellow-creature's murderer in barbarity. You are trying to frighten me, I know, and I own you have succeeded. I know what it is to be starving and in desolate, dark places, out of reach of succor; and even for eight-and-forty hours or so it is terrible."

"What must it be, then, to suffer so for twenty years?"

It was a third voice that seemed to wake the echoes of that lonesome cavern. Solomon looked up in terror and beheld a third face, that of Robert Balfour, but transfigured. He held the glowing brand above him, so that his deep-lined features were all distinctly seen, and there was all instinct with a deadly rage and malice. There was a fire in his eyes that might well have been lighted by fits of madness, and Solomon's heart sank within him as he looked.

"Mr. Robert," said he, in a coaxing voice, "come and look at your treasure. It sparkles in the light of my lantern like gold, and you shall have it all, even if you please; I do not care to share it with you."

"You take me for a madman, do you? Look again; look fixedly upon me, Solomon Coe. You do not recognize me even yet? I do not wonder. It is not that you that are blind, but you so changed by wrong and misery. My own mother does not know me, nor the woman I have you robbed me nineteen years ago. Yes, you know me now. I am Richard Yorke!"

Richard Yorke!" gasped Solomon, dropping on his knees.

Richard laughed long and loud. The echoes of his gibberish mirth died slowly away, and when his voice was heard again it was stern and solemn. "It is time, at last, man: I am the judge to-day, as you were the witness nineteen years ago who doomed me wrongfully to shame and misery. On that dreadful day I have had in my mind; the thought of it has been my only joy—the hope of revenge. I, a veil and nameless, living and wakeful on my prison pillow, I have thought of nothing else. I did not know how it would come about, but I felt sure that it would come. You swore falsely once that I was a thief; you are about to be a murderer, and your unbelieving bones will not be able to witness against me.

"I never swore it, Mr. Yorke," pleaded Solomon, passionately.

"Your memory is defective," answered Richard, grimly; "if you forget that I was in court myself on that occasion. You did your very worst to blacken me before judge and jury, and you succeeded."

"But it was Trevethick—it was father-in-law who urged me to do it; it was indeed."

"I know it," replied the other, coldly; "he was a greater villain than yourself, and I thought an older one. Death has robbed me of him, and made my vengeance incomplete. Still there is something left for me. You will go down slowly here— But no; I shall wait at Turlock for that to happen. I shall be on board in my own yacht before you have had ten days, perhaps. Well, when you are dead, I shall return to your mine-mouth and bring your ore to the light. You permitted me to begin the work in hopes of getting at the copper mine; I shall finish it while you are in sole possession of the whole of it."

"Devil!" cried Solomon, furiously.

"The appellation is a true one by my good Sir; but I was a man once. Evil is now my good, thanks to you and Trevethick. I am no—look at me and see what you have brought me to—eight-and-thirty! You almost drove me mad, and it was easy, for I had the devil in blood in my veins; but I contrived to keep my wits for the enjoyment of this hour. I feel very old, and have few pleasures left, you see. It is impossible, unfortunately, to return here and see you rot; there would be danger in it; just the least risk in the world of somebody coming here to look for us. I must be off now, too, for there is a worthy man waiting for me at the inn, and you, I am sure, will take this basket to Jacketh.

"Mercy! mercy!" raged and despair burst forth from Richard's foe.

"What! you had calc'lated upon the absence of that ladder professing your love to the curious how great wits jump together: that had also struck me. I shall take it back, for I well know where it ought to be; I am quite familiar with your house at Gethin, as you may remember, perhaps. You may keep the lantern, which will not be missed; but, if you will take my advice, you will put out the light, to preserve the candle—as an article of food. Put it somewhere where the rats can not get it, and it may prolong your torments half a day. You will not have to complain of the lantern, but you will doubtless preserve that for a bonne bouche. You are not superstitious, she I would suggest that your father-in-law's spirit is exceedingly likely to haunt that northeastern corner down yonder."

Here there was a dull scrambling noise, a violent struggle as of feet and hands against a wall, and then a heavy thud.

"Now that is very foolish of you, Solomon, to attempt to get out of a place which you have been informed me could never be escaped from without wings. I sincerely hope you have not hurt yourself much. I bear you no malice, and forbid again, so I may leave you without anxiety. Good-by, Solomon." Richard emitted a mournful, a frightful figure of hate and triumph, peering down into the pit beneath, where all was now dark. "You are too proud to speak to a thief, perhaps. Well, well, that is but natural in so honest a man. I take my leave, then. You have no message, I conclude, for home?"

An inarticulate cry, like that of a wild animal caught in a snare, was the only reply.

"That is the worst of letting his candle go out," mused Richard, aloud; "some rat has got hold of him already." Then, with a chuckle for his own and smiling face, which showed how all his previous fears had been assumed, he retraced his steps, and mounted to the upper air. The sky was clearer now; and, casting the torch, for which he had no further need, into the pool of mire, and shouldering the ladder, he started for Gethin at good speed. It was past seven o'clock before he reached his inn at Turlock; but before he retired to rest he sat down to the supper that had been prepared for him, but without the appetite which he had anticipated.

SWEARING IN ENGLAND.

LORD BRYCE, recounting his experiences of hero's first adventure in England, says:

"At first I did not understand a word
Of English, save their shibboleth 'God damn!'
And even that he had no right to use.
He sometimes thought twas only their 'Salam,'
Or 'God be with you?' and 'the will mercy.'
To think so; for, but English as I am
To my inheritance, never can I say
I heard them wish 'God with you' save that way."

It is not pleasant to know that this use of a specially reprehensible imprecation is accepted abroad as indisputable proof of an Englishman's nationality, but it is true nevertheless. A Spanish playactor tells a good story illustrative of the melancholy fact. Driving about the streets of Havana, his horse stumbled in a puddle, and upsetted a parade-bound Spanish soldier from head to foot. Drawing his sword, the aggrieved warrior quickly sacked the unlucky black driver of the volante, and by the time the astonished comedian could jump out of the vehicle had sent the poor fellow flying to the ground. Being arrayed in a linen tail-coat and Panama hat, the comedian attracted by the row, took the actor for an American, and made no attempt to stop the soldier from assaulting him in the same style. At last, when the murderer rushed toward him, the Englishman put himself in an attitude of defence, and, in the extremely unusual, "D——n you! what do you mean?" upon which the excited spectators roared out, "Inglese! Inglese!" The red hat then pulled himself up, and contented himself with marching off with the vehicle, while a shopkeeper kindly invited the actor to take shelter in his shop.

Swearing lost caste in Anne's reign; at least the Tatler assures us it was eschewed by all well-bred men, and left to bullies, who, hoping sound and noise might pass for sense and spirit, delighted in "ounds!" "thunder!" "furies!" and such rumbling expletives, which made their conversation with oaths and blasphemies, by way of tropes and figures. It divides the lovers of these excrescences of talk into two sorts, "the high and the low—the low swearer being generally a pilgrimage, the high swearer a gentleman of economb." The man of phlegm is sensible of the emptiness of his discourses, and will tell you that "I'll bicken, such a thing is true" is a fine warm him a little he may run into passion, and cry, "Odz bobikins, you do not say right!" But the high affects a nobleness in his oaths, and invokes hell and damnation at the breaking of a glass or the slowness of the waiter. "Sir Harry Slack's assertion that swearing had gone out of fashion is, however, contradicted by the story of the Duchess of Marlborough's calling Lord Orford, ray, afterward Lord Mansfield, and not finding him in, refusing to leave her name. 'I will not make out, sir, who she was,' said his clerk, 'but she swore so dreadfully that I am sure she must be a lady of quality!'" Not exactly what we said to be any sign of reform in another part of the kingdom. Swift, in one of his "Drapier's Letters," says it is unnecessary to state that swearing is a pet vice among Irishmen, and computes that one-third of the population may be designated "swearing souls." He proposes a tax of twelve-pence per oath; calculating to therefor raise ninety-one thousand pounds a year from five thousand gentlemen able to afford an oath every day, twenty-five thousand pounds from ten thousand farmers, and a like amount from the rest of the people. This he calls a tolerable computation, since every one knows there is a much greater consumption of oaths, Dublin alone containing a hundred pretty fellows that swear at least fifty oaths a-piece per day, so that, if one naught fair was good for three thousand, and the militia on muster-day would get through three hundred in the course of eight hours. "It is true," he owns, "it would be impossible to turn all oaths into ready money; for a shilling is so great a duty on swearing that, if it was carefully exacted, the common people would be afraid, pretend to drink wine as to swear, and an oath would be as rare among them as a clean shirt."

In 1712 English ladies were "Dear Lord!" with their pretty lips, the Crabtrees and Buckbites lording their scandal with 'slife, 'sdeath, or 'fore god. Honest Bob Acres, among all such accentric exclamations as "odds whips and blades," "odds bludgers and bullets," "odds triggers and flints," declares "damns have had their day," being superseded by a new method of swearing, "introduced by a correspondent of our militia, who says that there is no meaning in the common oaths now in use, and that while an antiquity makes them respectable; because, he says, the ancients would never stick to an oath or two, but would say by Jove or by Bacchus, or by Mars, or by Venus, or by Pallas, according to the sentiment of the time; so that, to countenance it, the oath should be an echo to the sense, and this is called the oath referential or sentimental swearing." Indeed, in addition to all this, Sheridan was guilty of cliche or no exaggeration; such was the practice of the dandies one day, who thus avoided what Lady Wallace calls the ennui ness of an oath, although not so utterly as her own "Jeffolish wife" in the "Rivals" Sheridan, "Lord, 'offl'—an example of initial swearing perhaps surpassed by the official who condensed a refusal into three letters by writing Q. B. D. on the corner of the applicant's epistle.

AMERICANS LEAVING PARIS.

On the morning of the 27th of October early risers in Paris were treated to the sight of a long file of heavily loaded carriages wending its way toward the Porte de Charenton. This little caravan consisted of some Americans and Russians who, with no small difficulty, had obtained permission to leave Paris.

After passing through the Porte de Charenton (where the sketch on our first page was taken) the party proceeded to the Prussian outposts near Creteil. At a little distance from this village our travelers fell in with the Prussian guard, and, after the necessary preliminaries and verification of passports, were blindfolded and conducted with them into the enemy's camp. Chassepot, where they staid the night. Some were lucky enough to secure a comfortable bed and a night's lodging in the house of a French lady; but the others, less fortunate, passed the night supperless in the open air. The Russians, however, they were taken to Versailles, where a good breakfast speedily consoled them for past annoyances.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

INVENTIONS, strange and peculiar, increase apace. The necessities of war, which are the mother of thinking men, and the results may be of immense value to the world. The latest idea relates to a new method of directing balloons in their aerial course. The plan suggested was to attach a screw propeller to the balloon, these being believed to be able to conduct it against the strongest currents. The birds were to be guided by a long pole, at the end of which a large piece of raw meat is placed as an excitant to them. The driver is supposed to occupy the position of the pole according to the direction he wishes to take. In accordance with instructions issued by the inventor, a trial was recently made in Paris, in the presence of several scientific gentlemen. Four eagles, belonging to the Jardin des Plantes, were found competent to raise a balloon charged with a weight of ten thousand pounds. The result of the experiment was reported as most satisfactory, though we are not informed how the eagles behaved. It is thought that their conduct was creditable, as a voyage with them was immediately planned. When birds of prey can be used for this duty, horses will have a chance to rest, and even steam will be left in the back-ground.

The burial of the dead, after a battle, is always a difficult task. A French physician strongly urges the desirability of disposing of the bodies of the slain on the Franco-German war in a different manner from by sepulture. Although there is a feeling against this mode, considerations of various kinds render the matter one of serious moment.

Secretary Spinner has in charge many articles of value in the vaults of the Treasury. Among these are a large bundle of letter of recommendation, addressed Van Buren by the Emanon of Siam, valued at $400, a lot of fine shawls, and other rare gifts presented to different Presidents.

Received husbands in that peace-loving State of Pennsylvania are getting to be somewhat of a fighting spirit. Not long since a married woman eloped from Pittston with a friend of her husband. The latter resented the slight by assaulting with the utmost fury the loved her new fancy, and was weary of her legitimate spouse. Forthwith the husband gave her to his friend with his blessing, and a suit of her best clothes. In return the husband received a thrashing his Sunday garments and his best boots on the forehead man. The whole affair was amicably arranged, and nobody killed!

It is estimated that three million francs have slipped into the Papal purse since the occupation of Rome by Victor Emanuel.

The Gilbert Library is a novel enterprise started in Chicago by Miss Linda Gilbert, who is an unceasing worker in the cause of prison reform. In her endeavors to reform criminals she has succeeded in establishing a library in the prison, to which prisoners will be immured in the new county jail. The library-room has been handsomely furnished, and adorned with piano, furniture, and artistic ornaments. There are between three and four thousand volumes, which are neatly marked and covered. There are sixty cells in the jail, each one of which has a table; and we may suppose it would be a favorite with those accustomed to resort to such enforced homes from time to time.

It is announced in the French journals that the Prussian War Department has issued orders that their French prisoners shall be furnished with winter clothing, of which an immediate supply is required for them. The prisoners confined in the fortresses of Silesia have also been supplied with winter clothing. Prisoners, even private soldiers, are permitted to reside in private houses, if their education and conduct be such as to justify such privileges.

The Quirinal at Rome seems to be regarded as too small for Victor Emanuel to inhabit—perhaps he thinks so himself. The history of the succeeding sacristans with which the Quirinal Palace is invested is given as follows: It was once the property of Cardinal D'Este. His Eminence rarely invited Pope Gregory, and never to visit there. The Pope therefore, fond of the palace, prolonged his villegiature so as to insult individually, and at last compelled him to be rid of his host. What could Cardinal D'Este do? Of course nothing, but to say that he was too much honored in being allowed to place it at his Holiness's disposition. Now was this a gift to the Pope Gregory, or his King Gregory, or the Pope-King Gregory? This is the perplexing question which is exciting so many fears and hopes, being what belongs to Pius IX. as Pope, his curse be evoked.

Military manoeuvres and exercise-books have been in enormous demand since the commencement of the war. There have been sold no less than 840,000 copies of the "Ecole de Soldat," 170,000 of the "Ecole du Fusilier," 418,000 of the "Service en Campagne," besides hundreds of thousands of cheap abridgments of various kinds.

It is announced that Mr. Barnum, tired of a life of leisure and inactivity, proposes to re-enter the showman's arena, and intends to refresh some years ago and startle the community with a grand "triplex" mammoth enterprise which shall surpass all former achievements of the kind. With his long experience in the showman's business, Mr. Barnum possesses just the sort of talent required to make such an enterprise succeed.

Two elegantly constructed palace coaches have been recently imported into Erie Railroad. They have received the names of "The Morning Star" and "The Evening Star," and are the first of twenty which have been ordered for the line connecting Cincinnati, Louisville, and other Southern places. These cars are of wood, finely finished in every particular, are lighted with gas, and contain, each, seats and sleeping-berths for forty-eight persons. Each car is 66 feet long, and eleven wide.

"Oliver Optic"—what boy does not know Oliver Optic?—recently visited Nova Christian Anderson, and describes him as a "rather round-shouldered, thin, iron-gray hair; not handsome, but with a smile so genial and benevolent that it makes you love him at once." His manner is earnest, though simple and childlike; and he spoke with entire reserve of a Christmas story he was writing. He is about sixty-five years of age."

Professor Winlock, of Cambridge, is now engaged in photographing the sun by the use of a single lens objective, four and a half inches in diameter, and four feet focal length. It is his intention to photograph the sun every day.

San Francisco exhibits some singular lecturers. We quote from a speech recently made in that city:

"Let the Chinese be created free. Republics be was! Ain't fleet experiments always failures? If I was a Chinese, I'd let the Celestials have their heads on! The only decent thing about him, any how, was a rib, and that went to make something better. Chinese! And then they threw it in our face about Eve taking Adam's rib. I'll bet the Chinese has boosted her up in the tree, and then only gave her the core. And what is the Bible to us, anyhow found out? True, it's Chinese instinct, he sneaked behind Eve's Grecian bend. You said, 'I can't,' he, 'you bet.'"

We omitted to mention that it was a lady orator who thus delivered herself.

On Thanksgiving-day the prison rules in the Ohio Penitentiary were relaxed, and the men allowed to converse with one another without restraint. Many were immediately silent for a while, not knowing how to use the freedom granted. At length a whisper was heard from a supposed convict: then a cheery salutation; and at last a general buzz proclaimed that all were enjoying the grateful pleasure of social intercourse.

An Englishman, writing from the French capital, remarks that it is not the luxurious Parisians who are the real sufferers as yet. For a few days the people were startled by hearing a little howling dog. But the sick and the delicate have a terrible time of it. Fancy that we are cooped up in a city which is closely attacked by any knowing fever or disorder there is very little chance for the issue. As the rich and the luxurious begin to really feel the famine, their frames will stint very rapidly under the want of nourishment to which they are not subject.

One of the physicians in Burlington, Vermont, driving into town on election morning, was met by a friend, who hailed him with the query:

"Have you voted?"

"Not yet," replied the doctor: "but I have been all night after a vote. I got his safe, too."

"When will he vote?"

"Oh, about twenty-one years from now."

Some of the reported instances of the speed of carrier pigeons seem scarcely credible. On one occasion, we are told, a pigeonman of Cologne, having business to transact at Paris, laid a wager that he would let his friends know at his exact hour of dinner the next succeeding Paris. The bet was eagerly taken. He went to Paris, carrying with him two pigeons which had a young brood at Cologne. He arrived at Paris at ten o'clock one morning, started at half-past eleven, and they arrived at Cologne about ten minutes past one. This is nearly 150 miles an hour—a marvel that seems to require corroboration.

The siege of Paris has the effect to make some commodities more plentiful in other places. London rags seem besides therefrom in the way of providence. For example, the fragrant Brittany butter, which found a large and ready market in Paris, is now much more abundant than usual in London.

The last great siege of Paris was in 1606, and continued over three months. A frightful record exists of the misery and despair of the people. Such was the famine person must pray that the horrors of those hours never may be repeated. Every thing which was thought by any possibility to contain nutriment was eaten to sustain life, from the dispeating or unpalatable. Hunger made men savages—and in some instances cannibals. The record states the number who died from hunger at 100,000.

An eminent authority in regard to diamonds—Mr. Emanuel—states that the value of diamonds has depreciated thirty per cent. to seventy per cent. the quantity offered for sale in London by French families.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE Archbishop of Kent, Connecticut, have lately had a rebellion on their hands. The occasion of the rebellion was the appointment of a peddler who does a large business in the western part of the country. He is a Methodist preacher, and has been very successful in the usual way. After a few weeks, and before the expiration of his term of probation, he was duly elected for and requested that his name be stricken off. Said he: "I can't stand it any longer; I have to deal with them York State fellows, and I can't live so."

KNOTTY QUESTIONS FOR NATURALISTS.

Is a solid a female companion a "help-meet" or only a hose fish?

Do you have a passive voice tongue or a fluid tongue? Is a bête noir unable like white-bait?

Can you distinguish the sex of the two half-everylegs and a shilling?

Are bookworms the same as leaf-insects?

Does the tapir consume its own oil, and is it liable spontaneous combustion?

Do the cows in Holland understand Low Dutch?

Is a "bull's eye" a cheek bull or a cut bull? If so, can you give the receipt?

Is a cow-fish a stable table to stamp duty?

What becomes of all the cows which the cocks give every year?

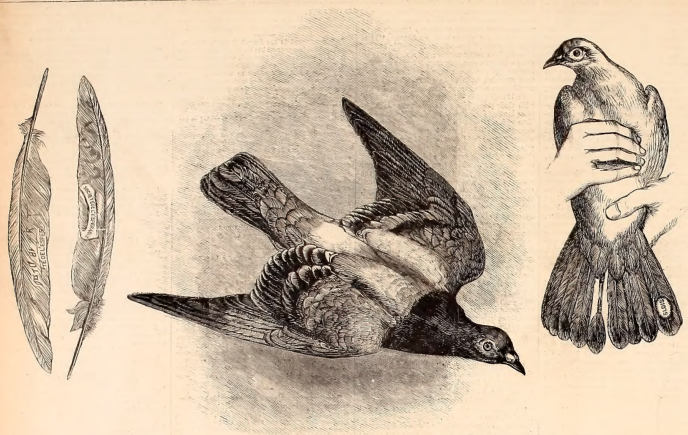
Do you keep your pocket-book in a fish-kettle? If you do, like eggs, out of fresh pickings?

Can you distinguish the sex of the two half-everylegs and a shilling?

Are bookworms the same as leaf-insects?

Does the tapir consume its own oil, and is it liable spontaneous combustion?

Do the cows in Holland understand *



THE PIGEON POST.

THE PIGEON POST.

In ancient times the dispatch borne by the carrier pigeon was necessarily brief, as the lightest weight was an impediment to the creature's flight. Now, however, the camera and the microscope have been brought into play, and the French government have lately informed us that no less than 3500 dispatches of twenty words each, in all 70,000 words, can now be carried by one of these messengers. Readers are familiar with those microscopic photographs of the Lord's Prayer or the Ten Commandments, which, though appearing to the naked eye as the merest atom of dust, are nevertheless perfectly plain and legible under a good lens. A page of the London Times has been compressed into the space of an eighth of an inch.

A regular line of post pigeons has been established between Tours and Paris, the birds being brought from the capital by the balloons. Any one can now send a letter of twenty words to Paris on payment of 50½ centimes per word. All he has to do is to send his message to the Tours postal authorities, who will take all due care that it be expedited, though its safe arrival may be endangered by the legion of hawks which the Prussians at Versailles are reported to have procured to pursue and capture these ornithological postmen. The pigeon, however, is said to fly far quicker than the hawk, and thus will be able to elude his antagonist's vigilance.

BLOOMING GROVE PARK—THE AMERICAN FONTAINEBLEAU.—[SEE PAGE 815.]

Several means of attaching the letter to the pigeon have been tried. Sometimes it was tied round the bird's neck, at other times under its wing; neither of these, however, was found efficacious, as the string was apt to break; and the message was usually wrapped round the leg and secured with a piece of silk. Now a still better method is used, which indeed forms the subject of the engravings on page 820. The letter is rolled up and fastened to the middle feather of the tail—that which remains perfectly stationary when its fellows spread out or close up. The feathers are also stamped with the number of the bird, and the place of departure, as shown in the second sketch.

WAITING FOR RATION TICKETS.

THE lower engraving on this page presents a scene now of daily occurrence in the once gay capital of France—a crowd of people waiting to procure ration tickets, without which no food can be obtained. Each resident was, at latest advices, allowed five ounces of meat every three days; and in order to insure even this limited supply he must wait sometimes several hours in front of the shop for his turn to be served.

RUSSIAN BALTIC TOWNS.

IF, as some people fancy, the next enterprise on which Germany, in furtherance of the idea of completing her national unity, is likely to embark be the annexation of the Baltic provinces of Russia, the natives of which are of Teutonic origin, the towns of Finland and Esthonia will probably come into still greater prominence even than they did during the Crimean war; and the fortifications of Revel and Sweaborg (the citadel of Helsingfors) may yet be destined to play a part as signal as that which has now rendered Strasburg and Metz famous.

Revel, the capital of Esthonia, and situated on a small bay in the Gulf of Finland, 200 miles southwest of St. Petersburg, is a strongly fortified sea-port town. The harbor is excellent, and well defended by batteries. The town is, for the most part, irregularly built. The town proper, which is inclosed by walls, is called the Domberg. Within the walls are two suburbs. The streets are narrow and dark. It contains a cathedral and several churches, a government house, the residence of the governor, an admiralty, a town-hall, a gymnasium, founded by Gustavus Adolphus, of Sweden; a theatre, a public library, a military academy, and several schools, hospitals, and charitable institutions. It is much frequented as a watering-place. Manufactures—cotton goods, leather, hosiery, pins and needles, earthen-ware, and gunpowder. The town also possesses a cannon foundry, and a large trade in corn, hemp, flax, hides, and timber. Population, 28,000. Latitude, 59° 26′ N.; longitude, 24° 45′ E. This town was founded by Valdemar II., King of Denmark, in 1218, and afterward sold to the Teutonic knights. In 1710 it was taken from Sweden by the Russians, who destroyed its roadstead in 1854, by sinking large blocks of stone to prevent the entrance of the Anglo-French fleet while blockading the Russian ports in the Baltic during the same year. It was at one time the great emporium of the Hanseatic League for the trade with Novgorod.

Helsingfors, the sea-port capital of Finland, stands on a peninsula in the gulf of that name, about 100 miles northwest of St. Petersburg. It has a good harbor, in which line-of-battle ships can lie, and it is defended by the almost impregnable citadel and fortifications of Sweaborg, which stand on a number of rocky islands at the entrance of the harbor. The town is regularly built, and possesses a university, transferred from Abo in 1827, a library of 80,000 volumes, also brought from Abo; a museum, observatory, state-house, churches, and botanical gardens. Manufactures—mill-cloth and linen; and a trade is carried on in corn and timber. Population, 21,698. Latitude, 60° 11′ N.; longitude, 24° 57′ E. This town was founded by Gustavus I., of Sweden, and was burned in 1741, during the war between Sweden and Russia. In 1855 Sweaborg was bombarded for two days by the allied English and French forces, when considerable damage was done to the interior defenses of the place. It is surmised that some arrangement has been made between Prussia and Russia by which these ports may be transferred to the former power, in return for aidin regard to the Czar's pretensions in the Black Sea.

THE UNWELCOME STRANGER.

TRUTH. "Pray, let me speak to her."
M. G—MB—TTA. "No, no, no—certainly not. She doesn't care to see you; and—in fact—you annoy us very much."

PARISIANS WAITING TO PROCURE RATION TICKETS.

UNCONSCIOUS BRAIN WORK.

As a general rule, the unconscious brain, like an enfant terrible, is extremely voracious. The "Palace of Truth" is nothing but a house full of absent-minded people who unconsciously say what they think of each other, when they consciously intend to be extremely flattering. But it also sometimes happens that falsehood has so far become second nature that a man's very injections, unconscious answers, and soliloquies may all be lies. Nothing can be more false to nature than the dramas and novels which are found scoundrels, in the privacy of an evening walk beside a hedge, unveil their secret plots in an

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER JOSEPH SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. Paper, 25 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LOUIS BEUTEL. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 18mo, Cloth, $1.75.

DU CHAILLU'S AJYMIA KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Ashango District, and Notices of the Chase of the Gorilla, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 18mo, Cloth, $1.75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE COUNTRY OF THE DWARFS. 18mo, 75 cents. LOST IN THE JUNGLE. My Apingi Kingdom. 8 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7.00.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. VOLUMES I. to LX.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo. Cloth, $2.00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870, together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DARGAN. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents: Cloth, $1.00.

LITERARY SELECTIONS for the Students of the Normal College for Young Ladies, in the City of New York. Printed by Authority of the Board of Education. 18mo, Cloth, $1.00.

WILSON'S INTERMEDIATE FIFTH READER; on the Original Plan of the School and Family Series; emphasizing, in brief, the Principles of Rhetoric, Criticism, Eloquence, and Oratory, as applied to both Prose and Poetry. The whole adapted to Elocutionary Instruction. By MARCUS WILSON. 12mo, $1.40.

FRENCH'S MENTAL ARITHMETIC; combining a Complete System of Rapid Computation, with the Correct Logic of the Solutions of Problems and the Analyses of Processes. By JOHN B. FRENCH, LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

HARPER'S SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. From the Discovery of America to the Year 1870. By DAVID B. SCOTT. Maps and Engravings. New Edition. 12mo, $1.50.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON GRAMMAR. A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language. In which its Forms are illustrated by those of Old Saxonic, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Old Saxon, Old Frisic, Old Norse, and Old High German. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College. Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "An Parser and Analyzer for Beginners," "An Anglo-Saxon Reader," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2.00.

MARCH'S ANGLO-SAXON READER; with Philological Notes, a Brief Grammar, and a Vocabulary. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, and Author of "A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2.00.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES! By MRS. EDGAR, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

LE BETE DU BON. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1.50.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

with a NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS, the best press ever made for the purpose, and which must be sent for the use of General Job Printing, Labels, Cards, Envelopes, &c. Designed for Business Men, for Clerks, Schools, and Society work, and also for Amateurs and Printers of national pretensions, or for a Village Newspaper and Job Office.

Price of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $50.

Send for Catalogue, with full instructions and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, to NOVELTY WORKS, 20 Frankfort Street, New York. MESS.: C. C. THOMPSON, 16 College Place, New York; RILEY, HOWELL & LEWENZ, 917 Market St., Philadelphia; A. C. KELLOGG, 66 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

SLEEP—Peaceful, Calm—SLEEP.

CHLORALINE.

Indorsed by the best medical minds of Europe and America as the only harmless substitute for Opium, Morphine, Laudanum, and all opiates and narcotics used for producing sleep. Chloraline will not cause headache, or any other disagreeable result following. T. DE WITT'S PAIN KING, 1 Barclay St., New York.

$10 $15 $20 $25

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Commenced August 1870).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and durability is so well known, that the manufacturers deem it requisite no recommendation. Prices—Full-Jeweled Patent Lever, 18 carat, in appearance, $10; the same in Extra Gold Cases costing $15. Those of extra fine finish, with $200 gold cases. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $20 each. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Address, Collins Metal, 21 to 26 Alley. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States. No goods sent for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.

All persons holding Patrons' Tickets in Fourth Series are hereby notified that the final is being distributed. Send for Circular and Illustrations. Address Washington Medallion Pen Co., N. Y.; including Stamp.

LATEST IMPORTED THICK NOVELTIES.—Magic Money Box, $1.00: Magic Dog Bottle, $1.00; Magic Cannon, $1.00; Magic Pistol, $1.00; Magic Bird Cage, $1.00; The Three Magic Balls, $2.00; Magic Wedding Rings, $1.50; Magic Money Till, $1.50; Magic Bag and Egg, $1.50; Magic Invisible Finger, $1.00; Magic Barrel, $1.50; Comical Dumbell, $1.00; Magic Photographs, 8 assorted packages, $1.00. Full directions sent with each trick. Good Books: 500 Puzzles, 40 cts.; Humble Bumbees, 40 cts.; Dialogues, 40 cts.; Dialogues, 40 cts.; Comic Speeches, 40 cts.; 500 Conundrums, 40 cts.; Fortune Telling, 40 cts.; Courtship Made Easy, 25 cts.; Bridal Etiquette, 25 cts.; Correct Letter Writer, 25 cts.; Book of Etiquette, 50 cts.; How to Win a Sweet-heart or Lover, 40 cts.; Correct Etiquette, 25 cts.; Book of Games, 25 cts. Books and Tricks sent by mail, postage paid, by THEA-NECTAR CO., 43 & 45 Vesey St., N. Y.

THEA-NECTAR IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

ONE DIME will secure by return mail copies of THE BROADWAY JOURNAL, containing the most attractive, and most popular young people's prize stories ever published. Subscription, $1.00 per year. Agents wanted. Liberal premiums and large cash commissions to agents. Order at once.

JOHN E. ALDEN & CO., Publishers,
Chicago, Ill.

THE FOUNDLING,

A group of statuary by John Rogers, Sculptor, called, COMING TO THE FARMER. Price, $16 each.

Parties sending these or other groups, or wishing to purchase, will address to their nearest Post-office, and they will be delivered at any point east of the Mississippi River (express charges prepaid), or will be sent, C. O. D. if ordered by freight, and a discount allowed in compensation.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to

JOHN ROGERS,
27 4th Ave., New York.

"THE CELEBRATED ACTOR," as he is universally called, has made a complete success of his new entertainment, and is now performing to crowded houses at the Theatre Comique, Broadway, corner of 27th St., New York. Price of Admission, 50 cents. Reserved seats, $1.00. Children under 10 years of age, half price. Doors open at 7½ o'clock. Performance commences at 8 o'clock.

Burnett's Cocoaine

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

HAIR DRESSING in the World.

YOUNG FOLKS' RURAL, largest and handsomest Young Folks' paper. Greatest success. Best stories and pictures. Splendid Cash Pay to Agents or Local Canvassers. Send for Specimen Copies, Agents' terms, Jewelry, &c. $3 per year, samples free. Address H. N. F. LOVELL, Pub. Western Branch, Chicago, Ill.

RUPTURE. ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY, relieved and cured. Pamphlets and Circulars, Private and Supporters. Late patients, indorsement, free (steel cased). Gentle, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Reliable. 1341 Chestnut St., Philada., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Sold by druggists.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS & CO., No. 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, during the holidays, at extremely low prices. Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, or installments. Second-hand Pianos, $50 to $100.

BRAINARD'S MUSICAL WORLD,

The best, cheapest, and most popular Musical Monthly published. 20 pages of New Music and original reading-matter in each number. Only $1 00 per annum. Specimen copies sent on receipt of Ten cents. Address S. BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, O.

$10 METALLIC SEWING MACHINE Price reduced to $10 Guaranteed for 5 years. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address Metallic Sewing Machine Co., Boston, Mass.

CORNS cured WITHOUT PAIN FOR 25 CENTS. Sold by all druggists, Shoe, and Notion Stores. Samples sent on receipt of 25 cents. Address, with stamp, for terms. Depot, 54 Pine Street, New York.

The Latest Combination Gold and Silver Case. Beautiful Ornaments. Stem-Winder. Stem-Setter. Dust-Proof. Handsome Dial. Reliable Movement. Perfect Time-Keeper. Elegant Appearance. Low Price.

The Patent Base Ball and Ball Pipe.

Lead Core. Durable in Construction. Rubber Cover. Perfect Shape. Elastic. Cheapest.

Agents and Dealers Wanted in every City and Town, and will pay for selling. Price List mailed. Sample Pipe and Ball sent post free for 20 cents.

E. HOOPER, 97½ Friar Pipes, 202 Broadway, N.Y.

☞ Sample of Extra Quality, with Cigar-Holder combined, for Superfine Smoking, mailed, with Cigar-Holder, 75 cts. Genuine Meerschaum Bowl, $1 50. Sent prepaid.

STEEL PENS.

American Branch of House,

91 JOHN ST., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

"IN FINAL WINDUP" Bell, Book and Candle are given. Elegant Game, Gilt-edged, Embossed, Chromo Cards, Agents' Outfit, 10 cts. Address, with stamp, CLINTON BROS., Clinton, Conn. This is a new 25 cent game. It is not a Lotto game. It is not a Bingo game. It is not a Parlor Authors game. It is not a Fortune Telling game. It is not a Game of Hearts. It is not a Game of Flowers. It is not a Game of Birds. It is not a Game of Beasts. It is not a Game of Fishes. It is not a Game of Reptiles. It is not a Game of Insects. It is not a Game of Trees. It is not a Game of Fruits. It is not a Game of Nuts. It is not a Game of Vegetables. It is not a Game of Minerals. It is not a Game of Precious Stones

"Fe! Fo! Fi! Fum! I smell the Blood of an Englishman!"

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

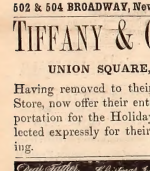
All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE,

Having removed to their New Store, now offer their entire importation for the Holidays—selected expressly for their opening.



Farnham, Gilbert, & Co.,

BANKERS,

No. 7 Wall Street, New York.

F. J. KALDENBERG, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Ambers, &c., 10 Wholesale and Retail. Repairing done in the best manner. Circulars sent Free to any part. P. O. Box 2,000. Store: 6 John St., next Driggs'. 72 Nassau St., cor. John. Paris Exposition Prize of 1867.

HORSE CLIPPING.—Adie's Patent Machine, price $5, for sale at 103 Broadway. Agents wanted. JOHN McCLURE.

N.

Robes de Chambre

AND

House Coats,

FOR

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.

E. A. NEWELL,

727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S

PURE CALIFORNIA

BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations and substitutions of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 39 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

E. R. DURKEE & CO.'S

CHALLENGE SAUCE

Pronounced by Connoisseurs

TO BE THE

BEST AMERICAN SAUCE,

AND

SUPERIOR TO ANY ENGLISH.

For enriching Gravies, and for imparting a grateful relish and zest to Roast Meats, Steaks, Cutlets, Chops, Fish, Game, Salads, Cheese, and all made dishes.

Sold by Dealers in First-Class Groceries generally.

MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICONS

of every description, and the largest collection of Slides in the United States. Send for a Catalogue.

W. MITCHELL SCALLISTER,

726 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty papers of other Matter. Twelfth #1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

AND NOT WEAR OUT.

Ask your storekeeper for it. Sample sent by mail for 50 cents. J. S. BIRCH & CO., 8 Maiden Lane.

BARNEY & HERVEY,

SOLE MANUFACTURERS OF

BARNEY & BERRY'S

CELEBRATED

CLUB, RINK,

AND

SILVER PLATED SKATES.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

USED BY ALL

Professionals and Amateur Skaters.

FOR SALE BY

Hardware and Skate Dealers

EVERY WHERE.

Club, $5.

Rink, $8.

Plated, $12.

To avoid FRAUD see that the NAMES OF BARNEY & BERRY ARE STAMPED ON Every Foot Plate.

SIZES:

Ladies, 8, 8½, 9, 9½ inches.

Gentlemen, 10, 10½, 11, 11½ "

500 PAIRS SOLD IN 1865
1,500 " " " 1866
2,500 " " " 1867
5,000 " " " 1868
15,000 " " " 1869

Every Pair Warranted.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OPEN FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine

MOSAICS,

and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES (all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

Hatter and Furrier,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,

719 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.

LADIES' FINE FURS.

Seal Sacques, $75, $90, $100.

Astrakhan Sacques, $35, $45, $50.

IMPORTER OF

ENGLISH HATS FOR GENTLEMEN WEAR.

Mason & Hamlin New Styles Cabinet Organs. Prices Reduced.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES free. MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO., Broadway, NEW YORK; 154 Tremont St., BOSTON.

'SNAV EVANS'S

EVANS' Prices

FOR THE

'SNAV EVANS' Best-Made

FALL & WINTER

Clothing

IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS.

$10, $13, $13 50, $15, $16, $18, $20, $22, $25, $27, $28.

REEFING JACKETS.

$6 00, $7 00, $8 00, $10 00, $12 00, $14 00, $16 00, $18 00, $22 00.

WINTER SUITS.

$14 00, $16 50, $18 00, $21 00, $23 00, $25, $27, $30.

PANTS.

Fashionable Stripes, $5, $6 50, $7, $7 50, $8, $8 50, $9.

In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

DOOLEY'S

THE YEAST BEST

POWDER

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

No. 716 CHEST'T ST. PHILADELPHIA.

C. BENKERT & SON

No. 79 WM. ST. N.Y.

BOOTS & SHOES

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 ..... Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N.Y.

Non-Priced Catalogue of all books of Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

UNRIVALED HOLIDAY NOVELTIES.

House Coats, Dressing Robes, "Our Fritz," "Chancellor," "Monarch" Scarfs,

Stylish and Fashionable,

With an Immense Variety of

HOSIERY,

Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin

GLOVES,

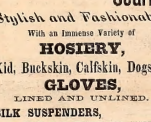
LINED AND UNLINED.

SILK SUSPENDERS,

INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.

Union Adams & Co.,

637 Broadway.



$50 Reward is offered by the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for a case of Catarrh which he can not cure. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail for 60 cents. A pamphlet on Catarrh free. Address Dr. R. V. PIERCE, No. 123 Seneca Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

"THE WATCHES made by the NEW YORK WATCH CO. are the BEST & CHEAPEST. Ask to See Them. Factory, Springfield, Mass.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. This machine makes the "lock stitch," alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The only first-class low-priced Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WADE'S DOUBLE INDEX

Finds any Name in a moment. Cloth, 232 pp. Postpaid for $1 75. Circular free. Address A. B. WADE, South Bend, Ind.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS. Ambers, Repairing and Boiling. Retail Store, 27 John St., middle of the block. Send for Circular.

AGENTS AND CANVASSERS, address the Acme Linen Marker Co., 33 Barclay St., N. Y., for circulars, samples, and particulars of a new and ingenious little instrument for marking clothing, cards, &c., superior to any thing ever invented for the purpose.

AGENTS, $100 a week and $2,000 in cash prizes. Information free. Address Agency, Box 5873, New York.

MALE & FEMALE.

MEDIKONES.—What are they? A new and wonderful discovery. Particulars of vital importance to all. Book sent free. Address or call on Drs. WELLS & STELL, 214 Grand St., N. Y. City.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 730.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1870. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT. PRICE TEN CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

ANXIOUS TIMES—FRENCH PEASANT WOMEN READING NEWS FROM THE BATTLE-FIELD.—[SEE PAGE 830.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1870.

☞ With this Number of the WEEKLY is published another Splendid and Attractive containing Five interesting illustrations of the WAR IN FRANCE, Poems, Stories, etc.

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

☞ The publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY take pleasure in announcing that next week they will issue a

MAGNIFICENT CHRISTMAS NUMBER of that Journal, with an

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

which they believe will present UNRIVALED ARTISTIC AND LITERARY ATTRACTIONS. Among the Illustrations will be a Full-Page Original Picture by W. L. SHEPPARD, Admiral FARRAGUT Welcoming NAST, the RAMSEY, the C. G. BUNK, drawn expressly for Christmas-time; Sketches of AMONG SERVICE and ADVENTURE, etc. Among the Literary attractions will be six Original Stories—a Story, by R. H. STODDARD, the scene of which is laid in New York; and the usual complement of short Stories, Poems, Humors, etc.

☞ Persons desiring to RENEW their Subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient AHEAD OF THE REGULAR RENEWAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS.

THE President's Message has now been carefully considered, and the general impression made by it is most favorable. It is a simple, direct document, the very plainness of the style, as in Mr. LINCOLN'S messages, indicating the honesty which is characteristic of the man. The immediate effect of the Message has been the confirmation of the general feeling that the Republican hold of the country is secure. Before the elections it was supposed that there was much dissatisfaction of many kinds within the party that a very serious reduction of the party's strength would be revealed. There had been much fault-finding criticism upon every point that the opposition really seemed to believe that the criticism meant radical hostility, and that it was not impossible that the Democratic majority in the House might be enough to replace its action. The elections dissipated this expectation. They showed the Republican party, despite the quarrels which had cost it several representatives, virtually unshaken. The suggestion of a new party which was also a very powerful journal at the West, lately Republican, was absolutely without response. There was a reaction of feeling from the criticism and censure of the year, although the retirement of General COX left an unpleasant feeling that the Administration was quite indifferent to civil service reform. But the Message has happily restored Republican unity of feeling, and its distinct expression of opinion upon subjects which had occasioned differences of feeling in the party is manly and sagacious.

But those who therefore conclude that the criticism was superfluous and ridiculous seem to us profoundly mistaken. An able Administration which suffers none earnestly and faithful counsel. Honorable men engaged in the details of government, and surrounded by interested politicians, are not familiar with the movement of public opinion, nor can they always accurately measure the popular effect of their measures. A faithful but friendly criticism is therefore what they especially need and wish. Power of every kind has flatterers enough, and a Republican Administration is not an exception to the rule. If the party press supported every Executive opinion and policy through thick and thin, it might very easily assert the ascendency of the party; and nothing is of higher promise for the permanency of Republican success in the country than the fact that the Republican press is sensible enough to be independent.

But criticism to be serviceable must be friendly. If the inevitable result of constant remark upon an Administration is the conviction in the reader's mind that the party press is thoroughly corrupt, or hopelessly under the direction of dishonest or incompetent leaders, it is hard to understand that the critic meant to intend to defeat the party. There is a sneering tone, which is unmistakably that of hostility, which intensely gratifies an enemy of the party or act criticised, and which also instantly alienates a friend. Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS'S criticisms of the Republican party in Massachusetts, for instance, were certainly not friendly. No Democratic orator in the country could have so delighted his party friends as Mr. PHILLIPS by his gibes and kicks at the only party from which real progress in the government can be expected. It was an illustration of the kind of criticism which exasperates and does not reform. But there is another kind which has not been spared; and to say, as we observe some papers do say, with a smile, that every thing would have proceeded in exactly the same way if there had been no remark, is to beg the question, and to assert that the Administration can not, or will not, be influenced by criticism—an assertion which is so disparaging that no sincere friend of the President or of his party would willingly believe it.

The Message shows President GRANT to be in sympathy with the best feeling and purpose of the party. His position upon the reverse reform question, as it is rather vaguely called, is clearly defined, and is that of the mass of his friends. It involves that mutual concession which we have formerly mentioned as indispensable. If reverse reform implies raising the revenue by direct taxation, the President says that he is opposed to it. Still more is he opposed to it, of course, if it means any form of repudiation. He was not called to observe, although he does not mention the fact, that the repudiators, and those who are indifferent to the honest fulfillment of their national obligations, are all loud for reverse reform; and that the only practical effect of the cry has been to bring the party to a cry of revenue reform would be to bring the Democratic party into power—a party whose stand is identical in its policy of repudiation. If there must be a tariff, it is grateful to the President so far as it encourages home production because indispensable to national independence, and as living wages; and this tariff he would have levied upon luxuries. In these views the President undoubtedly speaks the general conviction of the country.

His plea to this Congress to remedy the abuse known as the civil service system. He would have a law which would regulate the manner of appointments. He argues that as there is no duty which so much embarrasses every department as this thankless and arduous appointment, so there is no reform which will be memorable as those of a President of the United States at a time when the number of offices is so enormously multiplied as now, and does not secure the best men, and often not even fit men, for a public place. The elevation and purification of the civil service of the government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States. If the Republican party can make this distinctly and emphatic declaration of the President, it has the opportunity opened to it of instantly awakening the most enthusiastic support of the most intelligent and, in many senses, the best part of the country.

There are other points of the Message upon which there will be differences of opinion. But they are not points of Republican policy. The general disappointment which has been so unfavorably defined in the closing paragraph: honesty, ability, and economy of administration; reduction of taxation by a tariff which gradually follow will admit, and so as to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number; reform in the treatment of the Indians; the civil service reform, and finally, the purity of elections. With these the President separately urges the most careful attention to the subject of the revenue which is responsible to good government. This is the summary of a policy which the country demands, and which unquestionably commands the most progress, and which is to be expected only from the Republican party.

HAS ENGLAND SURRENDERED?

THE Government of Great Britain is accused of "surrender" to Russia because it has assented to a conference upon the question of the Black Sea. But there is no surrender in assenting to a conference. On the contrary, his first note to Prince GORTSCHAKOFF, which was considered to be belligerent, distinctly stated that England could not sanction the course announced by Russia; but that if Russia had invited a conference, England would have gladly accepted it. Now a conference is proposed. Russia, in accepting it, certainly modifies its contemplated action, but the Prime Minister's declaration that there shall be no foregone conclusion when the conference assembles. There is no surrender here. It is the result of calm reason and good sense. The principle laid down by Lord GRANVILLE was undoubtedly just—that a solid treaty could not be made by the momentary interpretation of any single signer. But war was not, even in such a case, unavoidable. Joint treaties, like that of Vienna, for instance, were often violated by some of the parties without occasioning war. But whether, even supposing Great Britain to have actually asserted the Great Britain, it was advisable to go to war, was a different question, and one to be decided upon the most careful and deliberate consideration of the best interests of England.

To insist that there has been a surrender because there is to be no war is to assume that those who, for their own purposes, would gladly see a war. But what has Europe or America to gain by a war between Russia and England, or by a general European war? What incalculable suffering the people of Europe, especially of Germany and France, must for many a year endure because of the present terrible war in France! What unspeakable misery among the people followed the Thirty Years' War, and the wars of the Succession! A point of honor, as it is called, between nations may be as shadowy and Quixotic as between individuals, and a war for the sake of "honor" may be as black a crime, but indefinitely multiplied by its greater extent, as a duel between two men. Those who hoped for a war because of a wish to see England, in a sense, at our mercy, under the opportunity to wink at retaliation for the Alabama, would probably have applauded General BUTLER'S Boston speech. But they are not very favorable specimens of Americans. We really believe that war is a misfortune, let us, at least, make some little honorable effort to avoid it. The low and cherish ever spark is not the surest way of preventing a flame.

In the last ten years we have all seen two great wars, and we can see that the third is now raging. The first was as truly a holy war as was ever waged. It was in defense of a government and of a people struggling for human liberty. To have yielded to the demands of slavery and secession would have been the most fatal blow of the highest human interests, and of the mildest and most reasonable government in the world. But the war in France is not which is not wantonly provoked, in which the French adopted instead of repudiating, and which threatens their destruction. LOUIS NAPOLEON had some theory of the "honor" of France demanding war. But what could he possibly know about honor? Is any nation justified in making war until it has exhausted every honorable means of keeping the peace? Is it a "surrender" to agree to confer amicably with a power upon a proposed action, which, in the nature of the case, he is at liberty to take? Would not a partner who refused to confer, after it had himself suggested a conference, justly be regarded as worthy of ostracism?

THE DUTY OF THE MAJORITY.

THE financial question will become every day more important. Interest in what is called revenue reform is one of the signs of this tendency, and, as we referred to say when the difference in Missouri declared itself, it is desirable for the Republican party to determine its position. Statesmanship, of course, is the power of dealing with the actual situation; and what is that? It is not that as the necessarily heavy taxation created by the people to study the subject, the great non-manufacturing part of the population, which is, perhaps, nine-tenths of the whole, will see that they are practically for the advantage of the one-tenth? We do not now say whether it is not really a general advantage for which the nine-tenths ought to be willing to pay. But as a fact they will not see this, and the sudden and general reduction of the tariff which party failure would be disastrous to great classes of laborers. It should be remembered that the labor of the country is fairly divided upon the present system, and that a swift radical change of any kind would be a wide calamity. Extreme legislation upon this subject is therefore to be most warmly deprecated.

But there is a constant pressure toward this extreme legislation. The manufactories, or the protected class, were very unwilling to assent to any reduction whatever of the duties upon foreign goods, upon which their own interests had been seriously diminished. Their policy seems to be to demand constantly increasing duties. The number of idlers wants protection because the maker of chairs has it. Legislators are not always chosen for their knowledge of the subject, but are often unable to see why B should not have the same favor from government that A enjoys. The consequence is that the tendency of a tariff is to constant increase. But if the tendency of thought is, as we have suggested, under the pressure of taxation, to reduce rapid reductions, the more extreme the legislation and the higher the tariff, the more disastrous the possible result will be. Is not the true policy of the Republican party evident? Whether a Representative be a free-trader or a protectionist, ought he not to endorse his action to the actual situation? If he be free-traders, as they improperly call themselves, if they do not wish free trade, should not Hennessy and Kelley, and should sweep away all the duties upon industries which now employ large numbers of laborers, the action would be bold, not statesmanlike. And it would be the same if the protectionists should force the tariff up to still heavier rates.

The mischief of our tariff legislation has hitherto been the confusion and paralysis which result from unsteady action. Now a high tariff and now a low, is a policy of incessant uncertainty, and consequently lamentable loss. The duty upon salt, for instance, is very high at present, but than it should be. It would be disastrously unwise to reduce the duty so suddenly and enormously as to deprive owners of their salt. However sound the theory of free trade may be, however true it may be that different countries produce different articles of consumption, and that perfect freedom of exchange would not only secure to all countries what they want at the cheapest rates, but would also tend by a consequence of mutual dependence to keep the peace of the world, yet as society is not organized upon that principle, its sudden introduction, like that of fresh air under certain circumstances to an invalid, would be lamentable.

The true policy of administration, therefore, is the avoidance of extreme legislation; and as the protectionists are probably in the majority, their first care should be to reduce and simplify the tariff. They should avoid the tendency to heighten the duties in any direction, and strenuously cultivate that of lowering them in all. If, indeed, prohibitions were desirable, or if high protection could stand the light of the modern and growing thought in the country, which it certainly can not, then a steady hold of high duties would be politic. But if our judgment of the sure tendency of opinion be correct, it is wise statesmanship to act accordingly, and to save the country the consequences of a sudden demolition of the high tariff policy. The majority should endeavor to meet the growing change in sentiment, and to secure that steadiness which is essential to confidence and prosperity. This can be done without being done gradually; and that is the significance of the President's remark in his Message: "A new revenue reform can not be made in a day, but must be the work of national legislation and time."

AMERICA AND ROME.

THE address of the American Roman Catholics to the Pope upon occasion of the occupation of Rome by the Italians, in accordance with the almost unanimous wish of the Roman people, is an extraordinary document. The address states that the American Roman Catholics "revere the sacred sovereignty of the Holy See over its temporal domain." Now the despotic rule of the governor of a certain part of Italy is in no sense more "sacred" because he is also the chief officer of an ecclesiastical organization than the unconstitutional rule of VICTORIA in England would be because she is also the head of the English Church. The spiritual sovereignty of the Pope may be sacred to those who are of his Church, but his temporal government, which was probably the worst in Christendom, was in no conceivable sense "sacred." And if these Americans "repudiate and condemn the lawless injustice" which has respectfully and considerately removed the temporal dominion of the Pope, what do they think and say of the lawless injustice of the Papal rule over the wretched people whose subject he is? Is it the sympathy of American Roman Catholics devoted to the one man only who rules, and not to the million of men who are ruled?

In this document these Americans also profess faith in the divine right of rulers. They declare that the Vicar of Christ on the Papal governor of Rome is entitled by divine right to complete liberty in the exercise of his office, and that he has "the most undoubted human rights to civil princedom," which is necessary to that liberty. If this really means any thing, it is that the Pope has the divine right to govern a million of men as he chooses, because otherwise he could not properly fulfill his ecclesiastical functions. It is scarcely needful to consider it a little. The very necessity of saying such things, if any thing at all were said, should have suggested to American citizens, of whatever faith, that the temporal sovereignty of the Pope could not be successfully defended. Nothing can be more preposterous than such an argument for despotism as this address proclaims. And not content with asserting that the Pope has the divine right to be a temporal irresponsible monarch, it proceeds to allege that these Americans have a right, as Roman Catholics, to the Papal government of their completely exempted from and independent of all civil authority, for in no other condition could their intercourse with him be free and unrestricted."

This, again, is the statement that, unless the Bishop of Rome is an absolute as well as a temporal monarch, his Papal functions are impeded. But if this be so, the argument is much more sweeping than the address seems to see. For why should that absolute temporal power be limited to a certain tract in the centre of Italy? The Pope is no more independent, in that sense, as the head of a little state of less than a million of inhabitants, as history shows, than he would be as the head of the kingdom of Italy. Indeed, he is not so independent, as the head of a scant million of unwilling subjects, as he is as master of a square mile of territory guaranteed by the power of Italy. The Pope's independence of all civil authority certainly does not depend upon the extent of the domain governed by him. He may be as independent in a single palace, under guarantees, as he ever was in the Roman states. But if power and absolute political supremacy over its population are indispensable to this independence, there must be a domain not a people so large as to make foreign coercion impossible. So it is merely absurd to insist upon his late little Roman states as satisfying the conditions of independence.

Moreover, if he must be "independent of all civil authority," no other state in the world may rightfully put any barrier in the way. If, therefore, the Government of the United States continues to recognize the Government of the kingdom of Italy, after the "sacrilegious violence" with which it has "assaulted" the governor of Rome, the United States deny the divine Papal right to the absolute rule of a people who were never consulted, and the United States violate the right of American Roman Catholics to free and unrestricted intercourse with the head of their Church. And all this because the Pope, instead of remaining the ruler of a part of a city. The allegation of the address is that certain Italians must be subject to a government which they unanimously abhor in order that certain Americans may have free access to their chief bishop. It is certainly remarkable that any Americans should define their religious rights to be invaded unless the political rights of another people are destroyed.

This address will suggest to other Americans that the only religious denomination in the country which feels itself to be injured by the progress of political liberty elsewhere is the only denomination which steadily pursues political purposes among ourselves.

THE PERILS OF LETTER-WRITING.

THERE is nothing more dangerous to the ambition of a public man than letter-writing. Whatever a man privately writes at any time, under any circumstances, is sure to be published, and, of course, interpreted without consideration of any circumstance whatever. Indeed, the right of the public to say that anything written to a person in whom there is public interest is now so broadly asserted that no man who is famous, or who may become famous, can write a note declining an invitation to dine with a friend without incurring the risk of its earlier or later publicity. A great deal of very amusing, entertaining and really illustrative literature, however, is of this personal kind, and all that can be fairly said is that there is danger involved in the publication. It is not characteristic information about noted persons, it is troubling gossip, which makes the chief interest of the annalists. Some of the most valuable books are in the strictest sense personal memoirs and private correspondence, which, of course, are not in the form, and the publication of which gratifies every body and harms nobody.

Those who are in official position, however, ought to feel that whatever they say of official personages and actions, in dispatches to other official personages, throws upon them a responsibility which they can not avoid. Nor ought they to wish to avoid it. An officer in the military or naval service, for instance, would certainly not wish that any thing of a fellow-officer which he does not believe; while a man who is so far mastered by his feelings as to express intemperately will honestly confess that he was angry and did wrong. But the pen is a perilous servant; its very fidelity betrays the writer. I recollect a remarkable moment of foolish passion. It confounds a man by his own folly. There is a subtle little picture, by one of the younger artists in England, called "How they met themselves." A haggard man and woman suddenly encounter a ghostly reflection of their youth and pride—their former, better selves. In the same way, but reversely, the calm man of to-day is confronted in his letter-writing with the angry man of yesterday, and he is confounded to think that it is he.

Admiral PORTER was thus confounded probably when he read his old letter to Secretary WELLES about General GRANT. The difficulty of the situation, however, was not that he had written the letter, nor that it was published, but that he had not long ago told the President that at the time of the FORT FISHER attack he had written of him in a manner which he now believed to be not justified. Then the weapon would have been harmlessly aimed at the Admiral, for the charge would have been drawn. And the President's feeling of surprise would have been avoided, because it did not appear that he had ever been told that Admiral PORTER thought ill of him, but that if he thought ill he should have seemed friendly; or that if he were really friendly, he should not have removed the sting of an earlier expression of ill-feeling by confession. It is always easy, indeed, to be wise after the event. But this case was very simple. The Admiral knew of the letter, and he must also have known how very fragile the seal of secrecy was.

If, however, the grade of admiral in the navy be retained, the fact that Admiral PORTER thought and wrote in an unfriendly tone of General GRANT does not make him less fit for the position, unless, indeed, upon a consideration of the circumstances, the President should feel that there has been duplicity. Meanwhile the event will have the good effect of stimulating other gentlemen similarly situated to put their personal relations upon a more stable ground, to destroy all compromising letters upon which they can lay hand, and, above all, to write none which may be hereafter wrested into weapons to beat them about the head.

REPUBLICAN QUARRELS.

EVERY faithful Republican who thinks that the continued power of that party is essential to the national welfare has a right to demand harmony among the party chiefs. Quarrels at head-quarters will not make a peaceful camp. And that there are quarrels, serious and fierce, we all know. The President and Senators SUMNER and SCHURZ, for instance, are not friendly. The New York Senators are alienated from each other, and we recall, with profound regret, a passage between two of the most eminent Republican Senators upon the floor of the Senate on the 4th of July last. The mischief of these differences is incalculable. They may defeat the policy of the Administration, and they may very easily defeat the party in its Presidential struggle. It is impossible that the difficulty in the State of New York did defeat the party in November. It would not have been a very difficult Democratic collections made by various expeditions, particularly those of Professor LOUIS AGASSIZ and Professor MARSH, of Yale, both of whom, at the head of large parties, have been engaged during the past summer in exploring various portions of the West. Dr. LEIDY has already secured a large number of fossils gathered by Dr. HAYDEN, Mr. CLARENCE KING, and Mr. CONDON, including species of lophiodon, oreodon, rhinoceros, etc. Among the reptiles are a new crocodile of large size and a number of turtles.

It is now announced authoritatively that the odium attaching to the British government of refusing to render any assistance to observations of the eclipse of December is undeserved, and that the blame, if any there be, applies rather to negligence of a former committee having the matter in charge. It seems that the transit was actually brought, even informally, to the notice of the government, every assistance was promised, and arrangements are now being made to carry the whole matter into effect. A ship is to be furnished to transport the observers to Spain, and funds supplied to take others over-land to Naples, with a view to going from to Messina. The various European governments have been requested to aid the different parties, and the British government in other ways has arranged all it was possible to bear toward the success of the expedition.

Professor NORDENSKJOLD, the leader of the last Swedish expedition to Spitzbergen, has visited Greenland, for the same pleasant manner, for the purpose of engaging dogs to be used in his polar exploration of next year. A very interesting letter received from him we learn that no less successful a party could be found in the interior of Greenland, over the inland ice, about thirty or forty nautical miles. He intended to have arrived at 70th of July from Auleitsivik Fiord, an inlet in about 68° north latitude. This makes an addition to the number of more recent expeditions for explorations of the interior of Greenland, the others, as is well known, being those of Dr. HAYES, KIELSEN, DR. RINK and BROWN, MR. E. WITMPER, and MR. A. PETERMANN.

The last number of the American Journal of Science records the discovery of a large part of the skeleton of the mastodon near Iliopolis, Illinois. One of the tusks proved to be nearly ten feet in length, and twenty-nine inches in circumference three feet from the lower end. All the bones were found in a state of preservation, and of a dark, spongy, and porous appearance. It is probable that the specimens will be added to the collection of fossils now being gathered together by Professor WORTHEN for the State Museum.

According to the official report from the Treasury Department, it is stated that during the year ending June 30, 1870, 2292 vessels, having an aggregate of 91,460 tons, were engaged in the American fisheries. The tonnage for the year ending June 30, 1869, showed a total of 714 vessels, of about 36,700 tons, exhibiting a very gratifying increase in the magnitude of the branch of marine industry.

It is stated that the United States of Colombia having the control of the export about three and a half millions of pounds of cinchona bark, and more than four hundred thousand dollars worth.

Professor PHILLIPS, of the Museum at Oxford, is very desirous of learning the relationship between the length and weight of crocodiles and alligators of all ages, and requests the friends of science to make as many experiments on this subject as possible, and to transmit the result to the University Museum at Oxford. MR. BUCKLAND recommends that the fish supplied for experiment upon it be first placed in a bag, the common property to each of our readers as may visit Florida this winter, in hopes that the many specimens of sea-fish in that section there will be utilized. Information sent to the American Journal of Magazine, 81 Nassau street, or to the Secretary, Connecticut Journal of Science, at New Haven, Connecticut, and thus made accessible to Professor PHILLIPS.

The American Journal of Science, which has for the many years been the principal exponent of scientific activity in the United States, and which, beginning in 1818, was published as a quarterly for the fourth of a century, and then for some time as a monthly, has for the last few months been issued in the beginning of the month, and will be issued in the beginning of coming year as a monthly, and will appear regularly on the second day before the public, and by come means more faithfully the progress of science than it has been under its former plan. The Journal will continue to be edited by Professors SILLIMAN and DANA, with the co-operation of eminent men of science in New England, and will be issued in the same form by that material increase of the subscription list which it is so well deserves.

Panama papers inform us that the heaviest rain experienced at Aspinwall for many years occurred on the 3d of September, when fell and sixty-three hundredths of water having fallen in the middle of the day in the space of a little over three hours.

At the late meeting of the British Association a committee, consisting of Sir RODERICK MURCHISON, Sir CHARLES LYELL, Mr. FINDLAY, and Admiral HAY, was appointed for the purpose of bringing before the Lords of the Commissioners of the Admiralty the importance of revising the survey of the west coast of South America, with a view to ascertaining what changes have taken place in the coast line since the earthquakes on that coast. MR. CLEMENTS MARKHAM was appointed secretary of the committee.

Great interest has been felt in regard to the results to be expected from the deep-sea dredgings of the present year by the steamer Porcupine, those of last year being so entirely unexpected and remarkable. We learn from other foreign exchanges that the methods of last year have been carefully followed during the present, and that soundings, dredgings, and analyses of sea-water have been made at different depths down to fifteen hundred fathoms. A large part of the Mediterranean basin has been explored, with satisfactory results, and plans have been taken to make out and define, as far as possible, the connections of the current of Gibraltar, on the surface, sets through the Strait of Gibraltar to the eastward.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 5.—Commencement of the third session of the Forty-first Congress. Nearly all the members were in their places. After the usual formalities of the opening proceedings, the President's message was delivered, and laid on the table until the standing committees should be announced. The message was received by the House in a manner "to indicate the satisfaction of United States notes and fractional currency, to the extent of the reduction of the national banks, and to promote the return to specie payments." The President's message was read.—In the Senate it was moved to the roll-call. Delegations were called from the different States, and congratulations passed on the opening.

December 6.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced to authorize the election of a delegate from the Indian Territory, and also to pass the repeal of the income tax.—In the House, three bills were introduced for the repeal of the income tax, and one for the appointment of a commission to revise the system of navigation and commercial interests of the country. One of these provided for the issuance of new 7-30 national currency, and publishing vessels for the foreign trade, and two others for the repeal of certain restrictions, for the legality in United States ports of foreign-built vessels.

December 7.—In the Senate, a bill was submitted giving to the American and East India Telegraph Company the sole right, for twenty-one years, to lay a cable from the Pacific coast to Asia, the work to be begun within two years and completed within three years, and the Navy Department to assist in making surveys and laying the cable.—In the House, a bill was introduced providing for the gradual resumption of specie payments. A resolution was adopted inquiring into the seizure of the British schooner-of-war by the Canadian authorities, and one was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs making inquiry regarding the intention of any European power to establish a port at Samana suitable for a naval station to be ceded to be unfriendly to the United States, and in contravention of the Monroe policy.

December 8.—In the Senate, MR. WILSON introduced a bill to prevent persons employed in the government employ for political or other purposes. Any official allowing such assessment to be made is to be dismissed. The penalty is not to be less nor exceeding $5,000.—In the House, a bill giving the privilege of pressure or gratuities to government officers for any purpose in connection with their official duties.—In the House, a bill was passed to admit free the trunking privileges.

December 9.—The House was not in session.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced to restore the rank of rear-Admiral and Vice-Admiral in the navy after vacancies occur in the same, and to reduce the number of Rear-Admirals to three, and of Commodores to six, by omission to fill vacancies occurring hereafter.

GENERAL DOMESTIC ITEMS.

On the 8th inst. the Roman Catholic of Buffalo made a public demonstration of sympathy with the Pope, a procession of about ten thousand persons bearing banners and emblems expressing their homage and obedience to the Holy See, sympathy in the "affliction and captivity" to which the Pope and the Church are subjected, condemnation of the Italian occupation of Rome, a protest against the violation of the right of Catholics to be governed by a chief exempt from and independent of all civil power, a petition to old recognize PIUS IX. as the lawful King of Rome, and a pledge of co-operation in any movement of the Catholic world to maintain the integrity of his sovereignty.

General HIRAM Walbridge died in Utica city on the 6th inst., in the seventy-sixth year of age.

The claim against the United States Government for seizure of the steamer Lizzie Argenstaff was paid by Secretary BOUTWELL.

The Navajoe Indians have begun a war upon the Apaches.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR IN FRANCE.

GENERAL DECROUY issued an order to his army at Montmedy that he was both willing to say them after two days of glorious battles they had recrossed the Marne, destroying their effects, to establish a more favorable opportunity to break through the Prussian investment.

Orleans was reoccupied by the Prussians on the 4th instant, after defeat of the army of the Loire. The force lost 10,000 prisoners, 77 cannon, and four gun-boats on the Loire.

The provisional government have established a mint and coin in Strasburg, in supersession of a German one.

The Prussians are about to invest Havre, and French war-boats are said to have entered the port to protect the city.

The Prussian government has informed the Grand Duke of Luxembourg that, as he has allowed a violation of the neutrality of the Grand Duchy by the French, Prussia will no longer respect the neutrality of Luxembourg, which was bound by treaty of 1867.

Two English houses, it is said, have contracted to supply the Germans with 1,000 locomotives.

The French officers and men are reported to be in a very destitute condition in the hospitals of the Bonapartes.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

A note from Count Bismarck was received by the representatives of the North German Empire at the Hague, stating that King William had accepted the title granting of the Russian demand is essential to the peace of Europe.

After acknowledging the receipt of a petition from Ireland for British intervention in favor of the temporal power of the Pope, MR. Gladstone says the government of Great Britain, pursuing its changes in Roman since the election of PIUS IX., but it feels bound to maintain the principles provided for protection the Papacy. In the mean time, he adds, Italy can if fit regimes to protect the Pope's freedom and maintain his dignity.

Travel and Adventure.

PREPARED
EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

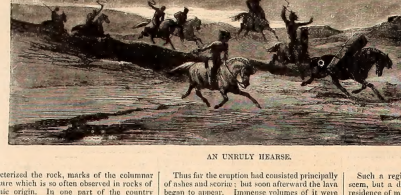
A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Singular Encounter.—An Unruly Hearse.—Sagacious Dog.—New Style of Cabin Architecture.—The Stream of Lava and the Church.—The Mounds of Hialtadal.—Conclusion of the Journey.

THE hints alluded to in the preceding chapter became so numerous that M. Nougaret was obliged at last to put a peremptory stop to them, even at the risk of wounding the feelings of the country people who desired to pay him attention. He says he counted one day, before he gave up making these calls, and found that the number of cups of coffee that he had to drink was twenty-seven.

He relates one very singular encounter which he met with on his journey. It was a funeral procession, if procession it might be called, though it consisted of a cavalcade conveying a corpse through the country to a church, for interment in the burying-ground adjoining it. The mule coffin had been lashed upon the back of a horse, and so, of course, with such a load upon his back there would be no room for a rider, the horse could only be sent forward free, and followed up by those behind. It seems that, in consequence of some excitement or other, the horse had escaped from control, and, when M. Nougaret met the party, was running away, the whole troop following him with shouts and outcries, intended to bring him to a halt. The coffin had become loosened from its fastenings, and was in great danger of slipping down the horse's side, and perhaps of falling off entirely. Very soon after M. Nougaret came up with this party the horse was stopped, the coffin readjusted, and the funeral cavalcade went on.



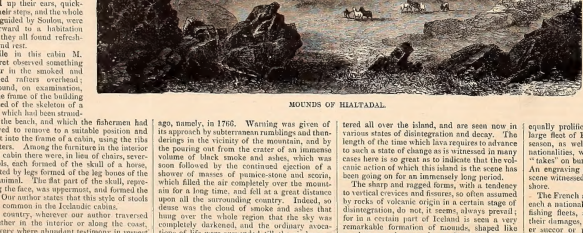
AN UNRULY HEARSE.

On one occasion night was coming on—that is to say, the part of the twenty-four hours which in these latitudes passes for night—and it began to rain. There was no house in sight, and the way was becoming difficult and dangerous. The guide had a dog named Soulon. This dog, seeming to perceive the embarrassment of his master, and understanding the cause of it, began at once to look out for a lodging for the night, according to his ideas of the proper mode of proceeding. He ran to and fro, first on one side of the path and then on the other, barking violently, and then listening for a response. At length the response came, in the form of the distant barking of other dogs. The tired and jaded horses seemed to be inspired with new strength and energy by the sound. They pricked up their ears, quickened their steps, and the whole party, guided by Soulon, were led forward to a habitation where they all found refreshment and rest.

While in this cabin M. Nougaret observed something peculiar in the smoked and darkened rafters overhead. He found, on examination, that the frame of the building consisted of the skeleton of a whale, which had been stranded on the beach, and which the fishermen had contrived to remove to a suitable position and to erect into the frame of a cabin, using the ribs for rafters. Among the furniture in the interior of this cabin there were, in lieu of chairs, several stools, each formed of the skull of a horse, supported by legs formed of the leg bones of the same animal. The flat part of the skull, representing the face, was uppermost, and formed the seat. One author states that this style of stools is very common in the Icelandic cabins.

The country, wherever our author traversed it, whether in the interior or along the coast, gave every where abundant testimony in respect to its volcanic origin, being formed of ancient beds of lava in every stage of disintegration and decay, and presenting in the peaks and pinnacles, and in the ragged fissures and chasms which characterized the rock, marks of the columnar structure which is so often observed in rocks of volcanic origin. In one part of the country there was a church in the midst of a level plain, which was surrounded by a range of these ragged piles. The legend in respect to it is that it was built before the eruption of the lava took place from which these rocks were formed, and that the stream, when in its flow it approached the spot, made a grand detour, out of respect to the sacredness of the place, and thus left the church and the area around it unharmed.

The magnitude and violence of the eruptions of Mount Hecla, in former years, have been such that the imagination in vain attempts to comprehend the extent and grandeur of the effects which have resulted from them. One of the latest great eruptions took place about one hundred years ago, namely, in 1766. Warning was given of its approach by subterranean rumblings and thunderings in the vicinity of the mountain, and by the pouring out from the crater of an immense volume of black smoke and ashes, which was soon followed by the continued ejection of a shower of masses of pumice-stone and scoria, which filled the air completely over the mountain for a long time, and fell at a great distance upon all the surrounding country. Indeed, so dense was the cloud of smoke and ashes that hung over the whole region that the sky was completely darkened, and the ordinary avocations of life were suspended till the air became clear again. And when it did become clear, the ashes which subsided from it covered the ground to a depth of four inches for a hundred miles around!



MOUNDS OF HIALTADAL.

Thus far the eruption had consisted principally of ashes and scoria; but soon afterward the lava began to appear. Immense volumes of it were poured out, and began to flow in vast molten streams to great distances over the country. The ice and snow upon and around the summit were melted too, and poured down such floods of mud and water over the surrounding country as to produce in many places the most disastrous inundations. The mountain itself was, moreover, so heated during the operation that it required thirty years for it to become cool, so that snow could lodge and ice form on its flanks again. It did not, indeed, appear to return to its former condition until about 1810; and then in 1845 a new eruption took place, though it was not so violent as the one which preceded it.

The remains of ancient beds of lava are scattered all over the island, and are seen now in various states of disintegration and decay. The length of the time which lava requires to advance to such a state of change as is witnessed in many cases here is so great as to indicate that the volcanic action of which this island is the scene has been going on for an immensely long period.

The sharp and rugged forms, with a tendency to vertical crevices and fissures, so often assumed by rocks of volcanic origin in a certain stage of disintegration, do not, it seems, always prevail; for in a certain part of Iceland is seen a very remarkable formation of mounds, shaped like royal tents, and arranged over the plain on which they stand in a manner which gives them quite an artificial appearance. The name of the place where these mounds occur is Hialtadal: it is situated in the northeastern part of the island.

Such a region as this must form, it would seem, but a dreary and desolate home for the residence of man; and the general aspect of the habitations and their surroundings, as they presented themselves to the view of our traveler in the course of his journey, appeared to him very little attractive. There was, however, one exception. While enjoying the hospitality of the minister at one of the little hamlets that he visited, he was much impressed with the picturesqueness of the situation of the church and of the minister's residence, and with the beauty of the night. The supper, and the Latin conversation which accompanied and followed it, occupied so much time, and the excitement produced in the family by such an arrival was so great, that it was past midnight before they were ready to retire to their beds. The sun, after dipping a little way below the horizon, was beginning to appear again. M. Nougaret and the minister were in the open air, before the house, smoking their pipes. The children were quiet, the cows were lying quietly and ruminating contentedly, the sky was clear and beautiful, and the air was soft and bland. The whole scene was one of romantic calmness and repose.

"What a pleasant evening," said M. Nougaret, "and what a charming scene! How happy your life must be here!"

The minister took his pipe from his mouth, and asked the traveler,

"Should you be happy to live here?"

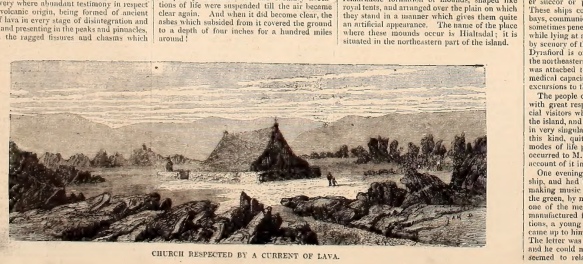
M. Nougaret admitted that he found this question somewhat embarrassing.

But dreary and desolate as such a region must be as a home for human families, all the littoral portions of it swarm with animal life. The shores both of the interior and the exterior waters abound with birds of many species, which flock there in countless millions to rear their young on the neighboring rocks, gathering their sustenance, in the mean while, for themselves and their families, from the waters of the marshes, rivers, and lakes. The waters of the sea, along all the shores of the island, are equally prolific; and they are the resort of a large fleet of French fishermen in the summer season, as well as of those of other European nationalities, who fish for cod, and dry their "takes" on bundles of sticks set up on the land. An engraving on our next page represents the scene witnessed among the fishing vessels of the shore.

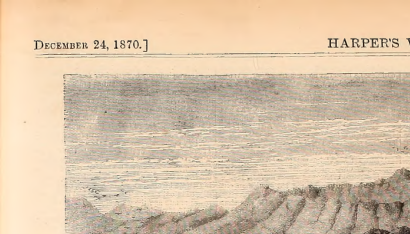
The French and the Danish governments send each a national vessel every season to visit those fishing fleets, and aid the fishermen to repair their damages, and also to afford them any officer succor or protection that they may need. These ships coast around the island, enter the bays, communicate with the principal towns, and sometimes penetrate into interior harbors, where, while lying at anchor, they are often surrounded by scenery of the most imposing grandeur. The Dryadiad is one of these harbors, situated in the northeastern part of the island. M. Nougaret was attached to the French ship Pandora, in a medical capacity, at the time that he made his excursions to the Geysers and to Hecla.

The people of the country look up, of course, with great respect to the ships, and to the official visitors which they bring every summer to the island, and often apply to the latter for relief in very singular emergencies. One instance of this kind, quite illustrative of the ideas and modes of life prevailing on these lonely shores, occurred to M. Nougaret, and we will repeat his account of it in closing this article.

One evening, when he was ashore from his ship, and had been spending an hour or two in making music for the peasants to dance to on the green, by means of a kind of tin flute which one of the mechanics on board the ship had manufactured for the purpose under his directions, a young woman with a child in her arms came up to him and handed him a letter to read. The letter was written in the Icelandic tongue, and he could make nothing of it, except that it seemed to relate to a man named Le Blanc.



CHURCH RESPECTED BY A CURRENT OF LAVA.



ABUNDANCE OF ANIMAL LIFE ON SHORE.

There was nobody in the company with whom he could communicate, except by signs, and he was accordingly quite perplexed to know what the latter meant, and what the poor woman wanted.

In the midst of his perplexity it so happened that a minister came to the place, and M. Nougaret, being able to communicate with him in Latin, gave him the letter, and asked what it meant. The minister read it, and made some inquiries of the woman, and then reported the case to M. Nougaret, saying that some time previously, at the close of a season, a French sailor by the name of Le Blanc had been wrecked on the coast, and had found refuge in the family of the father of this young woman. That, before long, he proposed marriage to the young woman, and, with her father's consent, they were married. The sailor spent the winter with them, but in the spring he went to Reykjavik, the capital, ostensibly to seek some employment, and since then they had heard nothing from him. They supposed that he had gone to Europe; and as the woman had heard that M. Nougaret came from France, she came to him to inquire whether he had seen her husband there, and if he could tell her what had become of him.

When M. Nougaret, through the interpreter, said that he had not seen the man, she seemed surprised, and asked the minister whether M. Nougaret did not come from France. If he came from France he must have seen her husband, she thought, if he was there. Her ideas of the extent and population of France were evidently not so enlarged as the facts would warrant.

She looked very disconsolate and sad when she found that she could not learn any tidings of her husband from the stranger. She talked a moment with the minister, and then the minister, addressing M. Nougaret, said that her case was truly a hard one, since the man went away without getting divorced, as he should have done, so as to set his wife at liberty. "If he had taken the necessary steps for a divorce," said the minister, "before he went away, then the woman would be all right, as she could get any time marry another man; whereas, as it was, she was confirmed to hopeless isolation."

After a moment's reflection an idea occurred to M. Nougaret's mind which he thought might perhaps furnish a solution of the difficulty.

"Ask the woman how she was married, and whether the French consul at Reykjavik had anything to do with the affair," said he to the minister.

The woman, on being interrogated, answered this question in the negative. She was married, she said, simply according to the customs of the country people of Iceland.

"Then," said M. Nougaret, "she is free. The marriage was not legal. Le Blanc was a French subject, and under the jurisdiction of French laws; and they require, in such cases, certain acts and documents from the nearest French consul to make the marriage valid. Thus the requisite formalities to render the union legal not having been observed, the woman is free, and can marry any other man as soon as she pleases."

The minister reflected a moment, as if somewhat uncertain how this view of the question was to be received; but finally said that M. Nougaret was right, and that the woman was legally free. He explained the case to her. Her face at once brightened up, and she went away overjoyed at finding herself so suddenly relieved from an embarrassment which a few moments before had seemed hopeless and irremediable. M. Nougaret thought that within a week she was married again.

THE MISTLETOE.

EVERY one knows this parasite, which grows both on deciduous and ever-green trees and shrubs, forming a pendent ever-green bush from the trunks and branches; and some of our fair readers may have accidentally stood under it at Christmas, receiving a reward for their pains. We may venture to remind them that, according to the received rule of medieval times, except a maiden was kissed under the mistletoe at Christmas, she could not be married during the ensuing year. When once established on a tree, the mistletoe will grow as long as there is any life in the tree; but when the branch on which it is rooted decays, the death of the mistletoe immediately follows. Two or three inches of the shoot is produced only in a season, and the leaves vary considerably in different plants. The missel-thrush feeds on the berries, and so does the blackbird; and bird-lime is made from the bruised berries. The effect of the mistletoe is injurious to the branch upon which it grows, for the sap is absorbed by the growth of the parasite.

ABUNDANCE OF ANIMAL LIFE IN THE SEA.

In orchards it is for this reason speedily removed. The lichens, on the contrary, do not hurt trees, as they do not feed upon their substance.

The mistletoe has always been associated with Druidical worship; and we can not, therefore, do better than give an outline of that superstition. The simplest and earliest form of their religion seems to have been the worship of the sun, moon, and fire. The sun they adored under the name of Tutanes, the same as the Roman Saturn and the Phœnician Baal or Bel. Another remarkable principle was the worship of the serpent; and it has been conjectured that the great Druidical temples, such as Stonehenge and Avebury, were constructed for the united worship of the serpent and the sun. Afterward, however, the number of deities was considerably increased, among whom the chief were Hesus, the god of war, Jow or Jupiter, Taranis, the ruler of thunder, Belin or Apollo, and Ogham or Mercury. The garments of the Druids were remarkably long and flowing; and when employed in religious ceremonies they wore a kind of white surplice. They generally carried a white wand, and had on occasion, called a Druid's Egg, suspended from their neck. Their inquisitions and prophecies were delivered orally, as it was contrary to their religion to commit any thing to writing. The Druids had a sovereign pontiff or pope, whom all the Druids obeyed, without any exception. They called December "the sacred month," and all the Druids met at Rouvres at the time fixed by the sovereign pontiff. The priests came forth from their forests and traversed the various districts, inviting the faithful to follow them with the cry of Au gui (first day of the year), or that of Kelaun (gifts), to prepare themselves worthily for the holy ceremony of the Gui (mistletoe) of the new year. The fête opened with a search for the famous mistletoe upon an oak that had about thirty years growth; and the mistletoe so found was to become, by its consecration, the Panchreston, i. e., "the universal remedy"—the panacea against all sorts of poisons.

When the plant had been found, a triangular altar of earth was raised at the foot of the tree on which it had been discovered, and then commenced a species of procession. The Eubagi marched first, conducting two white bulls which had never been subjected to the yoke. These were followed by the bards, who sang hymns in honor of the Supreme Being. Next came the novices, students, and disciples, accompanied by a herald clothed in white. These were full led by the three most ancient pontiffs, one carrying bread that was to be offered up, the second two vessels filled with water and wine, and the third a hand of ivory attached to the end of a wand, to represent justice and power. Next came the priests, preceded by the supreme pontiff in a white robe, wearing a girdle of gold; and the procession closed with great numbers of the nobles and people. When they arrived at the oak the officiant burned a morsel of bread, poured some wine and water on the altar, and divided what remained among the assistant priests. He then ascended the tree, cut the mistletoe with a golden knife, and threw it into the robe of one of the principal pontiffs. The supreme pontiff then sacrificed the bulls, and prayed that "God would permit His benediction to rest upon the gift he was about to distribute among the people," then prostrated on the ground. It was then divided and distributed. They considered that sickness, enchantments, and malevolent spirits were expelled by it.

The Persian Magi used the mistletoe in their religious ceremonies, and the Greeks and Romans for its medicinal properties. It was, perhaps, the golden branch referred to by Virgil in his description of the descent to the lower regions. Pliny says that the Gauls held the plant in the greatest veneration. Stukeley thinks that the Druids cut the mistletoe with their upright brass hatchets, called celts, and laid it on their altars; and he adds that in his time a branch was cut on Christmas-eve, and laid upon the altar of York Minster. Apuleius has preserved some verses of the poet Lælius, in which he mentions the mistletoe as one of the things necessary to make a man a magician. Even now the peasants of Hobstein call it the "spectre's wand," from a belief that holding a branch of it will enable a man to see ghosts, and force them to speak to him. The mistletoe is supposed to have been the forbidden tree in the garden of Eden; hence, some have concluded, arose the custom of kissing under it at Christmas. This is not likely, the custom having been as old as the Druids. Three thousand years ago, the youth of the ancient British tribes danced under the oaks, and whenever they saw the sacred emblem hanging overhead, exchanged vows of truth and suavia dulcia. The Taxons dedicated the mistletoe to their Venus, Frigg.

NATIONAL VESSELS IN THE DYEFJORD.

ANXIOUS TIMES.

"TRÉPONT, a sen-port town of France, Department of Seine Inférieure. Population, 2036." So says the guide-book; but things have altered since these words were written, and a census taken now would, we fear, show a marked decrease in the population, and a marked preponderance of women over men. The young men have gone to war; they are gathering in Count KERATRY'S camp, or marching with General PALADINES, arroving the country, with sashes round their waists and cocks' feathers in their hats, taking shots at Uhlans from behind hedges, or surprising outlying German pickets.

In these little out-of-the-way places the times are indeed anxious, not with the anxiety which prompts us to buy "extras," but with a more personal nature. The war makes itself felt to every fibre in the shape of many thousand nerves comes so seldom to break the monotony of waiting. The quiet place is quieter than ever; there is a certain dull routine of work to be gone through, for even in anxiety dinners must be provided and cooked, floors swept and rooms kept tidy, and one day must be much like another, until a precious parcel of newspapers finds its way to the little town, and they hear something of the outside world—of victories or defeats, of heavy losses—and the lists are eagerly scanned to see if the name of husbands, brothers, and lovers are there. A battle has been won and the country has been saved—many small boasts have been fought and won in the papers—and the good women rejoice, and a patriotic glow goes through them when some gossip reads the news, as depicted in the pathetic sketch on our first page. But then comes the dreadful list: battles are won with the blood of men, and the fishing-boat on the beach may have lost its master, and Marie's mother may be put off forever, and the joy is mingled with sadness. In another month they may have fled the battle-ravaged land, but they breathe again most unpatriotically, although that master of the fishing-boat may be killing Germans and Marie's betrothed may be in hospital with a bullet through his leg. If the women of France could shoot, how precious would the war go on? These good women are no doubt sturdy patriots in the abstract, but we fancy they would willingly vote for their good men's return, and would be glad to see their fishing-boats sailing once more from land, although Alsace and Lorraine should pay for it.

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Cuttyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE SMOKING-ROOM AT THE GEORGE AND VULTURE.

ROBERT BALFOUR did not remain at THE lock, as he had originally intended. Perhaps the vicinity to Wheal Danes was not so attractive to him as he had promised himself it would be, although not for a single instant did his purpose of revenge relax. Other considerations had he noted, were powerful, and knew that he had taken the first step, to keep him on that terrible path which he had so long marked out for himself. To disclose the position of his victim now would have been not only to make void his future plans, but to place his own life at Solomon's mercy. Yet he found his heart less hard than the perfidious he had assumed it to be, constant dropping of wrong and hardship for twenty years, should have rendered it. He did not make such late, and the first sound of the bar broke upon his ear was the tinkling of the bell of the little church, for it was Sunday morning. He compared it for a moment with something that he had been dreaming of: a man in a well chiming fourteen for himself in the dark well, up which he climbed a few feet, and then fell down again. But there was a joyful, unwearied sense of help!—help, help!" rang in his ears, instead of the voice that called people to prayers. Even when that ceased, the man who rang for the weather was wild and wet—beating against the window-panes, brought with them light and shade. Sometimes a sudden gust seemed to bear upon a confused voices and the tramp of hurrying feet; and then he would knit his brow and clench his hand, with the apprehension that they had found his enemy, and were bringing him to the door. Not the slightest fear of the consequences to himself in such a case agitated his mind; he had quite resolved what to do, and knew no prison walls should ever keep him in again; but the idea that Solomon should escape his vengeance drove him to the brink of frenzy. He would have left the place at once, but that he thought the coincidence of his departure and the disappearance of his foe might possibly awaken suspicion; he must sit on through the day, waiting for the news which he knew must arrive sooner or later. At noon he thought the hubbuby wrote an unusually great deal of time ill-spelled to ask her what was the matter. But then, if there was nothing—if she only looked sour, as folks often did, because it was a sunday—she might think him too curious.

From the window, a little later, he saw a knot of people in the rain talking eagerly together, and one of them pointing with his hand toward Gethin. But they were too far off to be overheard, and he did not dare go down and interrogate them. It was his object to appear utterly indifferent to local affairs, and as to a total stranger.

He felt half stifled within doors, and yet, if he should go out, he knew that he would be incontrollably impelled to take the cliff path that he had followed the preceding night, to watch that nobody came near the place that held his prey, and thereby, like the bird who shows her nest by keeping guard too near, attract attention. The tidings for which he waited came at o'clock, just as he was sitting down to his dinner. The parlor-maid who served him had that happy and excited look which the possession of a startling secret, be it good or bad, had especially by the latter, always imparts to persons of her class.

"There's strange news come from Gethin, Sir," said she, as she arranged the dishes.

"Indeed," said Balfour, carelessly, though he felt his brain spin round and his heart stop at the same moment, "what is it?"

"Mr. Coe, Sir, a very rich man—he as owns all Dunlopel—has disappeared."

"Ah!" said Balfour.

"Well, Sir, he went to his room last night, they say, at his usual hour, but never slept in his bed, and the front-door was found unlocked in the morning, so that he must have gone away of himself. That was where the bloody footsteps have been tracked to the cliff edge, and there they stop."

"Poor fellow! Has he any relatives?"

"Oh yes, Sir; a wife and son—a very handsome, nice young man, they say."

"Then his widow will be rich, I suppose?"

"Oh, pray, don't call her a widow yet, Sir; is to hope her husband may be found alive. It's awful thing to be drowned like that on a Sunday morning; and as for suicide, why, he's got no call to be did, too. He was a hard man, and no favorite, but one forgets that now, of course."

"Of course also forgets the Harve'ocre, my good girl; chope me by bringing it, will you?" said Mr. Balfour, beginning to puzzle something which did not seem to like his cautions. "You must excuse my hard-heartedness, but I had not the pleasure of knowing this gentleman."

An hour afterward the solitary guest had left the inn, and was on his road to Plymouth. His departure caused little surprise, for the weather was such as to induce no visitor to prolong his stay.

Whether from his long enforced abstinence from society, or from the unwholesome nature of his thoughts, Robert Balfour was always disinclined to be alone. His exceptional love of luxury in search of pleasure had been, though he did not find pleasure, more agreeable to him than the being left to his own resources; and now more than ever he could not bear to be alone. He preferred even such company as that which the smoking-room of a hotel afforded to none at all. The voices of his fellow-creatures could not shape themselves, as many imaginative sound did, into the utterance of into groans and feeble cries for aid. Not twenty-four hours had elapsed since his prisoner was placed in hold, so that such sounds of weakness and agony must have been in every sense chimerical. Yet there they were, for him, then, if these echoes from the tomb should always be heard! A terrible idea indeed, but one which bred no despair nor cowardice, for the fact that his morse should seize him in the very place where he had left him had clutched and consigned him to his living grave.

The hotel at which he now put up was the same at which he had then slept, and the same room was the same in which he had smoked his pipe and drunk his last glass of brandy-and-water. He had had only one companion then, but now he was full of people. By their talk it was evident that they were townsfolk, and not one of them another; in fact, it was a tradesmen's club, which met at the George and Vulture for a social evening through the winter months. In spite of his willingness to be won from his thoughts, he could not fix his attention on the small local gossip that was going on about him. Men came in and out of the room, observing that Dunlopel was not not easy to take note of faces through the cloud of smoke that filled the room; he was fast relapsing into a reflective mood concerning what Solomon was doing in the dark, and if he slept much, when a sudden noise which roused him as thoroughly as the prick of a lance or the touch of a sword.

"There is no misunderstanding and no obligation—that is my motto."

The speaker was a thin, gray man, whose entrance Robert Balfour had not perceived, and who was seated in an elevated chair, which apparently been reserved for him as president of the assembly. The face was unfamiliar, for twenty years had made an old man of the speaker, and honest twenty-five, but the phrase, and the manner of delivering it, identified him at once as his old friend Mr. Bodge.

"It was in this very room," continued the latter, "that I sat and talked with him as sociable as could be, but a quarter of an hour before I put the duties on him; and it's a thing that has often upon my mind ever since, that in so doing my duty, of course, but still it seemed hard to take advantage of such a frank young fellow. As for stealing them notes, it's my belief he had no more intention of doing it than I had."

"And yet he got it into the 'nires, Mr. Dodge, didn't he?" inquired one of the company.

"Got it hot, Sir?" replied Mr. Dodge, with dignity; "he got an infamous and most unjustly severe sentence, if you mean that. But I'm not what he did was contrary to law, but it's my opinion as the law was strained again him. There was some as swore hard and fast to get him punished as knew he deserved no such treatment. Why, the girl as he loved, and whose picture I found upon him myself when I searched him, and gave it him back, too—ay, that I did—even she took a false oath, as Wexel himself told me, who was his lawyer, and had built up his case with that same hussy for its corner-stone. Ah!" and Mr. Dodge, with a gesture of abhorrence, "if there ever was a murderous man, it was that poor young fellow, Richard Yorke."

"Hot I thought he got twenty years' penal servitude," said the same individual who had had interposed before, and whose thankless office it seemed to be to rouse the old gentleman out for the benefit of society.

"I say he was murdered, Sir. He was shut up for twenty years, and then shot in the back in trying to get away from Lingmoor. It was a deliberate case I ever knew in all my professional experience. Lord, if you had seen him—the handsomest, brightest, gayest young chap! that he was when he came folks call well-looking, if he was the son—that is, though, in a left-handed sort of way, it's true—of maid Carew of Crumpstone—you would have thought the same of the month ago or so; and that, in my judgment, was the secret of all his misfortune: it was the Carew blood as did it. To take his own way in the world; to seek nobody's advice, nor use it if given; to be self-reliant and petted by all the women and half the men as came nigh him; to have no master nor authority; to act upon one thought, and to scorn consequences—well, all that was bred in the bone with him."

"Then he had never any one to look after him at home, I reckon, Mr. Dodge?"

"Well, Sir, he had a mother; and though she was a queer one too, she loved him dearly. She was the cleverest woman, Weasel used to say, over the key of the street, and a perfect lady to too, mind you. She worked to get the poor lad into the Service; and when all was over, instead of breaking down, she rallied, she swallowed her pride, and went down on her bended knees to the old woman, the devil, Trevethick, the prosecutor, and to his son-in-law, Coe, likewise: they lived down Cross Key way—where was it?—at Crumpstone, and she begged for her life, and for petitioning in her son's favor. She got down upon the very day of her own big daughter was married to Solomon Coe, be as has got Dunlopel, and is a big man now. But he'll never be Mayor, Sir, that's a scury lot, if he was to be king o' Cornwall. I shall never forget the way he insulted that poor fellow when he was being taken up. Damme, I would have given a ten-pound note to have had him charged with something; but, Sir, what was the handcuffs were't soon to log for his wrists neither."

"And this Trevethick refused to help where he did he?"

"Why, of course he did. He broke her heart, poor soul, and left her to be passed through Plymouth afterward, and she looked twenty years older than before that trial. Even then she didn't give the matter up, but laid it before the crown. But poor Yorke had offended government—been insulted almost another through one of their public examinations; he had wits enough for any thing, had that young fellow. But, there—I can't bear to talk about it, and yet somehow I seem to help doing on it when I get into this room. He was a fine young fellow, and I respected him. I think I see him now, smoking the best of cigars, one of which he offered to me—for he was free with his hand I was accustomed to receive it, for I couldn't take a gift from one as I was just a-going to be hanged, you know," says I, 'but let us have no misunderstanding and no obligation. Your fellow! poor fellow!'"

"No more we shall about the case of Richard Yorke; but it was evidently a contagious topic with the chairman of the George and Vulture club. Gathering to behold and enjoy the misery mother who had done and suffered so much for him, they took possession of his soul. His heart had been steeled against her when he found harbored under her roof the objects of his rage and loathing, but he felt now that had never come to pass with some intention of benefit to himself. The very words, indeed, flushed upon him that she entertained some plan of frustrating his revenge against them, with the idea of protecting him from the consequences that were likely to ensue from it; and he forgave her, though he told her not so. He would not carry out his design to the uttermost, but very cautiously, and with a prudence that he would have thought impossible to him only an hour since concerned: and then, when he had avenged himself and her, he would disclose himself to her. The statement he had just heard affected him deeply, but in opposite ways. The justification of Richard Yorke moved him—he did not need that; it was also for too late for his heart to be touched by the sufferings of the old detective's good-will, though the time had been when he would have thanked him for its utterance with honest tears; but the revelation of his mother's toil and suffering in his behalf rewakened all his demoniac love for her, while it made his purpose firmer than ever to be the Nemesis of her enemies and his own.

As he went to bed that night the clock struck twelve. It was just four-and-twenty hours since he had left his victim in the bowels of Wheal Danes. Those hours would have been sufficient to him for the crime, and the mine been filled with gold for him to its mouth, he would not have stretched out his hand to save him.

CHAPTER XLIV.

STILL HUMAN.

MR. BALFOUR awoke to his previous indifference to the wares of the news-boy by sending him next morning to the station for all the local papers. In each, as he expected, there was a paragraph headed Mysterious Disappearance, and as lengthened an account as professional ingenuity could devise of the unaccountable departure of Mr. Solomon Coe from his house at Gethin. The missing man was "much respected;" and, "as the prosperous owner of the Dunlopel mine, which had yielded largely for so many years, he could certainly not have been pressed by pecuniary embarrassments, and therefore the idea of suicide was out of the question." Unlikely as it seemed in the case of one who knew the country so well, the most probable explanation of the affair was that the unfortunate gentleman, in taking his early bath along the cliff top, must have slipped into the sea. The weather had been very rough of late and the wind blowing from off the land, which would have rendered the body's disposition was correct—for the body not having been washed ashore. "In the mean time an active search was going on."

Balfour had resolved not to return to London for at least two days. Mrs. Coe and her son would, without doubt, be telegraphed for, and he could not repair to their house in their absence. The latter would probably be under the same roof with his mother was now repugnant to him. He felt that he could not trust himself to meet Solomon. It had been hard and grievous, notwithstanding his resentment against him, to see her in company with others, and her showers of love, that while had been a great relief to him. With his present feeling toward her he could be impossible to maintain his incognito; and, if that was lost, his future plans—to which he well knew she would object—to himself would be rendered futile. He had seen with rage and bitter jealousy that both Solomon and her boy, and especially the latter, were dear to her; and it was certain she would interfere to protect them, for their sake as well as for her own. But had other reasons than these not nerving immediately to town. It might hereafter be expedient to show that he had really been to Cornwallshire, where he had gone since he had designed to go; and, moreover, though his purpose was relentless in its steadfastness, he did not perhaps care to be in a house where hourly suggestions would be dropped as to the whereabouts of his victim, and he feel the fiend prompted to him. Harry and her son might even not have gone to Gethin, and in that case the most preposterous and surmises would have been insupportable.

Richard was more human than he would fain believe himself to be. Though he had gone to bed in execration of sympathy, he awoke somewhat shaken through the long hours of a night in which he had slept but little, and waked to think of what he had dreamt. He had dwelt upon the fate of his unhappy foe, perishing slowly beneath the endless treasure. At first once, indeed, the impulse had been strong upon him that very morning to send word anonymously where Solomon was to be found in the police at Plymouth. Remorse had not as yet become chronic with him, but it seized him by fits and starts. He had, for the time when he had been locked (through his prison bars) on all men with rage and hatred, he had not been relentless, he had argued, supremely wretched, for more than half his lifetime, though this must be denied by it for it was certain that Solomon had sworn falsely, in the spirit if not in the letter, and caused him to be punished for a crime which he knew he was well aware he had not in intention committed. He remembered that it was on occasion of his arrest and also been most brutal and insulting; while, after conviction had been obtained, this wretch's mission, as Mr. Bodge had stated, had known no cessation. In the arms of his young bride he had been deaf to the piteous cry of a mother bereaved of her only son.

But, on the other hand, had not he (Richard) gone wrong in that this man in his presence? Had he not robbed him—for so much at least must Solomon have known—of the love of his mother? Had he, if happiness was to be in all assorted union was not to have been anticipated, child, had he not robbed that mother? If their positions had been reversed, would not he have exacted expiation from such an offender to the uttermost? He would doubtless have returned to twist the law as Solomon had done, and make it, if possible, to have evoked instruments of revenge. He would not, of course, have evoked its aid at all. But was that to be placed to his credit? He had not—throughout above the whole length his life; he had never acknowledged any authority save that of his own conscience. He had avowed to himself that his bitterness against his unhappy victim had been caused not so much by the wrongs he had suffered at his hands as by the contempt which he (Richard) had entertained for him. Without narrowly scanning it, he either had possessed to back his pretensions he had imagined himself a sort of irresponsible and sovereign being. (Such influence as by no means rare, nor confined to despots and brigands, and when it exists in a poor man it is always dangerous.) His estimation, if it could be called such, had doubtless fostered this delusion; but Mr. Bodge was right, the same blood had been as poison in his veins, and had destroyed him.

All this might be true; but such philosophy could scarcely now obtain a hearing, while his enemy was dying of starvation in his living tomb. It was in vain for him to repeat mechanically that he had also suffered a sort of lingering death for twenty years. The present picture of his rival's torments presented itself in colors so lively and terrible as to blot out the remembrance of his own. The recollection of his wrongs was no longer sufficient for his vindication. He therefore strove to behold his victim in another light than as his private foe—as the murderer of his friend Balfour, the history of whose end may here be told.

On the night that Richard escaped from Lingmoor, it was Balfour, of course, who assisted him, and who was awaiting him in person at the foot of the prison wall. The old man's arms had received him as he slipped down the rope; and the object at which the sentry had fired had been two men, though in the misty night they had seemed but one. Balfour had been mortally wounded, and it was with the utmost difficulty that, laden with the burden of his dying friend, Richard had contrived to reach Bergen Wood. As his own footsteps were alone to be traced along the moor, the idea of another having accompanied his flight occurred to no one; and the sentry's shot naturally not occurred to the authorities. Balfour had hardly reached that wretched asylum when he expired, leaving Richard's hand, which bidding him remember Earl Street, Spitalfields. "What you find there is all yours, Dick," was his dying testament and last words of farewell. And over his dead body Richard swore anew his vow of vengeance against the man that had been, though indirectly, deprived him of his only friend. He had watched by the dead body, on its bed of fern leaves, through that night and the whole of the next day; then, changing clothes with it, he had fled under cover of the ensuing darkness, and got away eventually to town.

He had found the house in Earl Street a wretched hovel, tenanted by a few abjects, whom the money found on Balfour—which he had received on leaving prison—was amply sufficient to buy out. Once alone in this tenement, he had easily possessed himself of the spoil so long entrusted, and, furnished with it, he had hastened down to Crompton—the news of Carew's death having reached London on the very day that he found himself in a position to profit by it. The very plan which he had suggested to Balfour, whose name he had assumed, he himself carried into execution. He made a private offer for the dismal mine, which was gladly accepted by one who had the disposal of the property, acting under the advice of Parson Whymper. Terrified, the only man that had attached any importance to the possession of it, was dead; and it was not likely that any one at the sale would give half of the sum which this stranger was prepared to give for the mere gratification of his whim. The mine, indeed, had scarcely been mentioned in the transaction; it merely formed a portion in the lot comprising the best farm across on which the capricious purchaser had expressed his fancy to build a home. "Disposed of by private contract," was the memorandum written in the auctioneer's catalogue which dashed Solomon's long-cherished hopes to the ground.

Richard acted on in the negligent spirit attended the sale. It attracted an immense concourse; and no less than a great many hoped for the price of admission to those who explored the splendid halls of Crompton, discussing the character of the owner, and retailing the scandal of his eccentricities. Poor Parson Whymper, who had not a shilling left to bless himself, and had died intestate, though, thanks to him, not absolutely a beggar—was perhaps the only person present who felt a touch of pity for the man asked for his patron's signet-ring, as a keepsake, and this request had been refused with the grim rejoinder, he wandered among the gay and jeering crowd like a ghost, little thinking that the man with whom he had had such a petty quarrel was he whom he had once regarded as the heir of Crompton. It was the general opinion now that the unhappy chaplain had died from "natural genius, and had "led him on." Even Richard bestowed but that single glance upon him that he was looking in vain for the face that had so terrible an interest for himself. He had not heard that Tyrwhitt was dead, but he knew well that the instant that his eyes fell upon Solomon Coe, and all his hate was at once transferred to the younger enemy. The business upon which this man had come was as clear to him as though it had been written on his forehead. The negligent of pleasure which had visited his dark soul for twenty years was in sight of the object of its contemplation when, on the sixth day's sale, the auctioneer gave out that lot 970 had been withdrawn. Solomon might have entered into the mansion long before but for the cautious prudence which had prevented him from entering into inquiries upon the subject. For a minute or two he stood stunned and silent, then hurriedly made his way to the auction-room. Richard, who was sitting at the long table with the catalogue before him, kept his eye fixed upon its pages while the auctioneer pointed out to the new purchaser of the lot in question. He knew the inquiry that was being asked, and its reply; he knew the unburly form it was that thrust itself the next minute in between him and his neighbor; every drop of blood in his body, every hair on his head, seemed to be cognizant that the man he hated most on earth was seated cheek by jowl with him. was the first step in the road of retribution had been taken voluntarily by his victim himself. The rest is soon told. Solomon at once commenced his clumsy efforts at conciliation; and his endeavors to recommend himself to the favor of his friendship were suffered quickly to bear fruit. He invited him to his house in London, which, to Richard's astonishment and delight, he found to be his mother's home; and in short, fell of his own accord into the very snare which on the other, had he had the fixing of it, would himself have laid for him.

And now, as we have said, when all had gone exactly as Richard would have had it go, and Solomon was being punished to the uttermost, the executor of his doom was beginning to feel, if not compunction, at all events remorse. No adequate retribution had indeed overtaken Harry. To have made her a widow was, in fact, to have freed her from the yoke of a husband she loved master; but the fact was, notwithstanding the perjury of which he believed her to have been guilty, he had never hated her as he had hated the other authors of his wrongs. She had once on the rock-bound coast at Gethin preserved his life; she had accorded to his passion all that woman can grant, and had reciprocated it; not even in his fiercest hour of despair had he harbored the thought of evil to him hated against her; he had hated her, indeed, as his betrayer, and as Solomon's accusation which he had given her with that intention which he felt toward her husband. There was another motive also, though he did not acknowledge it to himself, which, now that his chief foe was expiating his offense, had no inconsiderable weight in the scale of mercy as regarded Harry.

His endeavors to win Charley's favor had had a reflex action. In spite of himself his heart would have grown up in him toward this boy, whom his mission it was to ruin. If there had been any one quality, any one trait of character, or any thing of his father in his character, his heart might have been steeled against his youth by the power of transference; but in a mean son of Solomon Coe's he would have beheld in him the rebuke of a well, and perhaps a thoughtful brain, such as this Agnes Aird was represented to be, what a happy future might be before this young man. But he had no opportunity to study it would be, and how likely, for him to drift on the tide of self-will and self-indulgence to the devil! The decision rested in Richard's own hands, he knew. Should he blast this young life, as he had, in revenge for the sins which he was in no way accountable, and which were already being so bitterly expiated? The consideration that Harry might even yet be found alive perhaps alone prevented Richard from accomplishing his purpose. But there was no further. If his victim should have been rescued, his enmity would have doubtless blazed out afresh against them as unpardonable; and, over, but in the mean time it smouldered, and was dying out for want of fuel. The fuel on which he was in no way accountable, and which were already being so bitterly expired

THE CROWN PRINCE OF PRUSSIA CONFERRING THE "IRO

"The honored soldier placed his own hand in the Prince's, who shook it. Then he rode ba LOSS" UPON A SOLDIER, IN THE PARK OF VERSAILLES.

the ranks, conscious that in his palm reposed the coveted decoration of the Iron Cross."

A DEAD SHOT.

[See Illustration on Page 836.]

AWAY to the breakers white,
Where the Norland lurches awing,
Where the waves bangs red, where the stream in its bed
Runs with amber hues 'neath the fog.

Away where the hills rise unwilled
By the smoke-soiled touch of town,
Through the purple haze of November days,
With the lichen-gold for a crown.

And far from the moss and the moorland
You can see the breakers white;
And the sea-gull's scream, like a voice in a dream,
Comes and dies on the moan ere bright.

And there where we watch so keenly,
Lo! the great dun stags appear,
To the smallest group, as they onward troop,
We have seen since the opening year.

A shot, and dead on the beaches
The king of the mountain lies,
Struck dead on the moss that he raced across,
With a dumb reproach in his eyes.

And fair the autumnal gloaming,
And sweet is the stranded's song,
As we wend our way in the twilight gray,
And bear proudly the spoil along.

WHAT CAME OF THE EARTH-QUAKE.

"I'VE found an old pack of cards! now, granny, tell my fortune." And Cicely Lee seated herself on the cushion at her grandmother's feet.

The pretty little old lady shuffled the cards with a somewhat shaky hand, looking over and round toward the door.

"If dancers should come in," she murmured, "dances a dreadfully severe on cards, and—Hark!"

"Grandpa's gone out for a walk, darling," said Cicely, her sweet face earnest; "please hurry!" And she composed herself to listen, adding, with a little quivering laugh, "Tell me whom I shall marry."

"You'll marry John Saunders," was the reply. Cicely shook her head; a shadow crossed her face.

"But I say you will, deary," repeated the little old lady in decided tones.

"No, granny, it's impossible now," half whispered the girl, "for John and I have quarreled."

"Lovers' quarrels, child; makes no difference, whatever," responded the old lady, sharply, still shuffling the cards. "I tell you I feel it in my bones."

"Then don't you see it in the cards?"

"Don't I? Of course I do. There you stand, with a light all round between you—very light; she faces you, and he faces you. He's John Saunders, and you're going to marry him. Let me see—diamonds are months; there's eleven in all less than a year. I told you so, deary. Master makes! Is that the dancer?" A loud thump by the breadth of her generous linen apron went the cards.

"No, granny, it's the grocer's boy," replied Cicely, looking through the glass half of the old-fashioned door.

"Deacon's so set!"—and out came the cards again.

"I used to be a master-hand at tellin' fortins when I was a young woman and worldly. Folks said I'd make a mint o' money if I changed for it, as the fort-n-tellers do, and I ain't no doubt of it. Why, I told Sally Bowles that was—married a Henderson; dead now, my dear—when farmer Lee give a great huskin, that her beau'd never come back from the fishing-ground; and no more he didn't. I told Kezzy Blacker—she that's a deacon now—that she wouldn't keep her man over next Christmas; and, sure enough, day before Christmas I went to his funeral. Dear, dear, what a sweet corpse he made!

"Oh!" cried Cicely, with a little shiver, "did you see him all dead in the coffin?"

"Well, yes, I thought I did; but I kinder guess I felt it more in my bones. 'Twas awful weather, that year, at the fishing-ground; and poor Joe Blacker had consumption; he never was good for much. Where'd you find them cards, child?"

"In the old blue sea-chest up stairs," Cicely replied, absently.

"Twouldn't do for the deacon to see 'em," said the pretty little old lady; for, as Cicely often declared, she was like a picture, with her white curls, bright eyes, and rosy cheeks. "He's awfully down on cards; but, somehow, they seem kinder natural to me," she continued, shuffling them again, "and I've had many a good game fore I married your grandpa. He don't like to be hard from another, poor soul, and I s'pose it's best he don't. I won't bet a penny with him now for thirty years or up'ard. You see, I used to go home once in a twel'month, and your aunt Smantby, as good a woman as ever lived, but certain, she would have her little game o' cards, and so I always humored her; but, bless you, it wouldn't do to let the deacon know it. Smantby's been dead thirty year this month; she was beautiful as twins. Here, child, put them in the right way quick; I'm sure I hear the deacon now."

Cicely took the cards, and ran up to her own little room with them. Placing them securely away, she proceeded to tie her hair with a long pink ribbon, hastily, for tasteful as she was, in her head.

"He can't help loving me," she repeated to herself, with a saucy little nod, as she arranged her curls, gazing into a pair of sunny, smiling eyes; but while she looked a shadow dimmed their brightness; the pretty face grew sad as she murmured, in a half whisper, "Oh dear, if it wasn't for my dreadful tongue!"

She sat down to think over that last interview.

"I needn't have been so hateful," she murmured, her lips trembling a little as faithful memory reproduced the scene.

"I told him that I had never loved him; what an awful falsehood! "This is the second quarrel, too. I know how it will be—he won't give in, and I'd die first. What! ask John Saunders' pardon? Never!"

So, with glowing cheeks and shining eyes, Cicely sat and stitched in the sunshine, her profile face as resolute as if no handsome John Saunders had ever called forth its dimpling smiles, or caused it also the momentary kindling of anger. Nobody noticed how quiet she was, as, after her grandpa's nap, she sat with mother and grandmother sewing and done, she went about her preparations for the evening meal, except Rob, a rough boy of twelve, who watched her furtively whenever he glanced up from the battered copy of "Robinson Crusoe" which he was reading.

"Say, Cicy, I saw Let Dunlop coming home from school," at last he said, and went on reading with all his might.

Now Cicely's face was the light girl in the cards standing between Cicely and her lover. Poor Cicely had of late been a little jealous of Let.

"Did he?" was all she could say, as his sister laid the knives carefully.

"Yes, I did; what do you think she asked me?

"What?" Cicely was betrayed into asking, with an eager look.

Rob chuckled after the manner of wicked brothers.

"Nothing, only if you was going to singing-school. I told her that would depend upon whether John Saunders went."

"Oh, Rob!" said Cicely, sharply, her face changing to pain.

"Now you needn't look at me that way, 'cause I never said a word about John; so don't cry 'fore you're hurt. But you bet Let Davis is the prettiest girl in this town."

"Don't say 'you bet,' said Cicely, irritation in her voice; "it sounds vulgar."

"Oh! don't, not if a boy says it; 'tain't half so bad as 'by gum!' and lots o' boys say that at school. Don't you like Let Davis, then? She's a beauty?"

"I don't know," Cicely responded, pulling the white cloth into place with nervous little twitches; "I suppose she's handsome; folks seem to think so."

"Pho! you girls never 'll say who you think's handsome. All the fellows are awful sweet on Let Davis; she can beat you all to nothing."

"Can she?" queried Cicely, in a voice devoid of all expression.

"Yes, she can; any girl with yellow curls and rosy cheeks and blue eyes and red lips——"

"Where's a John?" cried Robinson Crusoe?" asked his mother, who had entered a moment before to see quietly for him a hear, and Rob suddenly, with a burning face, into silence.

Cicely knew in her heart that pretty Let Davis was all in love with her cousin. Everybody in the old grandmother often called John; she knew it by a hundred signs, and she had noticed sometimes that John himself suspected it. In fact, Let was unconsciously at the bottom of all their trouble, for it was about Let's beauty that they had quarreled.

And now tea was over, the dishes all washed, the kitchen tidied; and as yet Cicely had not made up her mind whether she would go to singing-school or not. To be sure she had dressed for it, and looked forward to it; but long ago the clock had struck seven, and John had not come to ask her. Could it be that there was nothing to detain her but the lack of John's company; and she knew Bessie would consider that the girls could talk. So she suddenly resolved to go, put on her pretty little hat with the crimson feather, that John had always admired, and tripped down stairs.

"Good-by, Rob. I want you to see me to singing-school," she said.

The boy looked up from his book with a grin. "What's John?"

"I don't know—and I don't care," she managed to say in a careless voice; but the words almost choked her.

"I don't hoing to singin'-school," said Rob, unwilling to lose his story.

"Never mind, you can go with me to-night; and, besides, you'll see Let Davis; she's the beauty of the village, you know."

"Who cares for Let Davis?" cried Rob, bluntly, stumbling on the consequences that had to be connected with the non-appearance of John. "She ain't half a handsome as you are, and I've heard ever so many say so; and I guess she's deceitful. Her brother is, at any rate;" and with this sudden change of base Rob put by Robinson Crusoe," and took down his cap.

They were late when they arrived at the schoolhouse. The tall singing-master, who in addition to talking through his nose was a tremendous disciplinarian, scowled at their entrance from the board, whereon regiments of scared semiquavers zigzagged up hill and down hill; holding his unlucky wand in mid-air till the culprits had seated themselves; while every body looked on in profound silence.

"How mortifying!" thought Cicely, angrily; for had not the whole assembly had an opportunity to see that John Saunders was not with her? And could she not hear, with burning, tingling ears, the whispered remarks of the girls near who it was; she had caught a glimpse of Lettie's beautiful eyes. Yes, there was no denying it, her eyes were beautiful.

Rob plucked her sleeve while they were singing "China."

"I say, Cicy, there's John just come in. Bet he did call for you."

The blood flew to Cicely's face; her heart throbbed fast and furious. Somebody walked down the aisle, and the next step, somebody seated himself behind her. It was the only vacant seat, but, unfortunately, next to Let Davis. That sly little thing had made the place by dint of pulling. Instinct, perhaps, told her that Cicely and John had quarreled. Unreasonably angry, Cicely would not look round till recess time, accomplishing this feat, when she did so, with more unanswering than was necessary for so simple an act.

She barely recognized John. He, though glued, tried his best to be civil.

"I called for you," he said; "I was detained."

"Oh, it wasn't any matter," Cicely responded, feeling her heart throb through her voice.

"Wasn't, eh?" he asked.

"No; I said Rob."

"Oh, perhaps it wouldn't be any matter if I never called again, then?"

Rash girl! she heard the tremor in his voice, saw the pale lip drawn hard over the white teeth, but just then Let Davis had deserted her.

"I could survive it," she said, coldly, flashing a glance into his face which he could not be supposed to know was half anguish, half resentment, and all pleading. Then one of Cicely's old enemies, Pride, came snatching his opportunity, became round, and Cicely talked as fast as she could, and smiled, and was coquettish, without knowing or caring what she did, persuading herself that she was punishing John.

So she was! but she was proud, and—he said it himself—mad clear through.

"Miss Lettie, shall I see you home?"

Cicely heard the question, saw the old blackboard wiped clean for the morrow's algebra, heard the long-drawled good-night master dismiss the school, and answered something her old admirer said with closed teeth. For a moment it seemed to her as if she should die, she turned so cold—such a deathly faintness came over her.

"I say, Cicy, I'm to walk with Tom Bentley," said Rob, stretching his early head past Ned Waters, the old admirer, who had retained his seat.

"No, Rob, you go home with me," said Cicely, holding her hands together hard to keep them still from trembling.

"Why, ain't John—?"

"I shall be most happy to see you home, Miss Cicely," said John.

"That's folly!' cried thoughtless Rob, after the manner of boys. "Let's go, then;" and before his sister could speak he was gone.

If Cicely wept bitterly, and tossed and turned through the restless night, and that the had the poor satisfaction of knowing that it was all her own fault, that she had trifled with an honest heart.

"He overlooked my harsh words," she sobbed; "he would have asked me, if I had only smiled, and now I have driven him from me forever."

It seemed so. John did not come again. Cicely kept herself close in patient silence, but grew very white and sad; and it began to be whispered about that she was disappointed. It was like walking on live coals to Cicely, when she thought of that inevitable gossip. She tried not to think of John. Every Sunday she saw John, who sat at the further end of the deacon's pew. She thought every she went home from church, she was heavy as lead, for there, sometimes just before her, walked John with happy Let Davis.

Then Cicely returned from church, pleaded a headache, and went up into her own room. Cicely had had a lesson of certainty of whose knowledge she could not doubt, that John and Lettie Davis were engaged to be married. The wedding was to take place in a couple of months, and her informant was to be one of the bridesmaids.

Every body thought at one time it would be you," added the news-giver; "but I fancy Lettie always liked him." Poor Cicely! the retort had stabbed like a thunder-bolt on her heavy heart; for all along she had been hoping against hope. She was unconsciously looking at her own apathy when the truth was forced upon her. Her John, so beloved, to marry another! What could be? Had he forgiven her his deep, manly passion—his vows? But then, what was she to him?

"I sent him from me, and the punishment is just," she cried to herself, walking blindly on, while her fevered excitement the pretty things which Miss Lettie was going to the city to buy.

Every day Cicely grew paler, and kept over the same old battle, till it seemed as if her strength was nearly exhausted and her will palsied. One Sunday her mother had Cicely looked ill, that she had lost her spirit—those at home, who see her daily, being, as usual, the last to take notice that there was something wrong with Cicy.

"Dearest, you you're growing thin, deary," her grandmother ventured to repeat one Sunday morning, when Cicely, according to her usual custom, sat down by the old lady to read to her.

The bright head bent yet lower till it rested on the old lap in silence.

"Cicely, child, you are crying," said her grandmother; and then, after a long pause, "Is it John?"

"Oh, granny," sobbed Cicely, "the light girl stands between us. I love you, I love you, granny dear? But they are both leaving the whole day, not as you said, and it—it will kill me."

The trembling head fell on her shining crosses.

"I tell you, deary," said the solemn old voice, "John will never have the light girl. Don't break your heart, little love. I say it again, he will marry John Saunders yet. I feel it in my bones. I've always felt it."

"No, granny," murmured Cicely, wiping her eyes as she lifted her head; "they are engaged. They will soon be married; and I—I am very weak and foolish. I shall feel better—when it's all over. Then I'll try and be reconciled; for, granny, it's all my fault."

What a morning it was! Through the open window such wealth of beauty, such utter quiet! The wide, grand expanse of heaven, unsullied by a single cloud; the hills sleeping in the ruddy sunshine. The bees droned lazily among the flowers, breaking the bee Sabbath with impunity; the trees stood motionless against the heavenly blue of the horizon. Never had its azure seemed so perfect.

"Curus sort o' day; weather-breeder, I guess," said the aged deacon, as he lifted his Bible, old like himself, and sat down stump with the aid of an enormous knotted cane. Cicely walked beside him, mechanical still to every neighborhood.

"Did you ever know it quite so still?" she asked.

"Well, 'i guess to me 'tis uncommon quiet," said the old gentleman. "Don't know as ever I did."

That morning Lettie Davis sat in the singers' seat. Cicely never looked at her now. That red and white beauty had ruined all between. Yet no; it was all her own fault: and that was the reflection with which she always ended.

Cicely sat near the window, looking dreamily out upon the little grave-yard, hearing the minister's voice as if it were a faint echo. There were tears in her eyes, and the little white and gray head-stones wavered before her misty sight. The silence was awful; the air was stifling. Suddenly there came a strange, low, thunderous cricket stain, smashing as he sat down. Was it that, Cicely queried, with an involuntary smile, and was the sun so? But presently the pews were rocking; the house was moving; the glass in the windows shivered and rattled and broke. The whole congregation sprang to their feet. Cicely among them.

"Fly, children," said the minister, "the great and terrible day of the Lord—" And then the floor upheaved; the old house shook like a reed in the storm. The confusion was indescribable. Men and women and children cried out for fear. Cicely, half unconscious, yet terrified, found herself struggling with the crowd.

Another vibration, that sent the throng of human beings swaying and falling upon each other, shrieking for mercy—and the outer air.

At that moment, in the extremity of her terror, Cicely's mouth uplifted herself, and the fear near her dearer than all the world, cried, in an agony of pain and fear,

"Oh, John, save me! save me!"

Ah! she was in those arms; held close, close in a passionate clasp, and to that heart she knew now beat only for her. How she clung to him, and how sweet and the terror seemed, for then so gently put her from him, with these whispered words:

"God help us both, Cicely; it is too late."

His pallid lips trembled as he spoke.

She hardly remembered what happened after that, walking home as one in a dream. She heard people talking about the earthquake, and vaguely wished that all the world would have followed them up when her head lay on John's bosom. She trembled with rapture and horror when she did not think of Robinson Crusoe. What should she do? How should she live?

A neighbor called in a few days after. Her heart-quake—one of those angular specimens of the genus spinster of which every village has at least one—had had a daily recurrence, and the tastes of those who are willing to listen and gossip by night.

"Curious about Lettie Davis, isn't it?" she asked, her sly orbs noting the tremor and sudden pallor of Cicely, who had a vivid recollection of her left hand and arm, and was slowly rolling a ball of yarn into vigorous proportions.

"Haven't you heard, Cicely?" she queried again.

"I haven't heard any thing about Lettie," said Cicely, not daring to lift her eyes, for the blending of sudden hope and fear conquered to send the blood to her face, but as quickly to turn it back in a current so cold that Cicely shivered involuntarily, and almost dreaded that her tenth would chatter.

"S'pose you remember Lettie's old fortune of two years ago? Jedus Harris' sort o' cousin, I believe. Let liked him, but the old folks wasn't consulted on either side. He died and left her one time. Well, what do you think? Seems when that yearthquake began Lettie run down one of the alleys and never stopped till she came to Colonel Harris's, nearly faintin' with fright, was she declared, for she see but Colonel Harris there. He'd come back the night afore. It's like a story 'bout him. He's been goin' straight all along; and, through his brother's influence, they say, he's to become a partner in one o' the best houses in Cincinnati or St. Louis, somewhere's which. Now Yorke is a harnsome fellow; you know that, Cicely; you've seen him. My dear, there's no gentleman in this village cuts such a dash."

"Indeed!" repeated Cicely, with conscious that something was expected to be said; what was there very strange in all this? she thought.

"Well, granny, I'm glad for her sake. She always was a flirt; either she wants to make t'other man jealous, now she's sure of him, or there's been a quarrel. I walked on Main Street three times with Lettie Davis; I've seen 'em myself."

"Yes."

"I'd as lief tell news to a stick as to you, child; it's all 'yes' and 'well.' It's plain to see what's been on your mind better'n ever; and he's on the road to money, and Let wants a rich husband, I know that. You ought to see him now, such a splendid beard! And style!—why, there's no comparison."

Cicely listened, but told herself she did not in the least care—was not in the least interested. The sad look, the trembling voice of John, good John, manly, grand John, whom she had so desperately trifled with, were ever before her eyes, ever sounding in her heart.

"God help us both, Cicely; it is too late."

Was Miss Crichton's penetration at fault? The corners of her thin lips twitched a little as she looked at her. How she did long to know whose fault it was that John and Cicely had become as strangers all at once; but something in Cicely's face forbade the question, and she ran up stairs to spin her little toothsome yarns to grandma.

Cicely was alone. The ball of yarn had dropped from her hands. Yet, the great yellow cat, had stopped it with one velvety paw, and was gazing with a look of almost human interest into the face of her mistress. Then the girl leaned her head against the high back of the old rocking-chair, and all the beauty and pathos and tenderness of life seemed to fall away as the misty eyes closed, and the choking sob swelled in her throat.

It was "too late—too late."

He it known unto the reader that Miss Crichtons of all the Sunday flock had been a witness to that little scene in the aisle of the parish church. Half startled out of her wits as she was, true to her instincts as item-gatherer for the community at large, she noted the circumstance, and having a little bone to pick with Lettie, whom she very much disliked, she imparted the matter to her, with a few variations, under the seal of eternal secrecy.

"It was natural, perhaps; you know every body expected Cicely and he'd make a match, once," and I s'pose they both thought their time 'd come."

Lettie was angry, jealous, humiliated. Whenever she thought of it, her vain, fickle little heart swelled with resentment; even at first, when she happened to be thinking about it, her cousin came in, and that was very often. He was a discreet young man, had cultivated all himself at finding the old love revived, and desperately unhappy because Lettie was so cruel. It also occurred to Lettie that, compared to this Adonis, blonde hair, beard, and all, John, with his compact, muscular figure looked a little coarse. There was no denying that; but he looked a trifle grand, too.

John had merged all the week. This was something new for him of late. Why could he not forget that one moment of folly, as well as the heavenly sweet? In vain he called himself to task; in vain he threw all his energy into business for five minutes at a time; in vain he strove as resolutely as he could to put aside his uneasy thoughts.

Ever and anon he gave a downward glance, as if to assure himself that there, on his bosom, that dear face was buried, and ever and anon sinful eyes seemed uplifted to his. What should he do? He must be honorable.

Lettie out with the whole matter one day. It was after Yorke Harris had been sitting in a melancholy attitude, listening as she read the few simple airs he remembered of long syne.

John came in just as Yorke had gone out, saying to himself, "I am grateful for this."

"So that's the fellow!"

Poor John! He had never dreamed of this, and the blood rushed to his face. What could he say, what could he do, but the most awkward thing possible? He took him so completely by surprise, that, leaning one hand on the slender table full of nick-nacks, he overturned brum, with its hanging pendants, the card-basket, and every thing movable went to dancing with the sudden, furious trembling and shaking of his nerves.

Lettie consulted on this occasi .n rose to the verge of heroism. She even thought of Yorke's handsome face and his great love for her, poor fellow! In a moment her little romance and she determined to be generous.

"You needn't answer, John," she said, making herself as tall and stately as possible; "I presume it is true. Of course, from this time our engagement is ended, and perhaps it is better for both of us. I'm sure it is for me," she added, a little sting of a laugh at the close.

"But, Lettie—" stammered poor John, more and more confused; and if Lettie wanted revenge, why, she had it in witnessing his very visible mortification—his dumb anger that he was unable to defend himself as he knew he could and ought to.

"Never mind, Mr. Saunders," she said at last, "I don't care the least bit in the world" (she knew it was a fib). "You won't want to stay, I suppose; and I promised Mr. Yorke Harris that I would go to the theatre with him. He is going to take me over in the colonel's carriage."

It was one more little stroke given to the city, John thought on receiving this strong hint. How he possessed himself of his hat, how he got out of that house, he never knew. But he did know, as the hours went on, that he was glad to be free. The sweet thought of Cicely was no burden now, and he said to himself a dozen times, "I thank God!"

John did the best thing he could do under the circumstances—had a long, delicious talk with Cicely some days afterward. Perhaps the trial did them both good, for Cicely made a solemn vow that she would never be a little hypocrite again, but tell the truth in all sincerity of heart; and John went about as if he had been vouchsafed a glimpse of paradise.

Miss Crichton was disappointer, hugged herself whenever she saw Cicely's engagement ring. John pulverized and frowned, but to this day, when sometimes the scene of Lettie's dismissal flashed across his mind, for he was not a little proud. Yet that did not hinder him from being the happiest man alive.

Lettie was quite as pleased as either of them, for she had transferred her affections easily to the fascinating Yorke Harris, who carried her off in triumph.

So Cicely became Mrs. Saunders before the end of the year, and the old grandmother's prediction was fulfilled, though it took an unchi quake to bring it about.

LAKE DWELLINGS.

THE large tract of land that forms the delta of the Orinoco possesses some very remarkable characteristics. It is always wet, but during several months in the year it is completely inundated, the river rising to an astonishing height, and covering with water a tract nearly half as large as England. This seems to be an unpropitious a spot as could be adopted for human habitation, and yet the Warraus (or Guraioo, as Humboldt spells the name), have established themselves there, and prefer it to any other locality, probably because every article of food they use enables them to pass an existence of freedom. Varying much in the height to which it rises, in some places exceeding fifty feet, the Orinoco has the quality of rising year after year to the same height to the day, and the natives have learned so much to designate the height to which the water rose in one year, the same mark will answer a near after year, with the greatest certainty. Irrigation. Here the Ita palm thrives, which supplies to the Warrau food, shelter, materials, and furniture; fire, scheming four that grow near each other in the form of a square, and cutting away any intervening trees, he makes deep incisions in the trunks some three feet above high-water mark. In these notches are laid beams that are tightly lashed in their places by means of tough fibres. On these beams are laid a number of cross pieces, usually consisting of the slender stems of the leaves, then a layer of the leaves themselves, and finally a smooth coating of mud, which soon dries under the influence of the tropical sun. Above, hard, and firm flooring, that will bear a fire without risk of damage to the combustible materials. A ten or twelve feet above the floor the Warrau constructs a roof of palm leaves, the corners of which are supported by the same trees which uphold the house.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

NEVER was a December more lovely than has been this of 1870. It seems to have forgotten its old established character, and has appeared in such a novel guise that we scarcely know it. The rain, the icicles, alone about October days when the calendar tells us it is December, delightful as they are when appearing in delightful for riding and walking, for business and for pleasure. Expected favorable have been the long intensive shopping which invariably precedes the holidays; and Broadway daily testifies that the ladies, at least, have been advantaged by it. Not that they would have been kept at home by rain, or wind, or snow at this season. Not even an order of no fire for them could forth courage and endurance. Christmas and New-Year's come once in a twelvemonth, and therefore must nurturers with the pleasurable business connected with them. Not even the 21st of December—our great day—makes for bringing us lovely days of warmth and sunshine. All the wiseacres shake their heads, prophesy badly saying: "We shall have no winter." But if the weather is very unseasonable; it can not last." We do not expect to be late. Even the sleighs and all the scientific out-lookers on Mount Washington may discover in the distance, but they will not descend to snow-cloude; the telegraphic wires may signal this unwonted mildness to the country, but no sooner are these lines the wild winds may be blowing, and earth may be shrouded in white. But, while the bright days are here we, in the city, must make the most of them, for bring, and not progressicate evil in the future, concerning ourselves nor knowledge is as limited.

The recent accidents which befell our transatlantic cables have given the public an idea of what it would be if no lines were established, and what a boon to us this wonderful apparatus. A morning paper with no intelligence from France and Germany, from England, Italy, or Spain! We should hardly recognize it. Each person now by cable has become very much a necessity to the American people, and we can not go back. We can not go back to the old times—we must go forward.

That the Germans expect to spend Christmas in or before Paris is shown by a post-office notice recently issued at Berlin. It stated that in order to effect the dispatch of Christmas presents to the troops in France, the usual post-office period would be reduced in the present extent till the evening of the 8th of December, when the receipt of parcels would be discontinued.

Very curious it is to notice how popular names in literature or in the arts are applied to the most contrasting purposes. Thus we have Shakspeare associated in a fuming advertisement of the "Lothair Knife-Cleaner."

The Court Journal says: "Only seven persons have been created English titles since the accession from the United States, thus far. Why not appoint a lady?"

Perhaps it is not too late in the season to tell a curious story. Last year, a few days before the end of last November a turkey was brought by a farmer into the market in Syracuse. It was immediately noticed by somebody's dinner on that festive day, only the owner waited to obtain a good price for it. The fowl was, therefore, sold, and it was left in the butcher's shop on with its legs tied. It had no idea, however, of such proceedings, and it escaped from the shop shortly, in spite of cackled legs, it soared aloft, but with such a swaying motion, that it could not possibly determine pane of glass in a store window, and, lighting upon a sewing-machine, was caught. The glass, and a ing about $150, was left with a smooth hole and numerous radiating cracks. The turkey did not lose a feather, and has been "plucked" since.

A new "Garden for the People" will soon be open to the inhabitants of London; and the public are to be admitted on Sundays as well as week-days. It is to include fifty acres of land.

The infant son of Vice-President Colfax is to be the recipient of an elegant table service in silver—a gift of Senators of both political parties, as a testimony of friendship to the father. The service consists of a tray, bowl, cup, plate, knife, fork, spoon, and napkin-ring—the whole inclosed in a superb French walnut case, specially wrought in panels. The tray, which is beautifully ornamented, and inlaid with fretted gold of twelve different kinds, has in the centre a plate for the inscription, "Schuyler Colfax, Jun., from Senators of the 41st Congress." An expansion of the tray at the side is supported by a shield of rat gold, with monogram, surmounted by a wreath of tuberoses and morning-glories. The bowl and cup are finished in Oriental pearl and inlaid with gold. The knife, fork, and spoon also have handles of gold, and the napkin-ring bears the monogram "S. C., Jun.," in delicate characters. The casings are of French walnut, with a cover of damp and satin-wood, inlaid with flowers.

A good fat cat now costs ten francs in Paris.

The Marquis of Lorne is popular just now. A photographer in Edinburgh established himself over a London house for sixty thousand of his photographs.

A citizen of Toledo, while dining at a hotel recently, found a diamond ring of great value suspended by the lodgment of a turkey bone within the esophagus. The astonishment and shocking was followed by vomiting. Medical aid was obtained, but the bone could not be withdrawn by instruments, and its sharp edges produced much torture. Finally an attempt was made to thrust it down into the stomach. This was at length accomplished by a long, whalebone probe, handsome, to the end of which a piece of sponge was firmly attached. The sponge down was accomplished slowly, and with great pain to the patient.

The article gold pen, in imitation of a quill, which was recently mentioned as having been made by Herr Biesinger, jeweler, of Pforzheim, with a view to curtail Bismarck's signing the treaty of peace in Paris with it, has been presented to Count, who, in acknowledging it, wrote: "Your beautiful and very artistic present has reached me in safety. I think I will first some difficulty is knowing how to express my thanks for it." The Count might have added, "And how I shall get into Paris to use it."

During the year ending September 30, 1870, there were filed in the Patent Office 19,411 applications for patents, 14,357 of which were applications for the extension of patents; 13,622 patents, including reissues and designs, issued, 11,094 hundered, and 1,528 allowed, but not issued, by reason of the non-payment of the final fee. The receipts for the office during the fiscal year were $13,620,439 in excess of its expenditure.

Rumors from France are to the effect that the weather has been severe there, and that the ground has been frozen hard. Quite a contrast to our weather here, where the mercury has been hovering about the 60° mark.

A novelty has been started in Islington, England, in the establishment of a church solely for children. The service commences at half past six o'clock in the evening, and continues for half an hour. No infants or adults are admitted. There is a good deal of singing, and a short prayer, but no address or sermon of about twenty minutes' duration is delivered.

The Prussians are said to use the children they take prisoners in France for the purpose of learning French, and speak both French and German, are found useful. Yet it seems very and thus to make the children tractable, as it were, by kindness.

St. Cloud is converted into a fortress; the woods have been cut down, trenches made, and batteries erected. Its position as well as broad-works for its fanzy, rifle-pits, etc.; every house and wall has been loopholed. The defenses are strongly barricaded. Some of the articles employed in constructing the defenses are strangely out of keeping with their present use. The Imperial Throne, a square plain arrow as a stand for a richness under a peculiar loophole; and an Ea. Cole's Patent Safe, with its iron doors, is the component parts of which is a stuffed peacock, in close proximity to a gilded cage.

In Germany there are upward of 18,000 widows and 120,000 fatherless children, in consequence of the losses in the Landwehr corps alone, which is computed chiefly at married men.

We notice a statement that Dr. Russell has seen one of the Prussian rotten-cards marked oil for portions up to January 10, 1871.

At Strasburg all traces of the siege are fast disappearing. The fortifications are said to be restored to nearly their former strength. A large number of workmen are employed in repairing the Cathedral, and it will shortly be reopened by the Prussians.

Many of our readers have very little realizing sense of the immense labor involved in our city postal service, or of the thorough systematization which is required in the post-office in order to keep the machine perfection. During the month of October the total number of letters in New York city was 1,344,176, of which 1,285,340 came by mail, and 998,679 were "drop" or city letters. There are nearly three hundred letter-carriers employed in this department throughout the city are about fourteen hundred street boxes; but those in the business district are not content to stop a box. A proposition has been made, and is under consideration, of placing boxes on alternate corners of the streets all over the city—an arrangement which would be convenient for the correspondents, but which would inevitably require more than the fifty collectors now employed to remove the valuable contents of the boxes. Letters are collected from the boxes from six to ten times daily, according to circumstances. Up town the earliest collection is at half past five in the morning, and the latest at half past six in the evening; down town the earliest is at half past seven A.M., and the latest at seven P.M. The variations in time are with special reference to business convenience. Every drop-letter is stamped with the hour of its receipt by the post-office department; and with the exception of those dropped late at night, no city letter should be more than three hours reaching its destination. Many hours often elapse, however, and detectives are employed to discover the cause of the delay. Sometimes the fault lies between the collector and carrier; but statistics show that the greatest number of delays occur in putting letters into the boxes with wrong addresses, sometimes with only a part of an address, and again with no address at all! Some are not stamped; others bear marks of the stamping-machine, and perhaps upon them. Investigation proves that some dishonest office-boy or messenger has skillfully removed them for his own private use. An unpaid letter is detained for prepayment, though the sender is always notified when it is possible to learn his name.

We find in the Gentleman's Magazine an anecdote of George IV., which is said to be now in print: At a small dinner-party at Carlton House Colonel Hamilton, one of the boon companions of the Prince, told a story which, like many of the stories of the Regency, was more distinguished by its point than its propriety. "Colonel Hamilton," said the Prince, "I met Gentleman in Europe" filled his glass and threw its contents in the colonel's face, saying, "Hamilton, you're a blackguard." What was the Colonel to do? To challenge the Regent was treason; and yet to return the insult in kind was to take a course which would have compelled the Prince, as a gentleman, to challenge the colonel. Hamilton was equal to the occasion, however; he rose, and yet to sit still was impossible. Colonel Hamilton was equal to the difficulty by filling his glass and throwing the wine into the face of his next companion. "If his Royal Highness's name was Guelph," he was wit in action. He seized Colonel Hamlyn's friendship with George IV. "Hamlyn," he said, with a slap on the shoulder, "you're a capital fellow. Here's a toast to you."

Now that the question of the payment of an Indemnity by France at the end of the war is likely to become a matter of discussion, it may interest our readers to know what France had to pay at the command of the allied powers after the war in 1815. The payments were of three kinds—namely, the indemnity proper, the cost of the army of occupation, and the claims of foreigners who had been despoiled or injured by the French revolutionary government. The amounts were assessed as follows: 1. Indemnity to allied powers, 700,000,000 francs. 2. Pay, equipment, and clothing of army of occupation for three years—the provisions, fuel, and forage to be furnished by France, 265,000,000 francs. 3. Foreign and British claims, the Bank of Hamburg, 25,000,000 francs. Total, 1,165,000,000 francs. This total in pounds sterling made a sum of about 46¾ millions.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN a man comes home and tries to bolt the door with a seven-pound poker, unless the fire will keep up a coffee-pot, attempts to wind up the clock with his boots, and finally, after blowing out his companion with the paper-knife, takes a cold potato in his hand to light his bed-candle, he is getting excited. In such a case, you may reasonably infer that he has been making the acquaintance of some very friendly spirits.

It is said that the reason why the Russian government is so slow in availing itself of the electric telegraph is that it is afraid of the effect of the necessary preliminary operations—such as streaking the Poles, for instance.

An enterprising ice-cream maker in Chicago advertises: "Parties supplied by the quart or gallon, and delivered in any part of the city." For those who wish to obtain ice-cream by the lb an eighth-quarter.

The man who shot and killed a boy in his molen patch, when called to account for the deed, said he did it in sorrow for the boy, who otherwise might have died a painful death from cholera morbus.

An elderly fat gentleman, in discussing a warm breakfast of a chop, called to the waiting Miss Alsace, being one more bread; I just a good deal of bread to my chop." "Certainly, sir, certainly, sir, immediately," "Please your honor, and ye eat a good deal of steak to your head."

Why is a young lawyer like the national currency? —Because he is a legal tender, and somewhat green.

A dabbler in literature and the fine arts, who prided himself on his knowledge of art, was overheard a few days since sitting upon the bank of the river angling for minnows. "Ah," he was heard to say, "this fishing for art does not embarrass, it excites the fancy little to the mind, and is a delightful amusement to the mind upon whose pride it affords a stinty allurement?" "Why, bait the hook, my boy, I'm definite!"

Of all the specimens of German-American orthography we have seen, that in the light bread of a Hartford saloon-keeper is the most excruciating. He has "patent light bread," and it reads "Rosenbloom's Gedrunk." Was der teufel ist das? "Positively No Trust!"

Why is an elephant unlike a tree? Because a tree bears leaves in the spring, and the elephant leaves when the menagerie does.

A gentleman, stating that a person engaged in an extensive business in Boston had lately been robbed by a lady if he knew whom he succeeded in business; to which the gentleman replied that he did not know whom he succeeded, but it was evident that he did not succeed himself.

According to the articles of war it is death to stop a common-ball.

At a church of "color," about twenty miles from Albany, the other evening, the minister soliciting a number of persons, both white and colored, standing upon the seats during service, called out in a loud voice, "All persons will please step down, both white and color; I see no more for the one dun de odder." Instead the proper persons to step down, they will say, "I'm dun pulpit commences singing in short meter:

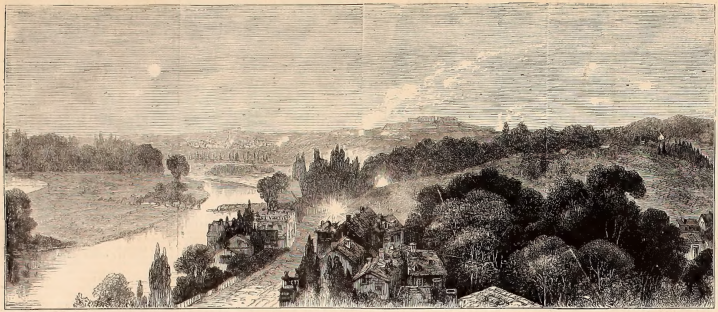
Go dun and dun de odder,
Bof white man and color;
Dun I does for de white man,
Dun I does for de odder.

A church of "color," about twenty miles from Albany, the other evening, the minister soliciting a number of persons, both white and colored, standing upon the seats during service, called out in a loud voice, "All persons will please step down, both white and color; I see no more for the one dun de odder." Instead the proper persons to step down, they will say, "I'm dun pulpit commences singing in short meter:

Go dun and dun de odder,
Bof white man and color;
Dun I does for de white man,
Dun I does for de odder.

FORTUNE-TELLERS.—Bunk clerks.

When the Chinese want to describe a person who pretends to be very brave, and makes a great noise, but who shows his courage, they say that "he is cutting down bamboo to frighten the tigers." "Yes, sir, I did tree down dat tree," said a Western negro to a fellow-hand over the fence—"look-ahee." "Yes, sir, I did tree down dat tree." "Yah, yah, I does." "Yes, sir, I did tip dat tree right over." "Yah, yah, I does." "Was you in dat tree after?" "No, sir, I was not in dat tree after." "Well, I will tell you de day, Sambo." "Well, sure, I did." Sambo scratched the back of his head out of the longest line, and don't hear sullin drap. What do you say, Sambo?" "I do say, I do come." "No, you don't: 'twas dis 'ere nigga; like to broke he neck 'cross hinggin' bout ober stock."



SCENE OF A LATE SORTIE FROM PARIS.

SCENE OF A LATE SORTIE FROM PARIS.

THE above picturesque sketch represents the scene of a recent sortie from Paris, to which the French have given the name of the "battle of La Malmaison." Although the affair, which took place October 21, was the most serious that had occurred previous to the desperate attempt under General DUCROT to break through the Prussian lines of investment, it ended in the usual way; and an afternoon of sharp and bloody fighting was closed by a long string of Gardes Mobiles and Zouaves being marched under escort to Versailles. At Malmaison, JOSEPHINE'S Malmaison, there is a pavilion in the EMPRESS'S garden, where, it is said, the first NAPOLEON planned the Jena and Austerlitz campaign. There was some hard fighting about there, and the dead and wounded lay about the garden when the day's work was done; and around the church of Reuil, with its monuments "à Josephine, Eugène, et Hortense," the Prussians are now quartered. So the whirligig of Time brings about its revenges; but who can tell when it may take a turn the other way?

THE POPULATION OF PARIS.

IN 1866 the entire city of Paris within the fortifications comprised a civil population of 1,799,980, which, with 23,294 military, made a population of 1,825,274, occupying an area of 7802 hectares (the hectare is a little more than two acres). Prior to 1860 the city proper only extended over the 3438 hectares within the octroi limits, and in 1856 the density of population within that boundary was 242 persons per hectare, while in the circle outside the octroi, but within the fortifications, there were only 83 persons per hectare. Taking both outer and inner circles together, the average density was 197 persons per hectare in 1856, whereas in 1866 it was 234. Taking Paris as a whole, twice as many people were living on the same area in 1866 as in 1831, the tendency to agglomeration of course going on latterly with great rapidity in the banlieue, thanks to the dispensation of M. HAUSSMANN. As regards area, Paris is just about twice the size of Vienna and of Dublin, nearly four times the size of Liverpool and Glasgow, about 1300 hectares larger than Berlin, and about a quarter of the size of London within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board. But the inhabitants of London and Berlin have more than double the elbow-room of the Parisians.

The number of houses in Paris in 1866 was 57,686, of which 1057 were uninhabited. This gives a ratio of 32 persons to each inhabited house. The number of separate tenancies (locations) was 641,165, providing for 675,222 distinct families or establishments. The houses in Paris are covered principally with zinc and slate. Only 149 thatched houses were to be found, and those in the outer parts of the city. In 1861 there were 8061 houses having nothing but a ground-floor; but in 1866 these had been reduced to 4778. On the other hand, houses with four stories above the rez-de-chaussée had increased from 14,347 to 16,197.

In point of origin and nationality the civil population of Paris comprised 592,763 born Parisians, 1,098,818 persons born in the French provinces, 2212 naturalized foreigners, 16,114 foreigners, and a small remnant of 1773 whose nationality could not be or was not ascertained. Of the foreigners, 8015 were English, 4022 Americans, 30,356 Germans, 28,430 Belgians, 6509 Dutchmen, 7298 Italians, 9939 Swiss, 2939 Spaniards, 1267 Russians, 4100 Poles, 501 Swedes and Danes, 304 Mexico-Wallachians, 281 Greeks, 307 Turks, and 1225 other foreigners. Thus it appears that only 33 per cent. of the population of the French capital are true Parisians, while nearly 6 per cent. are foreigners, of whom by far the largest proportion were Germans and Belgians, the English being comparatively few.

A DEAD SHOT.—[SEE POEM ON PAGE 834.]

Game of Ring-Toss.

Figure 1.

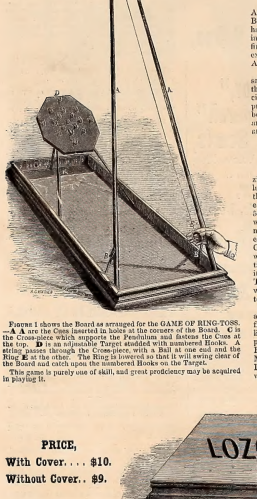


FIGURE 1 shows the Board as arranged for the GAME OF RING-TOSS. —A A are the Cues inserted in holes at the corners of the Board. C is the Cross-piece which supports the Pendulum and fastens the Cues at the top. D is an adjustable Target studded with numbered Hooks. A string passes through the Cross-piece, with a Ball at one end and the Ring E at the other. The Ring is lowered so that it will swing clear of the Board and catch upon the numbered Hooks on the Target.

This game is purely one of skill, and great proficiency may be acquired in playing it.

THE most wonderful invention of the age for the entertainment of children and adults is the LOZO PENDULUM BOARD, having a combination of eight different games, viz.:

Game No. 1. Ring-Toss with Ring.
" " 2. Ten-Pins with Swinging Ball.
" " 3. Pockets " " "
" " 4. Bagatelle " " "
" " 5. Ten-Pins with Cues and Balls.
" " 6. Pockets " " "
" " 7. Bagatelle " " "

And, by reversing the Bagatelle Board, it becomes a Miniature Billiard Table. All contained in the small space of three and a half feet in length, twelve inches in width, and two and a half inches in depth. It is made of Black Walnut, lined with the finest quality of Billiard Cloth, and it is furnished with a Cover to exclude dust, Two Cues, Ten Balls, a Set of Ten-Pins, and an Adjustable Target, Bagatelle, and Lockers.

In introducing the Lozo Pendulum Board I do not hesitate to say that it has no superior. The immense sale which followed the introduction of this Board into New York and other Eastern cities gives it precedence over all game-boards that have been presented to the American public during many years. It has been praised by the press, it has been commended by the clergy, and has every where received universal approbation as an elevating attraction for the home circle.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

Since my advertisements appeared in the thirty different magazines I have been called upon to forward by mail over 7000 illustrated catalogues, and I have come to the conclusion to place these illustrations before the public in such a manner as to have every one see them at a glance. There are probably no less than 500,000 persons who have seen those advertisements, and have wondered what the Lozo Pendulum Board was. Taking this medium to illustrate and describe it, I trust that no father, mother, brother, sister, uncle, or aunt, who are about to make a Christmas present or a New-Year's gift to their relatives or friends, will make a purchase before seeing this truly beautiful combination of parlor games. I call your particular attention to the editorials in Harper's Bazar and Frank Leslie's of last week. This Board is no toy, being made of the very best material. It will last five years with ordinary use, and I guarantee every thing to be as represented.

I also state that it is for sale by every Bookseller, Stationer, and Music Dealer throughout the United States and Canadas, from the fact that all of them have received my circular and price-list, from British Columbia to California. If you are desirous of purchasing one of these Boards, you can order it through your Bookseller, or send to me direct, inclosing a Post-Office Order or Money in Registered Letter, or by Express at my expense, or by Draft on New York by mail, upon the receipt of which I will forward one to any part of the United States by return express.

Pocket Game.

Figure 3.

FIGURE 3 shows the Board as arranged for the POCKET GAME.—This game is played with the Pendulum Ball, in the same manner as the game of Ten-Pins. I is an adjustable Pocket, or series of numbered stalls. The object of the game is to propel a ball into each stall, or to obtain the greatest number of points possible by adding together the numbers at the head of the stalls scored.

PRICE,
With Cover.... $10.
Without Cover.. $9.

LOZO-PENDULUM BOARD

PRICE,
With Cover.... $10.
Without Cover.. $9.

Game of Ten-Pins.

Figure 2.

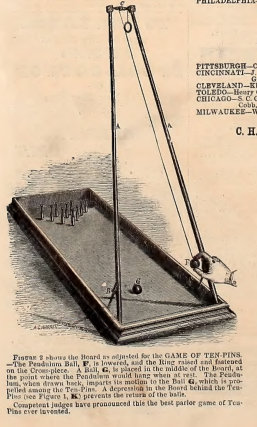

FIGURE 2 shows the Board as adjusted for the GAME OF TEN-PINS. —The Pendulum Ball, F, is lowered, and the Ring raised and fastened on the Cross-piece. A Ball, G, is placed in the middle of the Board, at the point where the Pendulum would hang when at rest. The Pendulum, when drawn back, imparts its motion to the Ball G, which is propelled among the Ten-Pins. A depression in the Board behind the Ten-Pins (see Figure 1, K) prevents the return of the balls.

Competent judges have pronounced this the best parlor game of Ten-Pins ever invented.

I take pleasure in announcing to the trade and the public that they can be furnished with the Lozo Pendulum Board at manufacturer's prices by the following well-known houses, also by a large number of others not here mentioned, which is a sufficient indorsement of all that I have said.

PHILADELPHIA—J. B. Lippincott & Co.
Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger.
G. A. Schwarz.
Myer & Co.
Henry Cohen & Son
R. & G. A. Wright.
George Doll & Co.
John Doll.
Turner & Co.
Leon Hirsch.
PITTSBURGH—C. Yeager & Co.
CINCINNATI—J. C. Wey & Son.
Beeny & Co.
CLEVELAND—Brainerd & Ambrosius.
TOLEDO—Henry C. Stebbins.
CHICAGO—S. C. Griggs & Co.
Cobb, Pritchard, & Co.
MILWAUKEE—Wisconsin News Co.

ST. LOUIS—St. Louis Book & News Co.
SAN FRANCISCO—A. Roman & Co.
NASHVILLE—William Gamble & Co.
ROCHESTER—Steel & Avery.
SYRACUSE—Connelly Brothers.
BUFFALO—Ernst Bower & Bechler.
TROY—L. Willard & Co.
R. D. Burdett & Co.
ALBANY—Dorr Fuller.
HARTFORD—Geer & Pond.
NEW HAVEN—Skinner & Sperry.
BOSTON—Joseph L. Bates.
NORFOLK, Va.—Vickery & Co.
BALTIMORE, Md.—Steele & Wright.
Wenning Brothers.
DUNKIRK, Iowa—Palmer & Co.
NORWICH, Conn.—C. A. Burnham.
NEW LONDON, Conn.—Henry Bishop, Jr.

C. H. JOSLIN, Wholesale and Retail Dealer in Parlor and Field Games,
704 BROADWAY, New York.

Game of Bagatelle.

Figure 4.

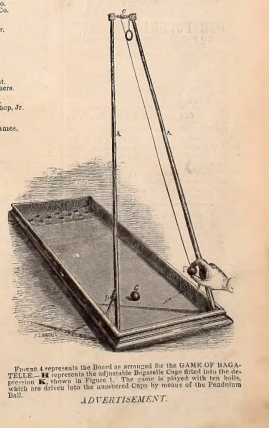

FIGURE 4 represents the Board as arranged for the GAME OF BAGATELLE.—H represents the adjustable Bagatelle Cups fitted into the depression K, shown in Figure 1. The game is played with ten balls, which are driven into the numbered Cups by means of the Pendulum Ball.

ADVERTISEMENT.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

MRS. A. V. SNOW, of Fort Kent, N. Y., has used a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine eleven and a half years without a cent's worth of repairs. She is a seamstress and dress-maker, and made the first year one hundred shirts, besides doing all her family sewing for a family of eight persons. For two years past the machine has earned over $250 a year on custom work, besides doing all Mrs. Snow's family sewing. She has yet some of the first dozen of needles sent with the machine.—[Com.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHRISTMAS APPEAL
FOR POOR CHILDREN.

Whiter is a pallid season to the poor and homeless children of the city. The Children's Aid Society has under its charge many thousands, and there is among them peculiar suffering this year, from the want of clothing and shoes. Great numbers come to the Industrial Schools and Lodging-Houses bare-footed, half clad, and shivering in the winter's cold. Hundreds suffer from want of food. Many who are homeless and wandering about the streets of the city apply to the Central Office for a home. The season of Yule-tide is near at hand, and the Society

Calls for aid to make the Christmas Holidays happy also for those who have no home and few friends. We wish to give one cheerful day at least to the children of the poor. For Fifty Dollars we can provide three hundred children with clothing and shoes, even to the far West, where they will grow up to be honest men and women in farmers' families. Who will give this Christmas present of a home? A party of these homeless children are ready to start for the West by the Holidays if the means are provided. If our friends kindly aid, we hope to give a good Christmas dinner to the thousands of little girls in our twenty Industrial Schools, and to the Newsboys' Lodging-House and homeless girls in our five Lodging-Houses. We shall be grateful for a hundred pairs of shoes and warm garments among the clothing for the children. Our objects are to teach and make better and save to usefulness the thousands of neglected children in the streets of New York City. Who in this season of "good-will" will aid us in this work? Who will be of Him who especially cared for the poor?

C. L. BRACE, Secretary,
(Children's Aid Society, 19 East 4th St., N.Y.)

Gifts of provisions and clothing may be sent to the Central Office, 19 East 4th St., New York, or will be called for if the address be forwarded.

Donations of money may be inclosed to either of the undersigned. If they are in checks or post-office orders they can be made payable to the order of C. E. Wilkins, Treasurer.

WILLIAM A. BOOTH, President, 100 Wall St.
J. E. WILLIAMS, Treasurer, Metropolitan National Bank, Broadway.
C. L. BRACE, Secretary, 19 East 4th St.

* WORK OF THE YEAR.

There were, during the past year, in over five Lodging Houses, 11,161 different boys and Girls, and 136,096 lodgings and 196,178 meals were supplied. 6,000 were sent to good homes, mainly in the West. In the 19 day and 8 evening Industrial Schools were taught children, who were taught and partly fed and clothed. Orphans who have been in Lodging Houses, 4,457.

For Moth Patches, Freckles & Tan,

Use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable, and harmless. Sold by Druggists. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

"OUR POPULAR SHIRTS,"

MADE TO ORDER FROM BEST MATERIALS, AND WARRANTED TO FIT.

Sent by express, C. O. D., to any part of the country, at the following rates:

6 Shirts, Good Muslin and Linen Fronts..... $9 00
6 " " Fine Muslin and Good Linen..... 10 00
6 " " Masonville Muslin and Fine Linen..... 12 00
6 " " Wamsutta Muslin and Very Fine Linen..... 15 00
6 " " New York Mills and Better Linen..... 18 00

HEARD MEASURE.

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.
649 Avenue A, Corner 39th St., N. Y.

A GOOD THING.—THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL and Life Illustrated, for 1871. Devoted to Phrenology, Physiology, Physiognomy, Anthropology, Psychology, Education, Art, Science, Literature, and all measures calculated to reform, improve, and elevate mankind, physically, mentally, and spiritually. A first-class magazine at $3 a year. With either of Harpers, only $5. Address
S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 3 Samples sent complete postpaid for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.
R. L. WOLCOTT, 191 Chatham Square, N. Y.

BOSSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS for 10c.—AND MANY OTHER GOOD THINGS.—At their Stalls. The complete series, Nos. 1 to 27, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type, on fine white paper, large size, in volumes containing 900 to 970 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. LA SONNAMBULA.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOSSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N. Y. Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, 21 12.

$75 PER WEEK easily made by Agents. Address Box 34, P.O., Cromwell, Conn.

STEINWAY & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
Piano-Fortes,

Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Royal Society des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Cross and Ribbon from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academicien Diploma, from the Academy of Fine Arts, Academy of Sciences and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm; and, also, of the first Prize Medal at the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first class Premiums from 1853 to 1869, inclusive, since which time Steinway & Sons have not entered their Piano-fortes at any local fair in the United States.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory is now conceded to be not only the most perfectly arranged, and the most extensive and productive establishment of the kind in the world, the official Internal Revenue returns, as published for 1868-'69, having exceeded the startling fact that the number of Pianos sold by them, and the amount of their sales, are Nearly Double those of the largest Piano-manufactory in America, and exceed those of the twelve largest Piano makers of New York combined.

STEINWAY & SONS

beg to announce A GENERAL REDUCTION in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles, as the materials for their Pianos. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, they will hereafter make a variation in the size of Grand Pianos, expressed under the general designation of—taste, schools, &c.—have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of Instrument, termed a thoroughly complete Instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior and exterior workmanship as their highest-priced 7-octave Pianos; possessing, consequently, all the power and depth of tone of the Concert Grand, but with a smaller case, and accordingly next exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied at a greatly reduced price, and while roughly first-class "Steinway Pianos," yet are limited to responding with the MODERATE PRICES.

The "School" Piano,

Steinway & Sons also desire to call special attention to their new

Patent Upright Pianos,

with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing firmer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than other Pianos at present manufactured.

Every Piano is Warranted for Five Years.

PRICE-LISTS and ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed free on application.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,
Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth Street,
(Between 4th Ave. and Irving Place,) NEW YORK.

LOOK OUT for the Christmas Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY, with a superb Double Page Supplement. This will be one of the most elegant papers ever published in the world. Price 10 cts.

FIRST PREMIUM awarded by Amer. Inst. 1870. MICROSCOPES, Illustrated Pamphlet, with coin-MAGIC LANTERNS. ingues free to any address. T. H. MCALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

$10 A DAY—Business entirely new. Address J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

The celebrated IMPATIENT-GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" Improved Cases justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and durability of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and for time to $25 Watches; Seven of extra fine Jewels, $18, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled, expressly for railroading, equal in appearance to $250 gold watch. For time magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches put in hunting cases, and full-jeweled stem-winders, Collins Metal, $2 to $5. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.

All persons holding Patrons' Tickets in Branch Series are hereby notified that the fund is being distributed. Send for Circulars and Samples. Address Washington Medallion Pen Co., N. Y., inclosing Stamp.

UNRIVALLED HOLIDAY NOVELTIES.

House Coats, Dressing Robes, "Our Fritz," "Chancellor," "Monarch" Scarfs, Stylish and Fashionable

With an Immense Variety of

HOSIERY,

Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin

GLOVES,

LINED AND UNLINED.

SILK SUSPENDERS,
INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.

Union Adams & Co.,
637 Broadway.

THE BEST PRESENT

You can make a child is an "Excelsior Swing," for indoor use. A child can SWING WITHOUT ASSISTANCE, and is readily nourished by the gentle exercise. Made in the best manner, with chair seat, &c. Easily adjusted to any locality, and quickly removed when not in use. Sent on receipt of price, or by express, C. O. D. Only $3 50. Rights for sale. Address
A. H. SEAVER,
P. O. BOX 6163, N. Y. City.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

HOLIDAY MUSIC.

I SYLVESTER SONGS, with PIANO ACCOMPANIMENTS, mailed free for 36 cents. Order as follows:

PEACE ON EARTH.
CHRISTMAS PALMS.
CHRIST HAS COME.
CHRISTMAS TREE.
MERRY CHRISTMAS TIMES.
MERRY BELLS.
JOLLY SANTA CLAUS IS HERE.

The above songs may be ordered through any Newsdealer. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
No. 1 Liberty Street,
Liberti Tenne to Sabbath Schools.
Enclose Stamp for full catalogue of Sheet Music.

A Useful Holiday Gift.
PRINCE'S IMPROVED PROTEAN

FOUNTAIN PEN

The Handle contains the Ink. Writes 12 hours with one filling. For sale at John C. Clark & Sons, 315 Broadway; Tiffany & Co., Union Square; Ball, Black & Co., 565 Broadway; Halleck, 19 & 21 St., Chesterfield, Send for Circular. Agents wanted. M'f'd only by John S. Purdy, 213 Broadway, N. Y. Price of Gold Pens and Holders.

CURTAINS.

Selling off for 30 days, to reduce stock previous to importing. Illustrated Price-List, and Certain Maxims of every description; also, Piano and Table Covers retailing at wholesale prices.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
447 Broadway, near Howard St.

New Holiday Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN ERASTUS HOLME, D. D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 48o, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LOUIS BEARE. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE, With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," "Adventure Land," "Wild Life Under the Equator," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By R. H. STODDARD, Illustrated. Square, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth $1 25.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

ALSO,

FRESH SUPPLIES READY

OF THE FOLLOWING

STANDARD HOLIDAY BOOKS.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

JACOB & JOHN S. C.ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES AND SERIES OF JUVENILE BOOKS, LYMAN ABBOTT'S JESUS OF NAZARETH and THE OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS.

GREENWOOD'S WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

BAKER'S CAST UP BY THE SEA. Illustrated. 18mo, Cloth, 60 cts.

WOOD'S HOMES WITHOUT HANDS. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50.

POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Half Calf, $8 00; Full Morocco, $10 00.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

For a full list of Books suitable for Holiday Presents, see HARPER'S CATALOGUE, which may be obtained gratuitously on application, or will be sent by mail on receipt of TEN CENTS.

TO THE LADIES

WHO DESIRE TO USE THE

BEST SIX-CORD

SPOOL COTTON,

FOR

Hand or Machine

SEWING,

BUY

CLARK'S O.N.T.,

and you will find it

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER.

BURNETT'S
(THE BEST)
Flavoring Extracts.

"Your superior Flavoring Extracts are strictly 'Standard,' uniform in quality, and give entire satisfaction to our customers.
PARK & TILFORD,
Fifth Street and Broadway.

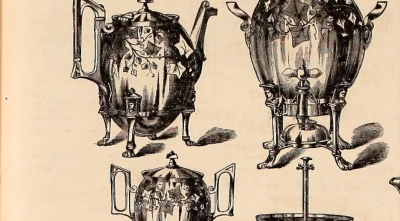
"Growing in favor."
ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT,
Corner Fulton and Nassau Streets.

2, 8, and 16 oz., Flat, and Quart sizes for sale by all first-class Grocers in the United States and Canada.
JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Sole Proprietors,
Boston, Mass.

Soldiers sending a Stamped Envelope with their full address to Box 3086, New York City, will receive in return valuable information.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

REED & BARTON,



Manufacturers of Fine Electro-Plated Ware,

World call attention to their New Design of TEA SERVICE (see Illustration), Patented March 1, 1870. It is manufactured of the finest quality of WHITE METAL, and heavily plated with PURE SILVER.

As will be noticed, they have introduced a new feature in the design of the pieces—the Slop-Bowl—which is a very useful and practical combination.

They also are manufacturers of the PATENT SEAMLESS-LINED ICE-PITCHER, and the PATENT TILTING STAND for Ice-Pitchers, and TABLE WARE of Every Description.

At the last Fair held in Boston by the Mechanics' Association, and at the three last Fairs held in New York by the American Institute, REED & BARTON received the highest prizes over all competitors. The Judges, in their official report, say: "The durability of REED & BARTON'S Ware has been so long known to the judges, they deem it their duty to give them the position of First among the Manufacturers of Silver-Plated Ware."

☞ These goods can be obtained of the principal dealers in Silver and Silver-Plated Ware throughout the country.

Factories Established at Taunton, Mass., in 1824. Salesroom, No. 2 Maiden Lane, New York.

POPULAR BOOKS.

THE WRITINGS OF THAT EMINENTLY PRACTICAL PHYSICIAN, DR. W. W. HALL. In uniform 12mo volumes: Half Roan, each $1.50.

(1.) HEALTH BY GOOD LIVING. (Fifteenth thousand.)

(2.) SLEEP: or, the Hygiene of the Night.

(3.) HEALTH AND DISEASE as affected by Constipation, and its Unmedicinal Cure.

(4.) COUGHS AND COLDS; or, the Prevention, Cause, and Cure of various Affections of the Throat.

(5.) BRONCHITIS AND KINDRED DISEASES.

N. B. The Publishers have also assumed the publication of HALL'S JOURNAL OF HEALTH, entirely original, every article being written by the Editor. Subscription price, $1.50 per annum. To Clergymen and Teachers, $1.25. Single copies, 15 cents.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN'S COMPLETE WRITINGS. Published by an arrangement with the author. In uniform Crown 8vo volumes.

(1.) THE IMPROVISATORE; or, Life in Italy. Translated by MARY HOWITT. $1.75.

(2.) THE TWO BARONESSES. A Danish Romance. $1.75.

(3.) IN SPAIN, AND A VISIT TO PORTUGAL. A Book of Travels. $1.75.

(4.) WONDER STORIES TOLD FOR CHILDREN. With 32 Illustrations. $2.25.

(5.) O. T. A Danish Romance. $1.75.

(7.) ONLY A FIDDLER. A Danish Romance. $1.75.

(9.) STORIES AND TALES. Illustrated. $2.25.

Any of the above sent free of expense on receipt of price.

HURD & HOUGHTON,
13 Astor Place, New York.

THE FOUNDLING,

A group of statuary by John Rogers, just completed; slip, COMING TO THE PARSON. Price, $15 each.

Parties desiring these or other groups, or wishing to send them as presents to their friends, can inclose the price, and they will be delivered at their residence, free of expense, with all the express charges prepaid; or they will be sent C.O.D. by freight, and a discount allowed in compensation.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to JOHN ROGERS, 23 Fifth Ave., New York.

WANTED.

BOOK CANVASSERS of both sexes are wanted in every Church and Congregation in the U.S and Provinces, to sell works especially adapted to the Holy Bible, Books for the Holidays, Life of Jesus of Nazareth, Books for the Sunday-School, Comfort for the Aged. Edited by John Stanford Holmes, D.D. Books of Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises. Sons of Nazareth. By Lyman Abbott. Old Testament Stories. By Lyman Abbott. Biography of Distinguished Women. By Mrs. S. J. Hale. And other books that would make a desirable addition to any library. Liberal Commissions given. Intelligent and energetic Agents can make the business very profitable. For further particulars inquire of or address AVERY HILL,
Cure of HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 Pearl St., New York.

FOGGANS'S IMITATION GOLD WATCHES, DIAMOND JEWELRY, SILVER WARE, CLOCKS, &c. Send for Circular. 189 BROADWAY, N. Y.

RENEW NOW—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1871, and either of Harper's, for 1871, sent 1 year for $2.50.
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

The Sun.

CHARLES A. DANA, Editor.

The Dollar Weekly Sun.

A Newspaper of the Present Times.

Intended for People Now on Earth.

Including Farmers, Mechanics, Merchants, Professional Men, Workers, Thinkers, and all Manner of Honest Folks, and the Wives, Sons, and Daughters of all such.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR!

ONE HUNDRED COPIES FOR $50,

Or less than One Cents Copy. Let there be a $50 Club at every Post Office.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY SUN, $2 A YEAR,

of the same size and general character as the THE WEEKLY, but with a greater variety of miscellaneous reading, and furnishing the news to its subscribers with greater promptness, because it comes out twice in the week instead of once only.

DAILY SUN, $6 A YEAR.

A profoundly readable newspaper, with the largest circulation in the world. Free, Independent, and Outspoken in politics. All the news from everywhere. Two cents a copy; by mail, 50 cents a month, or $6 a year.

For Terms to Clubs, and Specimens, address

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, Sun office, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circular containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 16 cents.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 80 Murray Street, New York.

ESTB. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1809.
SAPOLIO.
For General Household purposes
IS BETTER AND CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

ONE DIME will secure by return mail copies most attractive, and most popular young people's paper in the world full stories complete), worth three times the money. Splendid premium and agents' cash commissions to agents. Order at once.
JOHN B. ALDEN & CO., Publishers,
Chicago, Ill.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in HARPER'S BAZAR. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 40 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, the NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT..... No. 32
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT..... " 34
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.. " 36
SPANISH-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 38
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS..... " 39
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 40
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 44
TRAINED WALKING SUIT..... " 45
TRAINED BALL SUIT..... " 46
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 47
ZOUAVE-JACKET WALKING SUIT..... " 48
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT..... " 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 49
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT.. " 50

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and DUST MEASURE. The new Patterns out early each week to suit in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2.00. Five patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and also Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

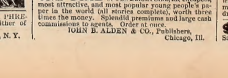
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

American Branch of House,
91 JOHN ST., New York.

JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.

HENRY OWEN, Sole Agent.

THE American HATTERS' CONFORMETERS, Patented and manufactured by SAMUEL CARR, 21 West Thirteenth Street. Used by the principal and best hatters in the city and country, and recognized by them as being very greatly superior to any other conformeters. They are the only article made that will make a hat fit. A boy can fit a hat with them, and consequently they are a great fit-producing business. The price is no consideration compared to their quality. Send for a Circular.



YOUNG FOLKS' BURIAL, largest and handsomest of young folks' paper. Greatest success! Best stories and pictures. Splendid Cash Pay to Agents or whole amount returned in watches, musical instruments, &c. $1.00 per year, sample free. Address H. N. F. LEWIS, Pub. Western Rural, Chicago.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY

GOOD Sauce,

and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome SAUCE that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and confidence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

IT FILLS WATER! Rich, Rare and Rural as Rain. Words upon Rubber-like, 40 Rich Colors. Agents Wanted. Sample, 25 cts. Circulars free. Address SPANGLED RUBBER CO., Nashua, N. H.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and CABINET ORGANS, of first-class makes, at Extreme by Low Prices, for Cash, during the Holidays, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For Circular, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$75 to $250 per month, every where, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED LOCK-STITCH FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully licensed and warranted for three years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

MONEY EASILY MADE.

With our Stencil and Key-Check Outfit.

CIRCULAR FREE.

$1500 A YEAR.

WANTED AGENTS to sell the Universal Stitch Sewing Machine. Price reduced, also 12 lb. long by 8 in height, of great capacity and durability, under no liability to get out of order. Price $15 00; sent C. O. D. Address Universal S. M. Co., 95 Broadway St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per Week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful invention. Address R. MAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

$777 A MONTH—Agents GIVEN AWAY—Every live man who will act as agent in a new, light, and honorable business paying $777 per month. No gift enterprise. No humbug. No money wanted in advance. Address B. MORGAN & CO., Kewanee, Ill.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 20 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for $1.25; 2 for $2; 3 for $3. Circular free. Address C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.....	One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY.....	One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR.....	One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

Postage is prepaid by the Publishers. HARPER'S PERIODICALS or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE Subscribers at $4 00 each, to one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

Subscriptions to any of the United States for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable in advance at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be drawn for $4 50 and 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. When no specific time is ordered, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number of January. When it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $150; Quarter Page, $75—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each Insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Inside Page, $1 00 per Line; Outside Page, $1 50 per Line—each Insertion.

No Extra Charge for Cuts or Extra Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

JOHN BULL AND THE RUSSIAN BEAR.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE, N. Y.,

DIAMOND MERCHANTS.

Extra large Single Stones. Fine Matched Stones. Diamond and Gem Jewelry—a larger stock than ever before offered.

DIAMONDS BOUGHT.

PATENT IMPROVED REFLECTORS, for ILLUMINATING CHURCHES, HALLS, THEATRES, SHOW WINDOWS.

Increase the Light fourfold.

Send for Circular.

PETRY BROS. & CO., 233 Pearl St., N. Y.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place.

THE FIRE EDITION OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published, and contains a beautiful Frontispiece, and numerous engravings of almost every desirable Flower and Vegetable. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, illustrated with Three Hundred fine Wood Engravings and Two beautiful

COLORED PLATES.

The most beautiful and the most instructive Floral Guide published. A German Edition is published, in all other respects similar to the English edition.

Sent free to all my customers of 1870, as rapidly as possible, without application. Sent to all others who order them for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

YOSEMITE! YOSEMITE!

The finest Stereoscopic Views of the wonderful Yosemite yet made will be published December 15, by E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 501 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan. Chromos and Frames, Albums and Stereoscopes, Graphoscopes, Megalethoscopes.

N. Robes de Chambre AND House Coats,

FOR

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.

E. A. NEWELL,

727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

BLEES'

Noiseless, Link-Motion, Lock-Stitch

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine; and, for agencies and circulars, apply at

623 BROADWAY, New York.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-List.

Address BUFFALO, N.Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S

PURE CALIFORNIA

BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations, and retaining fully the flavor, spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY G. SCHMIDT & CO., 26 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

WHY YEAST POWDER SHOULD BE USED.

Because it is much more convenient than brewers' or boy yeast, produces better and more nutritious food, and never fails of success. This is proved by the testimonials to Dooley's Yeast Powder, as each package only contains the real, genuine ingredients. The contents are perfectly free from any injurious substances. Nothing enters into its composition but articles that are healthy and nourishing, and the bread prepared with it is such as can be eaten with impunity by the most sensitive invalids. For sale by grocers every where.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS.

Amber, Repairing and Boiling.

Broad Street, 27 John St., middle of the block.

Send for Circular.

HORSE CLIPPING.—Adie's Patent Machine, price $7, for sale by JOHN MCCLURE, 94 Broadway. Agents wanted.

USED BY ALL

Professionals and Amateur Skaters.

FOR SALE BY

Hardware and Skate Dealers

EVERY WHERE.

Club, $5.
Rink, $8.
Plated, $12.

To avoid FRAUD see that the NAMES OF BARNEY & BERRY ARE STAMPED ON Every Foot Plate.

SIZES:

Ladies, 8, 8½, 9, 9½ inches.
Gentlemen, 10, 10½, 11, 11½ "

500 PAIRS SOLD IN 1865
1,500 " " " 1866
2,500 " " " 1867
5,000 " " " 1868
15,000 " " " 1869

Every Pair Warranted.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

NEW YORK.

THE

EXAMINER AND CHRONICLE,

Published every Thursday,

39 PARK ROW, NEW YORK,

BY

EDWARD BRIGHT & CO.,

IN THE Largest,

Cheapest,
Most National,
And, by Many Thousands,
The Most Widely Circulated
BAPTIST NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

$2 50, in advance, by mail. $3 by carriers.

Toys! Toys! Toys!

ALTHOF, BERGMANN, & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF

Toys and Fancy Goods,

30, 32, 34, 36 Park Place, Cor. Church St.,

OFFER FOR SALE

THEIR LARGE STOCK

AT RETAIL!

FOR ONE WEEK ONLY.

COMMENCING DECEMBER 19th.

THE IMPROVED

WILSON

SHUTTLE

SEWING MACHINE

for simplicity, durability & beauty stands unrivaled. For stitching, hemming, tucking, ruffling, quilting, braiding, binding and sewing on gathers, it is unequaled!

☞ AGENTS WANTED in every County in the United States where we have not one already employed. For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICONS

Of every description, and the largest collection of Slides in the United States. Send for a Catalogue.

W. MITCHELL McALLISTER,

10 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company elects to present to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,

294 Bowery, N. Y.

SAMPLE COPIES GRATIS

of THE LADY'S FRIEND and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST—the best Lady's Magazine and Weekly Paper going. Address Deacon & Peterson, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

SKATES sent C. O. D.

at above prices. Skaters' Materials of every description. PECK & SNYDER, 126 Nassau St., N. Y.; Agents for Barney & Berry.

Trade supplied at bottom prices.

Hatter and Furrier,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,

719 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.

LADIES' FINE FURS.

Seal Sacques, $75, $90, $100.

Astrakhan Sacques, $35, $45, $50.

IMPORTER OF

ENGLISH HATS FOR GENTLEMEN WEAR.

'SNAV EVANS'S

EVANS' Prices

FOR THE

'SNAV EVANS' Best-Made

Winter Clothing

IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS.

$10. $12. $15. $16. $18. $20. $22. $25. $27. $28. $30.

REEFING JACKETS.

$8.00. $10.00. $12.50. $15.00. $22.00.

WINTER SUITS.

$14.00. $16.50. $18. $21.00. $23.00. $26. $27. $30.

PANTS.

Fashionable Stripes, $6. $6.50. $7. $7.50. $8. $8.50. $9.

In Fancy Cassimere, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., in GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 ..... Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

New-Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

"SELF-CLOSING" DIARIES

—FOR—

1871.

Sold by all Booksellers.

Be Sure and Have One.

They are economical.

Trade supplied by HARD, WELL, CASTLE & CO., 53 Leonard St., N. Y., and 46 Cranny St., Boston.

F. J. KALTENBACH, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Amber, &c., at Wholesale and Retail. Repairing done in all its branches. Circular and Price-Lists sent. P. O. Box 4774. Store: 4 John St., near Broadway; 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Paris Exposition Prize of 1867.

1871.—THE NURSERY.—The famous Picture Book rival will maintain its reputation as the best and most RICHLY ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1 50 a Year. Sample Number, with other matter, 10 cents.

☞ SUBSCRIBE NOW, and get the last two numbers of 1870 free. Address

JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield St., Boston.

WANTED—AGENTS ($200 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch," alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

MEDIKONES. What are they? A new and remarkable discovery in Medicine. Sent by mail for 25 cents. Address Drs. WELLS & STELL, 37 West 31st St., N. Y. City.

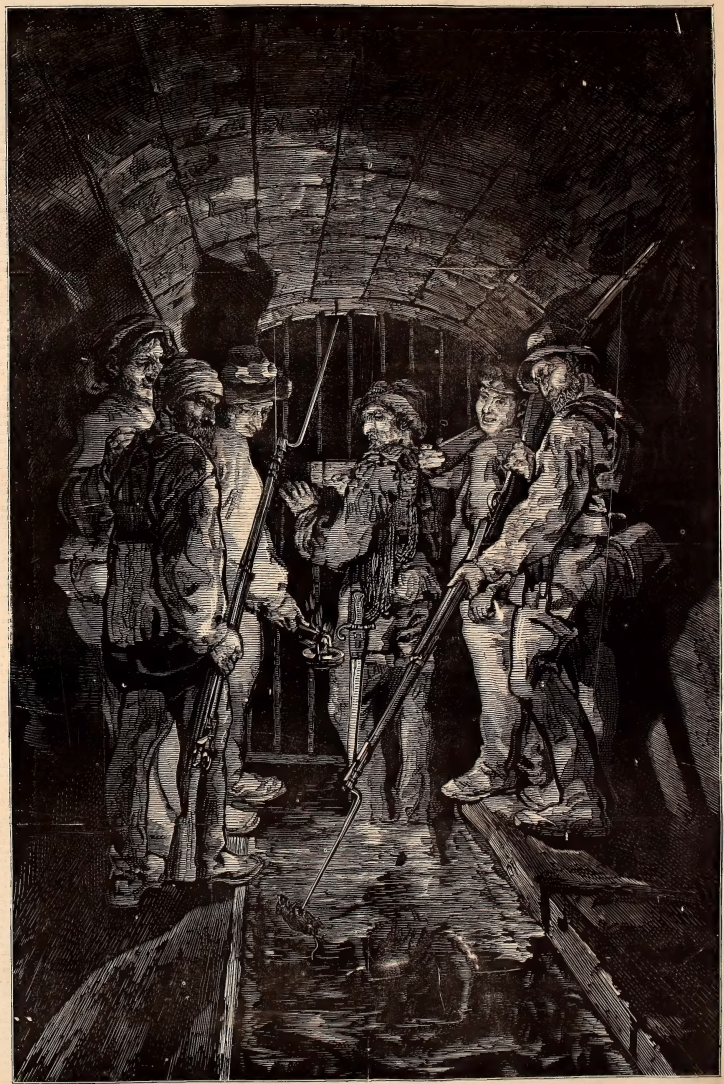
AND LAST A LIFETIME.

Ask any watchmaker for it. Sample sent by mail for 50 cts ☞ J. S. BIRCH & CO., 8 Malden Lane, N. Y.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

Contains in every number one complete novel, and many short stories by the best writers of other Magazines. Yearly, $1. Sold by News dealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address WOOD'S MAGAZINE, N. Y.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.



KEEPING WATCH UNDERGROUND—GUARDING THE OUTLET OF A PARIS SEWER.—[SEE PAGE 842.]

FRANCE—1870.

BEAUFORT. France! o'er the wide waste of waters
Swells the heart-breaking plaint of thy sons and thy daughters:
Beautiful France,
Fanned in sunny and romance,
How thy prestige departs
As war's leprous advance
Beautiful France! o'er thy many dominions
The Angel of Death flaps his shadowy pinions;
Lowly lead of the vine,
What enchantment was thine
Ere thy lustre was dimmed
By the hosts from the Rhine.

Valpybourn France! how thy beauty is marred!
With the gashes of war thy fair bosom is scarred;
Yet with eloquent woe,
In the dust sitting low,
Thou breathest defiance
And death to the foe.

Vain threats! as the bird in the fowler's deft snare,
Or the lion entrapped and attacked in his lair,
So the realm of thy foes
Bind the fast—and no fate
In the dream of heaven,
And the hopes which inflate.

The wail of thy peasants sounds like a dirge,
As the billows of war round their flaming homes surge;
And the babe at the breast
Is convulsively pressed,
As hunger's fell tooth
Gnaws the mother distressed.

And Paris, the bright incarnation of joy,
Invested with all that can charm or decoy,
Seat of pleasure and art,
Gilded luxury's mart,
Must thy splendor glow dim
And thy empire depart?

Now a belt, of destruction encircles thy wall,
And proud Paris must yield, or proud Paris must fall;
For Destiny wails
Not for mortals or states,
And Wilhim, the triumph
Shall enter her gates.

O France! bleeding France! what confusion and shame
Overwhelms thee to-day, and obscures thy fair fame;
With the suicide's knife
Thou hast struck at thy life,
And with murder duty
Prolongest the strife.

In the name of true Freedom we conjure thee, cease!
And to-day by bosom the Spirit of Peace;
Lift thy cuisse on high,
And with soul-thrilling cry
Shout, "Vive la Republique
Let tyranny die!"

WATCH UNDERGROUND.

THE striking and picturesque sketch on the first page of our Supplement this week illustrates a phase of the siege of Paris entirely peculiar to that city. It is well known to our readers that underneath Paris lies a vast system of immense sewers, having outlets on the banks of the Seine without the city walls. They are large enough, as the illustration shows, to allow several men to walk through them abreast; and, in fact, they were constructed partly for a military purpose, in case a rising in Paris should require that a means of security, these vast underground passages have suddenly become of great value to the beleaguered city: for should the Prussians once gain admission through the outlets, they might work their way from the very heart of the capital, and destroy it by the explosion of mines. To guard against this, the besiegers employed to keep the sewers in order have been formed, and the engineers of the Ministry of Public Works have taken the precaution to strengthen the interior both of the sewers and aqueducts, with barriers to prevent any intrusion; while they have blockaded up the shafts entering the catacombs and underground quarries, and walled up every gallery that might give the enemy easy access to the inside of the circle of defenses. In addition to these precautions they have strewn the ground outside the outlets with torpedoes, which explode when trodden upon; and mines of large extent, with powerful charges of gunpowder or other perilous material, have been constructed near them.

The illustration conveys a graphic idea of the dismal service demanded of these subterranean guards, and vividly suggests the weird character of the horrors that would accompany a hand-to-hand struggle in those cavernous depths. Fresh romances and artists, after the war, will find material for many a weird sketch in the underground life of these guards.

THE GIPSY OF MALAGA.

AN ADVENTURE IN ANDALUSIA.

"BY JOVE! what a beautiful girl! Look quick, Harper, before the vanishes like a beatific vision from our mortal gaze."

These were the words, uttered half in jest and half in earnest, which I rode from my saddle to my fellow-traveler, Charlie Alston, as, wayworn and weary, we rode up our horses, in the rich glow of an autumn sunset, at the door of a low house, which in Spain does duty for a posada, or inn. We had left Malaga, at noon of the same day, at 11 o'clock on the previous night, and after a forest ride by moonlight, the memory of whose enchanting loveliness no after dreams of beauty can blot out, we had taken what refreshment, in the way of grapes and light wine, the peasants could supply, and started afresh on what proved to be the hardest day's ride that even I, accustomed as I have been to the saddle from my nursery, ever remember to have taken. All day we rode under the scorching sun of Spain, sometimes over highways white and hot with dust, sometimes through leafy dells, where the fierce sunlight was broken by the shade of lofty trees, sometimes winding along the base of the lovely Sierra Nevada, and at every turn gazing upon some new landscape more surpassingly beautiful than the last.

During the latter half of the day, however, we had both been far too weary to make enjoyment possible, and my friend Charlie, who was at all times fonder of animated nature, especially when manifested in the female form divine, than of the loveliest landscape that ever enchanted by its masterful sight, was becoming very impatient at what he called the "monotony" of our journey, and especially exasperated that none of the far-famed beauties of Andalusia had thus far crossed our path. We had been riding for more than an hour, with not a sound to break the stillness of the air save the occasional tinkling of a goat's bell's bell, when Charlie's exclamation roused me from the state of torpor into which I had fallen, and I glanced quickly in the direction of my somnolence in the direction indicated by his eye. Before me stood the "posada"—a low, wooden building, the roof rising somewhat in the middle and sloping gradually off to either side. At the door stood a group of three persons—two ugly peasants, with our greasy, swarthy host at their head; and escaping by what seemed to be a back entrance, and leaving rapidly down a sidepath, was as splendid a specimen of womanhood as my eyes had ever lighted upon. She was tall and slight, and her form less fully developed than is common among Spanish girls of her age; but it had the fairness, and the easy, free, graceful spring, of the young antelope. She wore the picturesque costume of the Andalusian peasantry, and as we rode up she turned her head to look at us, thus enabling me to see the delicate oval of the face, the large dark eyes, the scarlet, pouting mouth, and, rarest of all combinations in a Southern clime, the golden hair which in rich coils floated like a halo of glory round her small, well-set head. Altogether it was, as Charlie said, almost like a heavenly vision that appeared to our sight, and for a moment I shared his apprehension that she would vanish as suddenly and as mysteriously as she had appeared. Being, however, an old traveler, and of an eminently practical turn of mind, I checked my own emotion and Charlie's burst of enthusiasm, and requested him in a few slang words to "keep his peace; I lit my cuisjo on high, and with soul-thrilling cry shout, 'Vive la Republique let tyranny die!'"

WATCH UNDERGROUND.

THE striking and picturesque sketch on the first page of our Supplement this week illustrates a phase of the siege of Paris entirely peculiar to that city. It is well known to our readers that underneath Paris lies a vast system of immense sewers, having outlets on the banks of the Seine without the city walls. They are large enough, as the illustration shows, to allow several men to walk through them abreast; and, in fact, they were constructed partly for a military purpose, in case a rising in Paris should require that a means of security, these vast underground passages have suddenly become of great value to the beleaguered city: for should the Prussians once gain admission through the outlets, they might work their way from the very heart of the capital, and destroy it by the explosion of mines. To guard against this, the laborers employed to keep the sewers in order have been formed, and the engineers of the Ministry of Public Works have taken the precaution to strengthen the interior both of the sewers and aqueducts, with barriers to prevent any intrusion; while they have blockaded up the shafts entering the catacombs and underground quarries, and walled up every gallery that might give the enemy easy access to the inside of the circle of defenses. In addition to these precautions they have strewn the ground outside the outlets with torpedoes, which explode when trodden upon; and mines of large extent, with powerful charges of gunpowder or other perilous material, have been constructed near them.

The illustration conveys a graphic idea of the dismal service demanded of these subterranean guards, and vividly suggests the weird character of the horrors that would accompany a hand-to-hand struggle in those cavernous depths. Fresh romancers and artists, after the war, will find material for many a weird sketch in the underground life of these guards.

THE GIPSY OF MALAGA.

AN ADVENTURE IN ANDALUSIA.

"BY JOVE! what a beautiful girl! Look quick, Harper, before the vanishes like a beatific vision from our mortal gaze."

These were the words, uttered half in jest and half in earnest, which I rode from my saddle to my fellow-traveler, Charlie Alston, as, wayworn and weary, we rode up our horses, in the rich glow of an autumn sunset, at the door of a low house, which in Spain does duty for a posada, or inn. We had left Malaga, at noon of the same day, at 11 o'clock on the previous night, and after a forest ride by moonlight, the memory of whose enchanting loveliness no after dreams of beauty can blot out, we had taken what refreshment, in the way of grapes and light wine, the peasants could supply, and started afresh on what proved to be the hardest day's ride that even I, accustomed as I have been to the saddle from my nursery, ever remember to have taken. All day we rode under the scorching sun of Spain, sometimes over highways white and hot with dust, sometimes through leafy dells, where the fierce sunlight was broken by the shade of lofty trees, sometimes winding along the base of the lovely Sierra Nevada, and at every turn gazing upon some new landscape more surpassingly beautiful than the last.

During the latter half of the day, however, we had both been far too weary to make enjoyment possible, and my friend Charlie, who was at all times fonder of animated nature, especially when manifested in the female form divine, than of the loveliest landscape that ever enchanted by its masterful sight, was becoming very impatient at what he called the "monotony" of our journey, and especially exasperated that none of the far-famed beauties of Andalusia had thus far crossed our path. We had been riding for more than an hour, with not a sound to break the stillness of the air save the occasional tinkling of a goat's bell's bell, when Charlie's exclamation roused me from the state of torpor into which I had fallen, and I glanced quickly in the direction of my somnolence in the direction indicated by his eye. Before me stood the "posada"—a low, wooden building, the roof rising somewhat in the middle and sloping gradually off to either side. At the door stood a group of three persons—two ugly peasants, with our greasy, swarthy host at their head; and escaping by what seemed to be a back entrance, and leaving rapidly down a sidepath, was as splendid a specimen of womanhood as my eyes had ever lighted upon. She was tall and slight, and her form less fully developed than is common among Spanish girls of her age; but it had the fairness, and the easy, free, graceful spring, of the young antelope. She wore the picturesque costume of the Andalusian peasantry, and as we rode up she turned her head to look at us, thus enabling me to see the delicate oval of the face, the large dark eyes, the scarlet, pouting mouth, and, rarest of all combinations in a Southern clime, the golden hair which in rich coils floated like a halo of glory round her small, well-set head. Altogether it was, as Charlie said, almost like a heavenly vision that appeared to our sight, and for a moment I shared his apprehension that she would vanish as suddenly and as mysteriously as she had appeared. Being, however, an old traveler, and of an eminently practical turn of mind, I checked my own emotion and Charlie's burst of enthusiasm, and requested him in a few slang words to "keep Peace; I lit my cuisjo on high, and with soul-thrilling cry shout, 'Vive la Republique let tyranny die!'"

By this time we had dismounted and entered the inn, where, in our rough traveling garb, we plainly did diggers at our belts, we might easily have been mistaken for the robbers that we were stood upon. The building had, from the appearance of a Spanish posada, consisting of a long, dark apartment, out end of which served as a kitchen and dining-room for the host and guests, and the other being partitioned into roughly made cells, in which the host and his literally entertainment for man and beast under the same roof. It was a dismally rough and comfortless-looking place, and would probably, consisting of a mingled compound of garlic, stable, and smoke-permeated air. Instead of this, we were greeted at this season, and, besides, our horses could be cared for. You'll get used to the perfume in a little while."

"Perhaps so," replied Charlie, with a shrug of his shoulders unmistakable, "but I can't see through Spain again I'll have my olfactories partially destroyed for life."

"And have your head made bullet-proof at the same time," I rejoined, "which is rather the more pressing need of the two." Seeing that Charlie and listen to every word you hear spoken in a foreign country to understand, I've been in Spain before, and I don't at all like the look of this place or its occupants."

As I spoke we glanced ourselves close to the fire, which was throwing out any quantity of heat, but little, but, as far as I could see, was capable of warming nothing but itself.

The night was, however, closing in damp and chilly, and as common sense dictated, both Charlie and myself were glad of the protection that the humble roof afforded.

To add to our complexity, the beautiful vision that had delighted our eyes in the open air proved in and out every way possible to be both for supper, and engaged in a variety of sufficiently mendacious occupations to convince us that the hotel-keeper's daughter she was not. It was difficult to form any opinion as to the relation in which she stood to the wretches by surrounded her, as she scarcely spoke or raised her eyes in reply to remarks that they made to her, and took no more notice of their coarse oaths and impressions than she did of my friend Alston's insinuating efforts to attract her attention. As she was the only female in the house about the place, however, I concluded that she was paid for her services, and would only remain while treated with consideration and respect. I was decided in my own mind that she probably belonged to some gipsy tribe, as her rich dark blood in her veins—perhaps English or Scotch—but from whatever source it came, it was manifested as it was with an Oriental richness of complexion, and eyes that had the darkness and softness of the gazelle.

She seemed to have some unexplained purpose in delaying as long as possible her arrangements for supper, which called forth more than one impatient "Caramba" from the ruffians who called themselves our hosts. There were three men besides himself in the posada, every one of whom, I was ready to swear, had committed more than one, mess and of blood. I watched them as I sat with half-closed eyes beside the fire, and made up my mind that, if ever there was a moment in a peril of their lives, we were that night. Then I necked my brain to recall the last sign of human habitation that I had seen that day; and after satisfying myself that it was too far off to be of any use to us, I began to calculate our chances of resistance should an attack be made. We were well armed, and three to four, supposing that our guide would help us; but a glance into a distant corner of the wide department, where he lay sleeping, or feigning sleep, convinced me that no assistance could be counted upon from that quarter. Well, the situation was not a cheerful one, certainly; but Charlie and I had youth and strength and British pluck to back it lugged up the belief, that had been instilled into me from my childhood, that those qualities were more than a match for foreign perfidy and cunning.

So, after a few words to Charlie (whose whole soul seemed to be absorbed in the movements of the gipsy girl), cautioning him against any drink that might be offered to us, to feinde to be drugged. I possessed my soul with patience, and again turned myself to the fire. I remained in this attitude for nearly two hours, when I opened my eyes it was to see the Andalusian maiden place before me and the table at which the rest of the company were seated, and to hear "Bravo! bravo! very good!" pronounced aloud in Spanish, and "Sleep not an instant under this roof," from the same lips in fairly good English, but in a voice, though tone, inaudible to all but myself. Between sleeping and waking as I was, I shall never forget how like a heavenly visitant she looked, as there stood in that low den, with the light from behind illuminating her golden-crowned head, and making her scarlet lips engrossing silence. It was but for a second, but I understood the danger and the warning so well that it had been written in letters of fire on the wall; and calming by a mighty effort, my desire to leap to my feet at once, and glance of responsive gratitude to the girl, I rose and seated myself at the filthy, uninviting board. There was little to eat besides the usual provision at a Spanish inn, "olio," which I verily believe was the principal article under the numerous uses of the manufacture of unguby boys, of "sticks and snails and puppy-dogs' tails," so indescribably revolting was it to the English palate; but we and both Charlie and myself were firm in our refusal of the sour wine which was the only beverage upon us, our host soon rose from the table, and, with a movement of his thumb, indicated the place where beds would conduce to our sleeping room above.

"We are to start again an hour before daylight, and Charlie would, I think, have much preferred passing the night in the kitchen, with the chance of getting an occasional glimpse of the fair Andalusian, but, knowing the danger in which we stood, I was quite firm in my determination to see what could be done in the way of barricading and barricading the apartment appropriated to us above. To this end, as soon as the host turned on his part, I placed Charlie before me on our upward march, and after nearly breaking my neck and his with his frantic efforts to overtake, at last took at his isomnata, I finally succeeded in getting him to the top of the ladder without his him bounding, like a shot out of a shell, into the very middle of the room.

Then closing the door, and perceiving, as I quite expected, that it had neither lock nor bolt, I proceeded to construct our position. The room was large, and not very low, with the naked rafters above, and the roof sloping down on either side. One window was directly opposite the door, in front of which stood two low beds, and a very large and heavy piece of furniture, half secretary, half bureau, in the right-hand side.

"What the deuce has come over you, Sidney?" I knew the latter name that Alston uttered after he had recovered from his surprise at being so unceremoniously propelled into the room. "Are you going to travel with the Zingaro, or to steal those devils down stairs to single combat? I perceive the gallant determination in your eye, as we used to say at Balicl. What's the matter, old fellow?"

"Nothing but that we are going to be murdered to-night, and that those 'devils down stairs' are preparing to do it this moment to do it, so

"Whetting their knives, eh, Sidney? and sharpening their axes to chop us up with? Well, I don't make pretty good kindling-wood, old fellow—your bones must be dry enough by this time, if they were of any use to anybody."

A brandy-flask stood at his head gut an end to further chaffing, and we sat down gravely on one of the beds to consult upon the morning's work on the Zingara's morning, and to form our plans for the night. After some discussion we decided, as we were both pretty worn out with fatigue, to watch by turns an hour at a time, each one waking the other when the expiration of the hour came. As Charlie was younger than myself, and less used to roughing it, I insisted upon giving him the first watch, and looking at my watch, as he threw himself on the bed, perceived that it wanted a few minutes of ten o'clock. Previously to this, however, we had by the exertion of our united strength succeeded in moving the ponderous bureau in front of the door, where, by tolerably blocking up the entrance, it seemed to me that we could successfully resist the attack of any very few seconds sufficed to throw Charlie into an audible slumber, and then silence the most trifling sound above or below on the house.

I walked to the window and looked out upon the range of picturesque hills, now flooded with the moon's pale beams, and then calculated with my eye the distance of the window from the ground, and the possibility of "a leap in the dark," in case we were attacked from the other side.

Having satisfied myself that "the leap" would be certain death, I turned back into the room, and began to examine the strength and position of my barricade. This occupied but a very short time, however, as I felt perfectly convinced from its size and weight that no human being could move it from the outside. Then I sat down upon the side of the bed to await in silence and solitude the termination of my dismal watch.

Charlie's blue eyes were wide open as soon as I lost my hand upon his shoulder to announce that his hour of rest was ended, and, starting up as fresh as if he had slept ten hours instead of one, he turned a deaf ear to my whispered entreaty that he would lie down again with me, and pushed me down with gentle violence upon the bed.

For the first fifteen minutes I lay wide awake, watching Charlie as he looked carefully to the priming of his pistols and placed them fully cocked by his side. Then my eyes closed, and for half an hour I was dead to all sense or knowledge, and at a gesture from Charlie, who was still sitting where I had last seen him on the side of the bed, I started from the couch where I lay, resolutely and angrily at the intruder who had thus presumptuously disturbed my slumbers, but sternly and angrily it was advancing into the room, I glanced toward the top, and could distinctly see that, whereas we had placed it with its back close against the door, so that not a beam of light could have been admitted between, there was now an open space there of more than a foot wide, and as I looked at Charlie, and his honest blue eyes returned the gaze; both felt that an hour of mortal peril was at hand, and as we grasped our pistols and stood side by side ready for the first shot, I think a prayer for mercy and forgiveness went up from both our souls.

Our movements up to this point had been as unable to hinder as they were unheard, as there was probably very little doubt in their minds that we were wrapped in the deep and motionless slumber which overcomes fatigue especially. At the entry, with eyes almost starting from our heads, we watched the slow and cautious raising of the huge secretary, and preparing for an attack at any moment, when a low note, which might have been uttered by bird or beast, struck the ear of both at the same time.

Motionless as we were, we did not relax his vigilance, I turned toward the window, and, glancing out, perceived a ladder resting against the sill, the upper end of which I could see was held in the hands of the gipsy girl below. Without an instant's delay I turned the pistol from Charlie's hand, and motioned him to descend. He hesitated a moment, as both to leave me alone, but I was so peremptory in my entreaty that "Quick!" and there would be time for both," that he clutched the ladder with one hand, swung himself lightly into the air, and disappeared from sight as the body of a man, crawling on his hands and knees, became visible from behind the shelter of the bureau.

As soon as the villain saw that I was up and that my self was alone, he rose to his feet and uttered a hoarse cry for help. At the same moment I summed my pistol and fired it point blank; and in the confusion and obscurity that ensued from the rush of others into the room, and from the smoke of another pistol that followed immediately, I seized the end of the ladder and was in terra firma and flying down the narrow revine between Charlie and the gipsy, before the inmates of the posada were aware of my escape.

The girl was as swift-footed as a deer, and sped rapidly on before us, until we plunged into a dense wood on the opposite side, when she and whose friendly shades we knew that we were safe.

Then the girl opened her lips and told us that she had heard of the plot to murder the "two young English cavaliers" from "Pedro" that our guide was one of the gang of ruffians, and was paid for his services, and promised, instead of to the one a few leagues further on, where respectable travelers always stopped, and to which she was going to meet. Then placing the piece of furniture as barricade against the door had been a preconcerted signal provided for by loosening the panels of the door, which had been removed so noiselessly that even Charlie, wide awake as he was at the time, had never heard it; and then, when the secretary had been pushed sufficiently back, the ruffians hoped to crawl in on their hands and knees, and murder us in our sleep.

"And I could not come sooner to your rescue, Señors," continued she, "because I was suspected and so closely watched; but the instant I saw them all at the top of the ladder which led to your room I rushed round to the window by the only means of access to it. And you are safe, the Virgin Mary and all the blessed saints be praised! Marichita has done one good action more at all events, and may she go to heaven with a glance more mournfully penitent than that of Santa Maria Magdalena."

We had been walking now for nearly two hours, and the purple light of morning began to tinge the tops of distant hills. Then the beams were suffused with a rich crimson hue, which shot upward in brilliant rays to the very zenith, and deepened in fire and intensity as it touched the horizon.

"We must here, Señors," said Marichita, as she stood in the pomp and glory of the sunrise, her delicate features shaded out in clear relief against the eastern sky, and the masses of her golden hair shining and shimmering in the sun's first rays. "Yonder is the inn where you will find fresh horses and a more trusty guide. May the Virgin and all the holy saints protect you."

"Stay, Marichita," cried Charlie, springing forward and seizing her by the hand; "you shall not go back into that den of thieves. Go with us to Granada. Let us, at least, leave you in safety there; and if the devotee of my life will move my gratitude for this night's service, Marichita, I offer it to you now."

He was about to lay his hand and all his worldly possessions at her feet; but she drew herself up, and waved him gently back.

"Senior, it can not be," she said. "Marichita thanks you for your noble offer, but she would be out of place in your far-off England with one little souvenir is all she asks;" and then, placing her hand upon Charlie's shoulder, she motioned him to kneel before her, and, taking a small dagger from her girdle, she severed one of the short, fair curls that lay on Charlie's head. Thrusting it hastily into her bosom, she turned, and, with an "Adios, Señors," disappeared in the mazes of the forest.

We never saw her again; but we heard at Granada that Marichita, "the pride of the village," as she was called, was well known for her deeds of love and mercy in all the country round. Of her origin or early life we could learn nothing, and the Spaniards shrugged their shoulders when we asked where she was, and would hope to see her again. She was of Zingara blood, they said, though she was seldom with her tribe; and no one knew whether for her life's sake, or occasionally she was heard of in connection with some brave and kindly action.

It took my friend Charlie a long time to recover his tone and spirits after this little adventure, and I am inclined to think the sympathy of the fair Andalusian was deeper than seemed at the time possible to any more philanthropic mind. At any rate, he has never married, and when I ask him when he means to choose a mistress for his ancestral halls, his answer is,

"When I can find another Marichita, amigo mio; not before."

RIDERLESS HORSES.

THE illustration on page 845 (Supplement) represents an incident remarked after one of the fierce battles near Metz, where many of the Prussian cavalry lost their chiefs. When the regimental master-call was sounded by the trumpets of the 1st Regiment of Dragoons of the Royal Guard six hundred riderless horses came in answer to the summons. They were jaded, and in many cases maimed; but they had wounded about in affright till they heard the familiar sound, which their disciplined habits made them obey. The late Lieutenant-Colonel Fassmann upon this subject remarked: "Only those who have seen a battle-field can form a notion of the extraordinary way in which the horses, as long as they have a leg to crawl on, will follow the regiment to which they belong. I saw them evidently hear when sergeants' horses keeping their position in rear of their squadron, wounded or unhit, and halting exactly as if their riders were on their backs, and all the time streaming with blood. For economical they are indeed to be prized, for they have neither Vatertand, promotion, nor the coveted medal to hope for, whatever they have done; and few, indeed, are there which have been in action which have not some honorable scars to show."

DOWN A WELL.

In a little village near Bazeilles, before the fall of Sedan and the occupation of the surrounding country by the Prussians, a party of Zouaves caught sight of a young officer of hussars, who had evidently come upon a flying reconnoissance in advance of his party. They instantly gave chase. One hussar dashed away; but one of three light-armed French soldiers rapidly ascended a piece of rising ground, and were able to bring down his horse with the deadly rifle-balls of the Chassepot. The hussar was presently made prisoner; and as he spoke French, and complimented the captors in a speech on their skill and celerity, the Zouaves at once became very friendly, and began to exercise their ingenuity to amuse while they searched him. The only things they found in his pockets were a Dutch pipe, an empty tobacco-pouch, an old knife, and a torn letter. Of course, none of the French have a word of German, and are only less likely to decipher a word in the German handwriting; but, thinking it might contain something worth knowing, they forced their prisoner to translate it for them, first making him go down upon his knees and swear on his honor to give them a faithful translation. He explained that the letter was from a brother officer in one of the new regiments which had not yet been engaged, and that the part torn off had been for his pipe. He then read what remained:

"The regiments of our nation are on the way, but we find them very slow. This is altogether a very lazy business. It began with a hoger of the French for our lovely Rhine—"

Some executions burst from the amateurs, and the prisoner stopped; but was instantly ordered to go on.

"And this is really not surprising, because they once possessed it, and know what a beautiful country it is. But we all swore—do we not, my dear Ernst?—that never again shall French Pruche hop on the banks of that lovely river."

The prisoner was here interrupted by a demand to be informed if the word Pruche was of an insulting character; but, being assured that it was merely a philological term in natural history, he was allowed to proceed.

"The French are woefully off as to their generals. Only see how they send cavalry to attack our infantry and artillery in a wood! And this repeatedly. Then they are continually surprised: one of the greatest faults, you know. Our officers never are surprised. M. Mahen is a valiant fellow —not a first-rate general, but a good and honorable man—notwithstanding the out-and-out (gaschich) thrashing we gave him. Besides that, we were always able to outwit (überlisten) him by Von Moltke's art. Bazaine seems a very good and trusty-worthy person to deal with—but then he is far more German than French."

More executions.

"Ah, the chief commander in Paris, what do you think of—"

The unfortunate hussar paused; but he was ordered to go on, and reminded, at the point of the bayonet, of his oath.

"Who is the chief commander in Paris, what do you think of—"

The hussar explained that it was only a pun—a mere anlenkoser—un jeu des mots—not to be translated. Here one of the Zouaves savagely insisted upon looking at that part of the letter; and then it was found that the Prussian correspondent had written this pun in French.

"What do you think of old Trop-cher?"

Their great commander-in-chief was being thus designated as too much of old cabbage!

Some of the Zouaves were already beginning or shooting their prisoner upon the spot. In vain the hussar endeavored to make them see he had been written but a harmless pun upon that offensive jest. It was a letter written to and not by him. The stronger minded of them would not enter into any of these fine distinctions, and he should therefore be shot as a spy.

The sergeant, after a protracted verdict would have led to the speedy execution of the luckless hussar, but that one of the soldiers suddenly called their attention, in a humorous way, to the fact that it was a promising pun for a Prussian; and this both gave the hussar a chance of prolonging nation deserved some favor; that the offense was only committed by their prisoner at second hand, because he had found and not written the letter. This interposition was received with great laughter, and the prisoner saved the bullet or the bayonet was commuted by a proposal to lower the hussar into a well.

This well, as they knew, was at the present moment nearly empty. But rain was beginning to fall, and after two well-grown men had come full even to the top. So down this well they lowered—with many taunts and jokes, not unmingled with a few grim yet not quite unlikely pleasantries—our luckless hussar, whose only error consisted in having

DIVIDING THE SPOILS OF A CAPTURED BALLOON POST.

THE SPOILS OF A BALLOON.

BELEAGUERED Paris communicates with the outside world chiefly by means of the balloon post and carrier pigeons. The latter, in spite of Count BISMARCK's trained hawks, have thus far made their passages in safety; but two of the balloons have come down inside the Prussian lines, and been captured, giving the enemy the first reading of Parisian newspapers and the letters of war correspondents. Such an incident befell a balloon a few weeks ago, and the bundles of newspapers were eagerly divided among the officers and soldiers, as depicted in the sketch on this page. We have seen it stated that the private letters thus captured were consigned to the flames, after being examined by an officer, to ascertain whether they contained military or political news of any importance to the besieged.

A JOLLY PARTY OF GERMAN RECRUITS GOING TO THE FRONT.—[SEE PAGE 843.]

RIDERLESS HORSES ANSWERING THE BUGLE-CALL THE MORNING AFTER A BATTLE.—[SEE PAGE 848.]

THREE GHOSTS.

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

I.

I HAVE never seen a ghost, although I have always entertained a great respect for them, and a strong desire to cultivate their personal acquaintance; indeed, I may say I have courted it, though hitherto without any signal success. Yet from the time when, as a child, I listened open-mouthed to the superstitious revelations of my nurse, or, as a girl, watched by night in anxious expectation of the reappearance of compassionate Ann Boleyn, I have been the most unpopular person in their presence, and refuse to credit me with any faith in my own assertion; while others, too thick-headed to penetrate even the finer sympathies of this life, affirm stoutly that a woman of sense should be above giving way to such weakness, and that it is perfectly incredible that any one should really believe such utter nonsense.

How can I refute such conclusive arguments? That I firmly believe the inhabitants of another world are permitted to revisit this I will not say, because I have never had cooler proof of such a circumstance; but at the same time I have received such unanswerable testimony of the fact from the lips of others—trust-worthy, sensible, and nearly connected with myself—that I owe to them the possibility of such visitations were at once to throw the onus probandi upon those who doubt or liars. And therefore I maintain the middle course, by believing that the spiritual is far nearer to the material than most of us are aware of, and that there are more things in this world than are dreamed in our philosophy.

Numerous anecdotes rise up in my memory as I make this assertion; but my space is limited, and I choose but three—three strictly true and well authenticated.

At the time of Anne, while I preserve all details and coincidences in which the mystery of these stories consists, I carefully hide the names of persons who have by negligence or worse of this aspect I should wound the feelings of survivors. And as to dates, it is sufficient to say that they are no time-worn fables, handed down from one ear to another, but circumstances which happened in this our nineteenth century—in the midst of the present generation, and in the very midst of the rapid march of civilization and enlightenment which, in most cases, scatters such superstition to the winds.

Let me begin with that which occurred under my own knowledge.

Years ago, a regiment with the numbers of which I was innately connected was ordered upon foreign service—upon a service of danger—and the women were left behind. I, as the wife of one of the officers of war against their meeting again, can fully realize. Among those left was I, although, who were thus separated, was a certain Captain Gilbert and his wife. They had not been married long, and she was expecting her first confinement; in consequence of which he had been anxious that she should join her own friends or his during the period of their separation. But she was determined to remain where she was, or rather where I was; for we were just about to move, and she had decided to follow us to our new home. She had taken a house to be near me in her time of trial, and nothing would dissuade her from the idea.

The regiment sailed; and shortly afterward we left our old place of residence, and Mrs. Gilbert went with us into established quarters in a little cottage close to our house. At first all went well. She was young and full of hope; the accounts from the seat of war were good; Captain Gilbert continued in excellent health; and she had a fresh prospect of happiness before her.

So that after a few weeks she recovered her health and spirits, became interested in my household, and never mentioned the future except in terms of hope and confidence. Indeed, I was nervous on her own account, nor given in any degree to timid fears; but went about like other people, enjoying society in a quiet way, and without the least doubt but that her husband would be returned to us sure to her.

The disturbed state of the seat of war prevented her receiving letters quite so regularly as she should have done, but they continued to arrive bringing news when they did come, which those from our own correspondents corroborated. It was April when the regiment sailed; and there was nothing occurred to disturb the equanimity of Mrs. Gilbert.

On the 27th of that month, however, I was walked very early in the morning by the announcement that a messenger had arrived from her with a note for me. The note was scribbled in pencil, and very brief; it only contained the words, "Pray come.

I hurried on my things, fearing she was ill, and ran, through the early dawn (it was not more than four o'clock), to her little cottage. When I reached there I found her still in bed, but sitting up and staring at the opposite wall with a strange mixture of fear and incomprehensibility upon her face.

"Adelaide," I exclaimed, "what is the matter? are you ill?"

"George has been here," she answered, in a voice as strange as her look; "he has been sitting in that chair all night;" pointing to one by her bedside.

Of course I disbelieved her—we generally do disbelieve any thing which we can not understand. I thought that she had been dreaming, or was feverish—any thing but that she spoke the words of truth and soberness; and I told her so.

"What nonsense, Adelaide! You must have fancied it. Don't you feel well? Are you in any pain?"

Mrs. Gilbert was impatient of my incredulity.

"I tell you that George sat in that chair by my bedside all night," she repeated, "and that I lay here and watched him. He had his uniform on, but I could not tell his face, because he kept it hidden in his hands. At first I thought it was you, and that you had sat down and sat in the chair myself, and threw my clothes on it; but directly I lay down again I saw him as distinctly as I do you, and I knew something has happened to him—that he is dead."

I sat down by her side, and took her hand, and tried to reason with her, but it was of no use; she was quite certain that she was correct.

"See! I have written it down in my pocket-book," she said; and she drew the book in question from under her pillow and showed me the entry—"George sat by my bedside all last night," written opposite the date of the 27th of July.

I show it to you," she added, "so that you may not think by-and-by that it was not entered at the time.

I reminded her how certain the letters from the regiment were to contain full information of a speedy return, and how well Captain Gilbert had kept his health; but it was of no use. She would point out that in her confused hurry during last it might have a bad effect upon her delicate situation, I proposed to remain with her during the following night.

We were to sleep together; but as to getting rest, As soon as the lights were extinguished and I had composed myself, I was roused by her assertion that her husband was standing, and was sitting in the same chair as he had done on the night before. I sat up in the bed, but I could see nothing; the moon was shining, streaming on his coat. George! George! Oh, if he would but turn his face round and look at me!"

I jumped out of bed, and, half liking my proximity to the supposed apparition; but still afraid of leaving her my friend's condition had some way affected her head.

"You will laugh at this," she said, "as Captain Gilbert; I shall, undoubtedly; and yet, as I lay awake all night holding her hand, it was terrible every now and then to imagine that the person if she were more comfortable, to hear her pathetically sigh, 'Oh no! he is still there; he is looking at me! he is dead!' But it is would only turn his head this way!"

The following day was spent in all that the doctor was called in, and he decided that she must not pass any more nights alone, but have a nurse at once to attend and look after her; and by the next evening a jolly round-faced Englishwoman, who looked as if her very eyes were sufficient of themselves to scare away all thoughts of any thing "uncanny," was ready to walk a vigil with me. But she was not called that night. I sat up by Mrs. Gilbert's side, while she lay quiet as before, and said her eyes were fixed upon the figure of her husband.

The nurse, notwithstanding her jolly appearance, did not remain with Mrs. Gilbert more than I did. She pooh-poohed the idea before her mistress, as in duty bound; but confided to me privately her belief that "the poor young creature would never lie down in his own bed again"; for which I severely rated her for her pains.

I went home during the daytime, but returned at the fourth night to the assistance of my friend. But, so far as I or the late fussy nurse knew, it was not needed. Mrs. Gilbert did not see her husband again; and after a few hours' watching fell off peacefully to sleep.

"And she won't never see him again neither! Mark my words," emphatically quoth the nurse. "Whatever it is, there three days have finished it, and it's all over."

And, without believing in an approaching disaster, I hoped that her words might come true.

But after four days, although Mrs. Gilbert seldom mentioned the circumstance I have related, it had never altered; and I, being left alone, had her spirits seemed to have evaporated, and she lapsed into a melancholy quite unlike her former cheerfulness. Then, gradually the news ceased, continued to be hopeful and even gay; but she appeared to have lost all anticipation for the future. She even left off making any preparations for the little creature whose advent was now expected very shortly, and she never spoke of either her husband or her child. All her friends attributed her depression to weakened health; and those most interested were looking forward to the coming event as the grand cure for all her ills. In this way we lapsed into September, and with the first week of that month arrived a letter from her husband to me—a circumstance which had never occurred before, and rather surprised us.

Captain Gilbert wrote hurriedly, on the eve of his departure for a few days' leave, and inclosed a letter for his wife.

"If Adelaide should be well over her confinement," he said, "give her the inclosed; but if the event has not yet occurred, keep it until she is recovered again. And then he went on to speak of indifferent subjects.

This letter (which had been written at the beginning of July, but, owing to the disturbed state of the postal communication, had been delayed on its road) appeared the more inexplicable to us when we found that Mrs. Gilbert had heard by the same mail, and nothing could have seemed brighter than the prospects of her husband. However, we could see no clue to his mystic; and the mysterious inclosure was, therefore, laid by until the proper time for its delivery arrived. Meanwhile another fortnight elapsed, and a little son was born to Mrs. Gilbert, by the possession of which a beautiful but sixteen hours, but whose loss she took as quietly as though she had never experienced it as she otherwise. This event, and the subsequent attendance in her sick-room, threw quite a gloom upon our little household; and I, although I was with him, ran down to see the baby's birth, we received letters from the regimento officially announcing the death of Captain Gilbert. At first I could hardly believe it. I had almost forgotten the circumstance of the 27th of July, and I dreaded too cruel a blow to have to announce to the childless mother still lying weak and ill upon her bed.

But Mrs. Gilbert had known the mail was expected on that day. She was anxious and eager to receive her letters, and the doctor decided it would be less dangerous to break the news to her at once than to keep her in suspense. And so they deputed me to carry the ill tidings.

I knew not what to say or do; but I entered the sick-chamber with a pale letter crumpled in my pocket, and a face of grave concern. Mrs. Gilbert was sitting up in bed for the first time, with her baby upon her knee, and looked toward me.

"Give me the letter!" she said, quickly.

"There is no letter for you, dear," I replied. And then, as I was searching in my mind for some words to break the news to her, she exclaimed:

"I know what you have come to tell me: he is dead! I knew heaven it all along; he died upon the 27th of July!"

Then all the circumstances I have detailed rushed back upon my memory; and, pulling the letter from my pocket, I read over the contents with her. In the surprise and distress of hearing of Captain Gilbert's death I had forgotten to access on the preceding days; but she was perfectly correct. He had left the seat of war for a few days' change on the 16th of July, had been unexpectedly, on the week arriving, become unconscious on the 25th, and expired on the 27th, without ever having spoken to those who seen him. And when she opened the letter which he had sent under cover to my husband, though written before the symptoms of his last illness had appeared, it proved to contain his final wishes and directions for the guidance of herself and her child, transcribed, as he himself said, under a strong presentiment that they should never meet again.

My story has nothing to do with the grief that followed, which was, of necessity, great. It falls lies in the question which, while I put it, I know to be unanswerable: if the appearance of spirits is an impossibility, what was it that sat by Mrs. Gilbert's bedside from the 27th to the 29th of July? That the imagination alone supplied the vision, it could scarcely have inspired the idea. But I shall make no comment on this or either of the stories, but promise to simply to relate them just as they occurred.

II.

A near relation of mine (let us say a sister) was staying with us, and a Mrs. Long, during the absence of her husband. The place at which she was visiting, a large country house surrounded by a fine park, was situated in Scotland, and the husband of her hostess had gone to Edinburgh on business, which he expected to be detained for two or three weeks. One afternoon, as my sister was sitting alone, Mrs. Long entered the room with an air of great excitement, declaring that the strangest thing possible had just occurred to her. She had been taking a solitary ramble in the park, which was surrounded by a high fence and deep ditch, when she saw, from some distance off, a man in a shooting-jacket bounding along the road. Surprised to see him at all, and particularly in that situation, yet quite certain that it was himself, she stood on some rising ground to watch his approach, which had been successfully accomplished until he drew near to the park; when, instead of turning into the drive, which was the longest way to the house, he suddenly cleared the fence, and put him at the palings. She had seen the animal rise in obedience to the spur, and the next moment a shriek of the ditch beyond it, fall with her husband under him. But when, with a cry of dismay, she had rushed to the assistance of the straggling horse and rider, she had found—nothing! The whole scene had passed away, and there was only a high park fence and a quiet ditch lying before her. Mrs. Long was very agitated while relating this circumstance, and my sister thought it foreboded any ill to her husband, to whom she was much attached. But as the fancied her own sight or mind must be disordered; and it was some time before my sister could soothe her alarm, and make her view it in the light considered a more reasonable light. But by the evening Mrs. Long was quite herself again, and wrote off a cheerful account of the proceeding to her husband. Two days after, however, the same thing happened over again—precisely the same thing, as to time, place, and circumstance. Mrs. Long, walking in the park, and perhaps attracted to the spot on account of her former alarm, watched her husband approach on horseback from a distance, make the fatal leap, and disappear by the drive, and then, apparently changing his mind, put his horse at the palings, and he crushed beneath the fallen, struggling animal. As in the former case, irresistibly she ran up to his aid; as in the former case, the whole picture, as though by magic, disappeared. This time Mrs. Long was seriously frightened. She did not fear that the vision portended her husband's death; but she so far accepted it as a foreboding that she wrote to Edinburgh entreating Mr. Long on no account to return on horseback—a warning which was received with mockery, as he naturally went backward and forward by train. But that episode, as it afterward appeared, never reached the hand for which it was intended.

On the succeeding day she received a few lines before the post left to say he should be home that evening; and on the same afternoon she took my sister out in the carriage to show her the exact spot where she had twice experienced so mysterious a fright. They talked of presentiments and coincidences in this way; but Mrs. Long was so happy in the anticipation of her husband's speedy return that she was conversing rather in the performance of timidity upon the subject, when, as they came to the rising ground before mentioned, she saw the same object, changed since, suddenly invested her footsteps.

"Helen!" she exclaimed, mentioning my sister's name. "Look!—look out there! I see the same thing again!"

My sister glanced in the direction intimated by her, and there, sure enough, she also saw the spectacle of a man riding on horseback along the turnpike-road, and apparently making for her friend's abode, but still too far off to be distinctly recognized.

"My dear Mary," she replied, "that may be any one—a farmer or a servant. I see no marks by which to distinguish your husband."

But Mrs. Long did not answer her; she was staring at the object in question, whose flight my sister was fascinated by what she had heard to watch with her in silence.

The man, for one, just as had been described to her, in a quick canter, as though anxious to reach his home, until he had arrived at the divergates, and was about to enter them.

Then he seemed to change his mind, to form a sudden resolve to reach wide and clear a few minutes earlier; and backing his horse, spurred him on the palings. At this juncture Mrs. Long grasped my sister's arm, but she did not speak; and they continued to gaze silently at this apparition, so strangely revealed to both of them at once.

They watched the phantom horse and rider rise and clear the rail, and then fall heavily into the ditch below, the animal above the man, and struggle violently to get free of the latter, believing it was but a repetition of what the wife had viewed twice before, they yet involuntarily cried out to each other, when, instead of such a vision, a mere presentiment, which should vanish at a second glance. They saw the dead horse flying up at its side, a real man lying dead beneath him! Mrs. Long, having at the last moment accepted a friend's invitation to stay a night at Edinburgh, which lay between his own home and Edinburgh, had also accepted the loan of an animal to carry him to the train, for the sake of a little change, but he should ever traverse.

Let me add that the wife's mind enabled her to see twice over an act which had not yet entered into the husband's mind to execute?

III.

My next story will possess more interest for most of my readers, because it happened to my father.* He was not usually considered a timid man (what the nurses term) "my buttons short;" nor was he a particularly nervous or timid man; but he was afraid of what I am about to relate from his own lips.

In one of the northern counties of England there stands an estate which I shall call Burnham Green. It had been for many years in the possession of the Burnham family, when Sir Harry Bell, who had not occupied the house, but allowed it to fall into decay. When he died, however, the property was left to a more distant cousin, and better days dawned for Burnham Green. Sir Harry and Lady Bell resolved to live upon their property, and with that design, thoroughly repaired and decorated the building and grounds, and made their residence fashionable, and moved all their household into Cumberland.

Sir Harry Green, a fine, handsome, middle-aged dilapidated country place, had its "ghost." Sir Harry and Lady Bell had heard of it before taking possession, and, like most sensible people, had laughed at the report, and allowed it to make no difference in their plans. Every old house, as a matter of consequence, has a ghost, and they were not afraid but that light and wounds and children's voices and happy faces would dissipate even the remembrance of theirs. They surrounded Burnham Green with luxury and refinement, filled the house with company, and never gave the "ghost" another thought. But, with all their popularity and hospitality, though Burnham Green was charming, and themselves scarcely less so, would, after a few months' gaiety succeeded by country visits, and, with few exceptions, were found shy of being lured down there again.

Lady Bell was naturally much hurt and annoyed. She had made her house and grounds every thing that could be desired, and yet her friends refused to share her retirement, or to give her any plausible excuse for not doing so. What could be the reason of it?

Inquiry was made, and then it transpired that the fashionable visitors had all heard of the ghost, chiefly through their ladies'-maids; that some had even professed to see it, and pretended to be persuaded it remains under the same roof with it any longer. Then Sir Harry and Lady Bell, who had regarded the ghost story as quite unworthy the attention of educated people, were thoroughly vexed, and did all they could to remove the superstition respecting it which hung over the neighborhood. They disinterred the whole history of the ghost, who went by the name of "the Lady of Burnham Green," and found that it was supposed to be the spirit of one of their ancestresses who had lived in the time of Elizabeth, and been suspected of poisoning her husband, whose picture also hung in one of the unused bedrooms.

* Sir John Marryat, the celebrated novelist.

The Lady Bells caused that bedroom to be renovated and fitted up in a particularly cheerful manner, by erasing the "the Lady" was shunned and put in a new frame, and the apartment set in complete order.

But no one could be found to sleep in it. The servants gave warning if it was simply proposed to them, and visitors invariably preferred to put their room changed after the second or third night.

Meanwhile reports of the "Lady" having been seen in one direction and another were constantly cropping up. Guest after guest took flight to return no more, and Burnham Green was almost deserted. In this dilemma Sir Harry and Lady Bell applied to my father, who was a valued friend of theirs, for advice how to allay the terrors of their friends. My father undertook the task as much as they did. He found it impossible to contradict or account for the various reports which were floating about; but he felt sure they could be traced to the most natural of causes, and his chief idea was that some one, to whose interest it had not been that Burnham Green should be reinhabited, was playing a trick on its new owners, in hopes of persuading them to quit it again. He requested Sir Harry, therefore, to allow him to occupy the haunted room for a little while, to see if he could unravel the mystery; and accordingly not long afterward he went on a visit to his friends, and was duly installed in the "Lady's chamber," where he slept peacefully for some nights, baking the pretences, however, never to go to bed without a brace of loaded pistols under his pillow.

I believe he had been there for a week or more, without seeing or hearing any thing, and was thinking of returning home again, when the following incident occurred to him. It was the shooting season, and several young men were staying at Burnham Green; and on the morning-room one evening a discussion arose on the merits of a certain gun, then newly invented, and which was the property of Mr. Lascelles, a resident of Sir Harry's. Opinions differed on the subject, and arguments ran strong, so much so after my father had retired for the night Mr. Lascelles tapped at the door, and begged him to come over in his room to examine the weapon in question, and convince himself of some trifling fact on which he had forgotten to speak.

My father had already dispossessed himself of his coat and waistcoat; but the hour was much past midnight; it was unlikely that he would meet any one; and so he accompanied his young friend as he was, taking, at the same time, one of his pistols in his hand.—"In case we meet the ghost," he said, jestingly. They crossed the corridor to Mr. Lascelles's room, where, amidst a few minutes over the virtues of the new gun, and then my father stepped out again into the passage, proposing to returned to his own apartment.

Mr. Lascelles still accompanied him—"just to protect you from the ghost," he said, in imitation of the former allusion; for the ghost story had been well handled and laughed at in the smoking-room. The corridor they had to traverse was long and dark, for the lamps which hung in its deep niches had been extinguished at midnight; but as they entered it they saw a dim light advancing from the further end—a light held by a female figure.

"By Jove!" exclaimed Mr. Lascelles, "here is one of the ladies going up to the nurseries."

There were a few unsuspecting guests assembled at Burnham Green that autumn, and the rooms in which their little families were located were situated above the story on which the friends stood. At Mr. Lascelles's words, therefore, a consistive modesty took alarm. He did not fancy meeting a lady to whom he was not even introduced in the déshabillé of shirt and trowsers; and, with the design of escaping her notice, he pulled his companion to one side.

The rooms in the corridor were placed opposite each other, and were approached by short flights of steps, the first of which, on being opened, disclosed a small entry and the second door, which led to the bedchamber itself. Many persons, in ascending their rooms, only closed this second door, leaving the outer standing open; and this was what Mr. Lascelles and my father stepped into one of these recesses, they were enabled to shelter themselves behind the half-closed portal.

There, in the gloom, they crouched together, very much inclined to laugh; I have no doubt at the situation in which they found themselves, but terribly afraid lest by a betrayal of their illegal presence they should alarm the occupation of the bedroom before which they stood, or the lady who was advancing to the place of their concealment.

Very slowly she advanced, or so it seemed to them; but they could watch the progress of her lamp through the crack of the door: and presently my father, who had particularly kept his eye there, gave the half-smothered exclamation,

"Lascelles! By Jove!—the Lady!"

He had studied the picture of the supposed apparition carefully, was intimate with every detail of her dress and appearance, and felt that he could not be mistaken in the red satin sacque, white stomacher and petticoat, high-standing frill, and cushioned hair of the figure now advancing toward them.

"A splendid 'make-up,'" he said, beneath his breath; "but whoever has done it shall find I know a trick worth two of his."

But Mr. Lascelles said nothing. Imposition or not, he did not like the looks of the Lady of Burnham Green.

On she came, quiet and dignified, looking neither to the right nor to the left, while my father cocked his pistol, and stood ready for her. He expected she would pass their place of hiding, and intended to confront her with a charge at him; but instead of that, the dim light gained the door, and then stood still.

Lascelles shuddered. He was a brave man, but sensitive. Even my father's iron nerves prompted him to be quiescent.

In another moment the lamp moved on again, came closer, closer; and then the half-closed door, gaping inquisitively at them, as though nearly curious to see who was there, peered the dark face and form framed them with a frame of dull crimson. Some of the boldest parsuers swarm up to the sliding, and attempt to keep over the encircling barrier; while we hammer them with the butt ends of our pieces, and chop at their paws with bayonets, and slash them across the eyes with hunting-knives—the two tenderest spots of any monster—and, cracking at them over our shoulders as fast as they can load. So for a time the running-fight goes fiercely on, making altogether a very striking tableau. The white skeleton tracery of the frozen forest; the long, snaky line of the pursuing pack, shadowy and spectral, as if boiled of the mist from which it emerges; the whirling figures of the foremost drivers standing and balancing spry of more crowding clouds of bluish smoke; the ceaseless flash of the bony rifles; the steaming horses, urged to their utmost speed by the driver, with his head pallor flew all athwart with excitement, shaking the long reins rhythmically to and fro the whole the huge, cumbrous sledge, rocking and reeling over the snow with its freight of struggling furies.

"All this, and in the skin, uncertain light of the early dawn, has a weird and ghostly appearance, suggestive of the attack of goblin horsemen upon one of those phantom mail-coaches in which the bugman's uncle made the most marvelous journey which is on record. Pack, wick. But "the pace is to stiff to last," as our friend Jorrocks would have observed. A run at full speed through half-frozen snow tries the feet of even a full-grown wolf too severely to be continued for any length of time; and it is the fate of a stout resistance, the beast's inherent cowardice is sure to come to the surface sooner or later. Already two or four gaunt, shaggy-haired wretches, who have probably made a good supper overnight, have begun to hang back, as if knowing the wisdom of risking their lives for a hypothetical breakfast; the speed of the rest slackens by and by, and even the whole pack drop off, as if by tacit agreement, leaving us to pursue her very unmolested. Then we ride down into the open plain, across which the first beams of the rising sun are just beginning to fall, we see the wolf, a full-grown, unharmed dog, who is a belated specter into the ghostly shadows of the forest that we have quitted.

Such, I have said, is the usual programme of a wolf-hunt; but in the wilder regions, where the population is untraveled and has given the wolf a wider dominion, the sport often assumes a sterner and more dangerous form. Last December I happened to be unexpectedly detained at a small outlying hamlet in the Vilno district (the name of which I do not remember), and almost the first man I lighted upon there was a German engineer officer, a Prussian formerly known to Heidelberg, and who now insisted upon making me his guest till I could get forward toward Smolensko. He had been over a very primitive country, and my host (who is a keen sportsman) was just hinting at the possibility of getting up a hunt for the destruction of a wolf of uncommon size and strength which had lately haunted the neighborhood, and committed great ravages, when a terrible noise from the upper end of the village, like a score of voices all shrieking in concert, arose on the other side.

"Ach lieber Gott! was ist das?" cried my companion, springing to the door, and throwing it open. The whole place seemed in the height of confusion; men were running wildly about, shouting and screaming, children crying, lights glancing to and fro. I seized the arm of a man who was running past, and hastily asked what was the matter.

"Wolf again!" gasped the fellow, who was hardly capable of speech—"women devoured—run for the watchman," and away he flew.

The German engineer officer comrade I were running at full speed toward the scene of the catastrophe, on reaching which we came suddenly upon a spectacle which I shall not easily forget. The fitful glimmer of the rising moon, and the dying glare of the few kindled fires, gave the vain hope of scaring away the wolves, lit up a circle of wild figures and grim, bearded faces, convulsed with every varying form of passion—dumb horror, blank astonishment, panic fear, the spasm of fierce revenge. The stern calmness of concentrated wrath. In the back-ground the gaunt white arms of the leafless forest stood out against the overhanging blackness like giant skeletons; the foreground was the center of the group, half buried in the trampled blood-besmeared snow, by a motionless, shapeless something, from which all involuntarily averted their eyes—the lifeless wreck, mangled out of all semblance of humanity, of what had been but a few hours before the pride of a happy household and the beauty of the village.

There are certain catastrophes in the presence of which every one is instinctively silent. For several moments not a word is spoken; and in that dead pause of expectation I have leisure to remark the face of a peasant who stands opposite me. He is a young man of twenty-five or twenty-six, though his broad chest and powerful limbs, as well as the magnificent brown beard that waves over the bosom of his sheep-skin frock, might make him appear much older. His face is comely and weather-beaten enough; but there is something in that broad, low forehead, and square, ruthless jaw, and small, deep-set, glittering eye, which tells me at a glance that, whatever danger might confront him, that man would be very hard to subdue. He is also still looking at him he suddenly says forward and speaks: "It is time to finish this," says he, in a tone which there is no mistaking. "Who will come with me into the forest, and make an end of that brute, once for all?"

The summons does not remain long unanswered. There is no lower man living than the Russian peasant when his sentiments are fairly kindled to once fairly up. Three men instantly volunteer to join him, while my German friend and I, who really sufficiently excited by all that we have seen and heard) hasten to follow their example. I have mentioned that it was snowing, and about two in the morning, under the full splendor of the Russian moonlight, we set forth in the trail of the destroyer. There is but one gun among the six of us, the rest being armed with clubs and hatchets; but the German has brought his short hunting-knife, which has done him good service before.

Tramp, tramp, it had been for miles, without sight or sound of our lurking enemy, and the fatigue, combined to such unwonted exercise, began to fall behind. The German, myself, and one of the peasants at length found ourselves alone, and halt, in order to give the other time to come up. Already their steps are heard crunching over the snow, and a few moments more and the figures come gliding toward us through the fleecy shadow; but, to our astonishment, instead of three, there are only two making their appearance. One leader is still missing.

"Where is the other?" asks the German. The men look at each other without answering, and every face reflects the same look of dismay; for the one who is missing going about the forest in winter really means. In the dead hush that follows we suddenly hear a distant cry—a cry the deep, manly shout of a hunter calling to his mates, but the shrill, agonized yell of a man in an extreme need—the cry of a comrade who feels his hold relaxing, of the swimmer who finds the line hauling in from the shore. At present we are all fleeing in the direction of the sound.

Michael, while quickening his pace to catch up with his comrade, thought to it that he had burning of his shoe-strap, and must stop to adjust it. But the moment after reflecting him will fully appreciate that defenseless posture. Poor Michael does not bear the rustle of that stealthy tread, does not see the glare of that fiery eye behind him, but he can not fail to hear the sharp crackle of the dead branches as the gaunt body pads steadily from the dark thicket, and falls right upon him as he rises, clutching fiercely at his unprotected side with its sharp white fangs. Yet even in that perilous peril the brave fellow does not lose heart. One moment's grace is allowed him while his assailant's teeth fail to pierce his rough sheep-skin frock; and that moment suffices. The wolf's hand is under his left arm; in an instant his right hand is free and is round its neck, jamming the beast's throat in an iron clasp between his side and elbow, while he draws his knife from its sheath at once, and holds the brute as in a vice, lifting his voice at the same moment in a wild cry for help. And now begins a terrible struggle. No time to snatch up the trusty axe which has fallen just in front of him, or to make use of sheer strength. The wolf, erect on his hind legs, strains every nerve to get at his throat free; once free, one ravaging gripe of Michael's throat will pay for all. Hold on, as you love your life! though your joints crack, though your sinews tingle as if they had swum dizzily, hold on still—tighter, tighter, tighter! And now the wolf's one-like shrieks of the lonely forest, with the cold moon looking pitilessly down upon it, does the dendy-grappling Michael's ear in prison to respond—to let at last; the fierce yelps eyes are growing dim, and the head sinks on the cross-bar. And then their edges the last flakes of blood and foam spurt over Michael's face. But how long can that hold be maintained? Let not the strained muscles already yielding? the stiffened fingers already relaxing their grip? Let not the trained muscles of the monster, whose skull is literally shivered by the formidable buckets.

Yes, the gifted Michael we found him, to our astonishment, completely unwounded, though utterly spent with his repeated struggles. He is at present on coming to himself was sufficiently characteristic. After crossing himself decently and mumbling a few words of prayer, he struggled up to the spot where the wolf lay dead, and, bending over it, cried in a triumphing tone, "Now, brute, ya vgrod, shto li?" (Well, brother, I've won, haven't I?)

We rewarded the brave fellow as he deserved; but in the hope of obtaining him a further reward from the government, we thought it best to publish the whole story in one of the local Russian papers, whence it soon after found its way into the columns of the newspapers of Europe, thereby an interest in behalf of the hero, which is now—I am glad to learn—likely to bear abundant fruit.

* In Sweden wolves are often literally "run down" in this way, without the use of fire-arms at all.

"A splendid 'make-up,'" he said, beneath his breath; "but whoever has done it shall find I know a trick worth two of his."

But Mr. Lascelles said nothing. Imposition or not, he did not like the looks of the Lady of Burnham Green.

On she came, quiet and dignified, looking neither to the right nor to the left, while my father cocked his pistol, and stood ready for her. He expected she would pass their place of hiding, and intended to confront her with a charge at him; but instead of that, the dim light gained the door, and then stood still.

Lascelles shuddered. He was a brave man, but sensitive. Even my father's iron nerves prompted him to be quiescent.

In another moment the lamp moved on again, came closer, closer; and then the half-closed door, gaping inquisitively at them, as though nearly curious to see who was there, peered the dark face and form framed them with a frame of dull crimson. Some of the boldest parsuers swarm up to the sliding, and attempt to keep over the encircling barrier; while we hammer them with the butt ends of our pieces, and chop at their paws with bayonets, and slash them across the eyes with hunting-knives—the two tenderest spots of any monster—and, cracking at them over our shoulders as fast as they can load. So for a time the running-fight goes fiercely on, making altogether a very striking tableau. The white skeleton tracery of the frozen forest; the long, snaky line of the pursuing pack, shadowy and spectral, as if boiled of the mist from which it emerges; the whirling figures of the foremost drivers standing and balancing spry of more crowding clouds of bluish smoke; the ceaseless flash of the bony rifles; the steaming horses, urged to their utmost speed by the driver, with his head pallor flew all athwart with excitement, shaking the long reins rhythmically to and fro the whole the huge, cumbrous sledge, rocking and reeling over the snow with its freight of struggling furies.

"All this, and in the skin, uncertain light of the early dawn, has a weird and ghostly appearance, suggestive of the attack of goblin horsemen upon one of those phantom mail-coaches in which the bugman's uncle made the most marvelous journey which is on record. Pack, wick. But "the pace is to stiff to last," as our friend Jorrocks would have observed. A run at full speed through half-frozen snow tries the feet of even a full-grown wolf too severely to be continued for any length of time; and it is the fate of a stout resistance, the beast's inherent cowardice is sure to come to the surface sooner or later. Already two or four gaunt, shaggy-haired wretches, who have probably made a good supper overnight, have begun to hang back, as if knowing the wisdom of risking their lives for a hypothetical breakfast; the speed of the rest slackens by and by, and even the whole pack drop off, as if by tacit agreement, leaving us to pursue her very unmolested. Then we ride down into the open plain, across which the first beams of the rising sun are just beginning to fall, we see the wolf, a full-grown, unharmed dog, who is a belated specter into the ghostly shadows of the forest that we have quitted.

Such, I have said, is the usual programme of a wolf-hunt; but in the wilder regions, where the population is untraveled and has given the wolf a wider dominion, the sport often assumes a sterner and more dangerous form. Last December I happened to be unexpectedly detained at a small outlying hamlet in the Vilno district (the name of which I do not remember), and almost the first man I lighted upon there was a German engineer officer, a Prussian formerly known to Heidelberg, and who now insisted upon making me his guest till I could get forward toward Smolensko. He had been over a very primitive country, and my host (who is a keen sportsman) was just hinting at the possibility of getting up a hunt for the destruction of a wolf of uncommon size and strength which had lately haunted the neighborhood, and committed great ravages, when a terrible noise from the upper end of the village, like a score of voices all shrieking in concert, arose on the other side.

"Ach lieber Gott! was ist das?" cried my companion, springing to the door, and throwing it open. The whole place seemed in the height of confusion; men were running wildly about, shouting and screaming, children crying, lights glancing to and fro. I seized the arm of a man who was running past, and hastily asked what was the matter.

"Wolf again!" gasped the fellow, who was hardly capable of speech—"women devoured—run for the watchman," and away he flew.

The German engineer officer comrade I were running at full speed toward the scene of the catastrophe, on reaching which we came suddenly upon a spectacle which I shall not easily forget. The fitful glimmer of the rising moon, and the dying glare of the few kindled fires, gave the vain hope of scaring away the wolves, lit up a circle of wild figures and grim, bearded faces, convulsed with every varying form of passion—dumb horror, blank astonishment, panic fear, the spasm of fierce revenge. The stern calmness of concentrated wrath. In the back-ground the gaunt white arms of the leafless forest stood out against the overhanging blackness like giant skeletons; the foreground was the center of the group, half buried in the trampled blood-besmeared snow, by a motionless, shapeless something, from which all involuntarily averted their eyes—the lifeless wreck, mangled out of all semblance of humanity, of what had been but a few hours before the pride of a happy household and the beauty of the village.

There are certain catastrophes in the presence of which every one is instinctively silent. For several moments not a word is spoken; and in

ONCE MORE IN THE SUN.—WOUNDED SOLDIERS IN THE GARDEN OF VERSAILLES.—[See Page 881.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 731.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1870. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT. PRICE TEN CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

CHRISTMAS.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

O Christmas bells that downward roll
Across the dark and dewy glen,
Where shepherds heard the joyous song,
Pence on the earth, good-will to men!

What glare eclipses your sweet light
With half the shrinking world on fire,
With blood and reek and battle-smoke,
And ruined home and blazing byre!

What creatures with the thirst of wolves
Round a beleaguered nation rent!
What unnerving armies with their lines
Of angry shade insult your sun!

Down what a length your lustre swims,
A lurid length of grief and pain;
Did you, two thousand years ago,
O Christmas morning, dawn in vain?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1870.

☞ With this Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY the Publishers take pleasure in presenting their readers with another superb

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

prepared with special reference to Christmas-time. It contains Four Splendid Full-Page

CHRISTMAS ILLUSTRATIONS, drawn expressly for this Number by SHEPARD, NAST, AND EARLE; Christmas Stories, Poems, and other literary attractions.

☞ Owing to the pressure of Christmas matter in this Number, the announcement of the new Serial by ARTEMUS WARD is necessarily deferred.

Persons desiring to RENEW their subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending to their names as early as convenient ABOVE THE RENEWAL TERM of their subscription. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

MERRY CHRISTMAS.

PRELUDED by a season of remarkable softness and beauty, Christmas is here with its happy influences. It is also merry Christmas. While Europe bleeds with war, and is anxious with fearful omens, America hums with peaceful industry, and the future stretches out like a flowering prairie to the summer sky. The dark cloud that for five years overshadowed for us the holy time has passed away, and the country has emerged brighter and better from the terrible ordeal. Yet the season will not fail to refresh a thousand tender ties, and to bring before us the figures of those whose presence was the crown of their memory or was the benediction, if unmemorable homes. It is that remembrance also, so natural to the time consecrated to domestic affections, which, as we stand around the glittering Christmas-tree, will deepen our sympathy for the German homes, from which that tree was brought to us, and in which there is unspeakable sorrow and fear today. The same remembrance will soften our hearts for the homes of France, now wretched and ruined. So sad and solemn a Christmas France has never known except in the dark days of the terror.

The day itself falls this year on Sunday, and in every pulpit in the United States there will be a service of especial remembrance. It will be the tongues that speak could be touched with the holy fire! If only the great lesson of the life of Him whose birth we commemorate could be so set forth as to become the golden rule of the individual and national life! If only it could be said that the full of our days is conduct, that to serve men is to worship God! For that is the Christmas sermon and the Christmas carol. For now that the Bethlehem shepherds heard is the song that we all hear in our deepest consciousness, that good-will to men is peace on earth. And the preacher who paints the truest picture of the patient, cheerful, simple self-sacrifice of the head of Christendom—who shows that the life of the Christmas season is most appropriate to the memory of a teacher in whom was no gloom, no asceticism, but an overflowing fountain of human love and sympathy—he will be truly the Christian preacher, and his sermon a carol which every generous heart will echo.

A STRAW THAT SHOWS THE WIND.

THE resolution of SENATOR MCCREERY, of Kentucky, was properly characterized by SENATOR SUMNER as an illustration of what may be expected if the Democratic party should return to power. The resolution proposed substantially that the remains of seventeen thousand Union soldiers should be removed from the Arlington estate, in order that the widow of ROBERT E. LEE should live there. Such a proposition was the grossest insult to the patriotism and good sense of the country, and therefore to the Senate, their representative, and the Senate almost unanimously resolved that it should not be received. The Democratic Senators were greatly confused by the motion of MR. MCCREERY. As partisans they saw its effect. It was an unnecessary revelation of the real spirit of the party, and the party leaders know that the country is at least loyal, and that they can hope to succeed only by persuading the people that the party has renounced its sympathy with the spirit and the principles which produced the rebellion. Some of his Democratic friends, therefore, rebuked MR. MCCREERY, who assumed all the responsibility of the resolution, and tried to withdraw it. But SENATOR EDMUNDS held him fast to the rules, and by a vote of fifty-nine to four the Senate refused to receive the resolution.

The Democratic press does not openly defend the resolution. But the manner in which it alludes to it shows how gladly it would defend it if it dared. The effect of the debate in the Senate was an opportunity to show the tendency of its sympathy, which it zealously improved. The extravagant eulogies which were heaped by the Democratic papers upon a man who only claim to the notice of history is that he led a party to destroy the government of the United States in order to establish a slave empire upon its ruins were very suggestive. And the fact, that it was constantly refreshed in the mind by such incidents, that the Democratic party is the next friend and mourner of the lost cause, should impress upon the people the great and controlling truth of the political situation. That truth is that the nation has escaped the peril, but not the necessity, of watch and a new policy; that the principles are those of the Republican party; while the Democratic party is the representative of the men and the principles which have passed away. There is no evidence of any disposition upon the part of the Democratic party to accept the new situation, or to acquiesce in what has been accomplished. Its last national declaration was that the war was a usurpation; and whether in word, and its conduct, wherever it has the ascendency, shows an unblemished sympathy with a spirit which the country abhors.

And even were this not so—even had the same policy which led the Delaware Democratic Senator to censure SENATOR SUMNER'S resolution persuaded the party to profess sympathy with the regenerated Union—it would still be impossible to say why a party whose composition and of such a history should be intrusted with the administration of a policy which it had always opposed, and which depended upon political principles which it has always derided. After the Revolution the government of the new Union was confided to the friends of the principles upon which it was established—the men whose convictions and ability had opened the way for them to the country. And after 1815 the government was controlled for many a year by the party which had made the war, and which was in full harmony with its spirit. And how the country having entered upon a new and more glorious than any in its history, and under the auspices of the Republican party, that party is the one which will deal with all questions in the spirit of the new time, and with the sympathy of profound conviction.

A party whose newspapers hate to speak with decency of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, but which quiver with indignation if MR. SUMNER is hit, and from one of whose Senators proceeds the astounding proposition that the bones of Union soldiers shall be removed from their rest under the shadow of the Capitol, that the widow of LEE may not be offended—a party which still believes the war to have been an outrage upon the "South," and which would undo all of its great work that it can—is a party which does not comprehend the new situation, which is not inspired by its faith, and whose restoration to power would be the surest of national calamities.

THE NEW MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

THE appointment of General SCHENCK as minister to England is one to which even the World takes no exception. The general ability, the high character, the special experience, the ample knowledge of public affairs, and certain qualities of character and temperament peculiarly fit the new minister for his function. He will be accepted by the whole country as an admirably representative American, in a sense which every body comprehends: not the Fog, nor of Jefferson Brick America, but a man sincerely and practically in sympathy with what is called the popular heart of the country. He knows instinctively the view which the average American will take of every subject, and the average American governs the country. General SCHENCK will, therefore, be admirably representative public opinion in the United States to all concerned. Surely, intelligent, prompt, and well-possessed, the English statesman will find in the new American minister a man with whom they can discuss every question that may arise, and directly and frankly as with each of his colleagues. We do not mean that the most perfect courtesy, and the grace of the highest breeding, as it is called, are not American, nor that a man more truly represents us in the degree that he is a boor, which seems to be the theory of some people who absurdly imagine that they are peculiarly American when they are peculiarly coarse and ill-mannered. But there is a certain inflexible independence which is agreeable to gentlemen of every country, and England will find it in General SCHENCK.

He is not the man for an ornamental mission, and therefore it is to be presumed that he will be instructed to take up the Alabama question and settle it. If this presumption be correct, it implies that the Government has a very distinct view of the manner in which that controversy should be concluded. We hope sincerely that this is the fact, and that the Government will not politely wait for England to make the first move. It is true, as has been said a hundred times, that we can afford to wait if England can. But that is child's-play. Our treaty-making power sent out an agent unmistakably empowered. He made a treaty which our own Executive proposed, and which was modified at our suggestion. It was signed and submitted to the treaty-making power, and the Senatorial branch of that power threw it out of the window. "If that is not what you want, why not give us a reason to suppose," says England, "what is it?" To reply, "Oh, well, if you want to settle, make us another offer!" is to invite humiliation. It is not statesmanship. The United States will not lose by any kind of magnanimity, and we hope that General SCHENCK'S instructions will be ample to propose the treaty which we intend to ratify. But no American can forget that, even if he is unanimously confirmed, when new negotiation and proposed terms, and even if those terms are accepted without alteration by the English Government, that Government can have no confidence whatever that the Senate will not fling the treaty out of the window or kick it down stairs. We have no reason to be surprised, therefore, if an air of doubt should hang over the negotiation upon the part of England—a doubt which we hope to dispel.

The Alabama question is twofold. It involves specific claims for damages, and also considerations of international law. If England prefers to treat for the claims only, and we should acquiesce, the very object of a treaty would be defeated; for the real object is the restoration of good feeling. Our proposition, therefore, should be made in a truly friendly spirit. And England should not be in the nature of a truce between inevitable belligerents, but it should be a bond of real friendship. That is what the general sentiment of both countries would make it. And to that end the serious questions of international obligation ought to be considered. The recent changes in the British neutrality law cover much of what might be suggested by us. But a distinct declaration of the understanding of making the local law adequate to the fulfillment of international obligation would be of the most signal service. We observe with pleasure that leading men of England to promote a friendly settlement of our differences, and that MR. THOMAS HUGHES is chairman. It is a pleasant fact which should remind us constantly of that great and influential body of Englishmen who were steadily faithful to us, and whose conduct during the rebellion undoubtedly saved us from a war with England. Let every patriotic American who knows that a war between the countries would be really a ghastly civil war be a committee to help keep an honorable peace. And of that committee happily GENERAL SCHENCK is chairman.

The country is unquestionably gratified by the appointment of the new minister; but it does not forget that he becomes a most admirable representative, of whom also the country is proud, and whose recall is still a mystery. We hope that the administration will yet authorize some simple statement of the reasons which produced dissatisfaction with MR. MOTLEY. It is certainly personally kind, and most injurious to the public service, that any man should be so publicly humiliated as he has been without any known reason, and it is not a matter which the Administration should leave unexplained.

THE UNITED STATES AND PRUSSIA.

THE protest of the State Department against the action of the German authorities in refusing to allow MR. WASHBURNE'S dispatches to pass from Paris unless they were unsealed is moderate but reasonable. The capital of France being besieged, and our minister shut up with the French Government, he has not lost his right to communicate with his own Government, which has declared itself to be neutral. To insist that the dispatches be open is to assert that the minister is suspected of violating the neutrality of his Government. But if there is reason for such a suspicion, it should be stated to his Government, and it would be a confession of the refusal, because the Germans are not bound to permit any violation of neutrality which they have reason to suspect. But as no such suspicion has been alleged, it must be assumed that MR. WASHBURNE'S dispatches are honorably neutral, and they should not be respected. Secretary FISH very properly remarks that Prussia has been so forward in asserting the rights of neutrals that it is unpleasant to encounter this limitation of the undoubted rights of an independent legation.

It is the more unpleasant because MR. WASHBURNE assumed the care of the Germans in Paris, and because of the universal and profound sympathy in this country for Germany. It is not impossible that the apparent eagerness of MR. WASHBURNE to recognize the Committee of Defense as the Government of France, and to express sympathy for the republic—forgetting that there was no republic—may have made the German authorities suspicious that the American minister was ready in an unneutral frame of mind. The relief of their doubts would depend very much upon their belief in his sincerity in representing the sentiments of his Government. And it is certainly a question whether the United States would have had its telegraphy at MR. WASHBURNE on the 6th of September to congratulate the Committee of Defense upon "the successful establishment of a republican government." It was an authority de facto—that was all.

It was certainly not a republican government which existed. The first element of the State Department on the same day was perfectly correct. "If the Provisional Government is not established and possessed of power, and is acknowledged by the French people, so as to be in point of fact a de facto Government," etc., it is recognized.

It is not likely, however, that Germany will care to excite ill feeling in this country, and the Government will therefore probably yield to the representations of our minister at Berlin. Indeed, the sagacity with which the political sense of the German people has been managed by Germany is hardly less remarkable than the skill of the military operations. What country could have believed that such a general as VON MOLTKE supplemented by such a statesman as BISMARCK? The clearness, the good sense, the moderation of the political manœuvres have been unsurpassed. In the beginning the German manifest was unanswerable. In all the proclamations of KING WILLIAM and BISMARCK has had plainly the best of it in principle and argument. And in all the exterior diplomacy the same thing is evident. The Germans have told the truth about the situation, and it is not the least remarkable circumstance of the war that no report from the Paris Government, or from French partisans in our own press, have been believed until they were subsequently officially confirmed. BISMARCK will not alienate the public opinion of the United States.

SAN DOMINGO.

THE President does not relinquish his hope of annexing San Domingo. He made a strong argument for it in his Message, stating the advantages of the acquisition in the most striking manner, and showing his very sincere conviction that we ought to have the island. Senator SUMNER has instantly moved a resolution of the most searching inquiry into the sources of the Presidential statements, while Senator MORTON proposes a commission to go to San Domingo and ascertain facts. In the House, MR. BANKS proposed a similar commission. The Senate resolution was voted down. That of the House was referred to the Committee upon Foreign Affairs. Meanwhile a protest is preparing in commercial circles against San Domingo project, upon the ground that it will lead to great frauds and corruptions, and involve a war with the French part of the island, and that at a time when it will be a great misfortune for the country to believe that the war taxes are maintained that our territory may be bought.

The sole practical arguments for the annexation are two: first, that we need a coaling station; and, second, that we ought not to take San Domingo some European power will. But although a coaling station may be convenient, it is all clear enough not necessarily desirable at every price. MR. TOODLES thought that a door-plate was handy to have, and MR. Sparrowgrass thought the same of a carriage. But all things have a price, and however handy, the cost must be considered. This principle must be kept steadily applied to the San Domingo bargain; and a war, a debt, and a totally alien population make up a price altogether disproportioned to the convenience of coaling. As for the advantages of a tropical garden and its productions, we can enjoy them without annexation. It would be a lamentable policy for us to buy or to annex other countries for the sake of what they produce. A generous commerce would secure the products of other lands without the care and expense of raising them. Great territorial size is not necessarily great power. It is a convenience of any kind; and however desirable increased size may be hereafter, we have certainly time enough to wait. To get a vast territory merely for dignity, it is not worth while to pay the immense price which is inevitable.

The annexation of European powers to occupy American islands is probably not very pronounced. If there has been any negotiation with reference to the acquisition of San Domingo, we shall presently know it under SENATOR SUMNER'S resolution. But when we have decided that our just interest requires that there shall be no further European colonization upon this continent we can courteously say so, if, upon consideration, it seems to be judicious. At present there seems to be no European power which is likely to undertake the business of American occupation. Spain, the great colcaterer, is still wrestling to hold the most important of her American possessions, and her general American example is hardly encouraging to other European countries. If it shall appear that there are promising negotiations pending for the cession of San Domingo elsewhere, there will be something to consider. But the alternative is not annexation to the United States. If that were so, there would be no more virile European policy than the opening of negotiations for outlying territory upon this continent. For upon this theory the result would be to cession to us, and our continual weakening. It would be a kind of territorial dropsy imposed upon us by crafty Europe.

There is one other argument which is sometimes urged. It is that to annex San Domingo would be to extend the area of freedom. That was the avowed argument of the slaveholders when they drove us at their pleasure. It was alleged in the good old palmy days, for which Coppoodom still sighs, that to multiply slavery was to increase liberty. But it was a problem in politico-moral metaphysics to which the country was unequal. As slavery does no longer controls the government, merely to annex other countries is not, as it was then, to spread the area. But before we undertake to extend the blessings of republican freedom let us strengthen and regulate our own practice of it, so that the process of extension shall be one of weakening also. To extend a system of political corruption is not serviceable to any citizen nor to the country. Indeed, it is not a question whether we are yet quite prepared to be missionaries. Certainly it is not wise while in the most powerful crucible of republicanism by the annexation of semi-barbarous tropical regions. If great reasons of state plainly compel us to tropical annexation, we must, of course, make the best of it. But the reasons must be greater and plainer than they yet appear to be in the San Domingo project.

AMNESTY.

In his speech defining his position and describing the political situation in Missouri, Senator SCHURZ announced the recent statement of our correspondent that the division in that State was not upon the question of reconstruction, for, as he declares, true Blue and Gray BROWN expressed himself very strongly upon the subject in every speech that he made; nor is there much doubt that the leaders of the opposition are what is called reverse reformers. Senator SCHURZ, however, insists that the particular distinguishing question of amnesty, and that the policy which he and his friends adopted in Missouri upon that subject must become the policy of the party in the country, as it must expect defeat. He declares that general enfranchisement was made the Republican policy upon the national at the last National Convention, and that it is a political necessity that the Republicans deprive their opponents of that cry before the next Presidential election. Mr. SCHURZ's resolution in the Convention only recommended universal amnesty as soon as it should be compatible with the public safety, which full amnesty under very stringent conditions. Until, therefore, the party is persuaded that the amnesty may be wisely granted it is not bound to proclaim it by any previous declaration.

Thus the party is pledged to amnesty only when it appears to be advisable. Every man may vote for it or vote against it, and still be a consistent and sincere Republican. The question of its advisability upon the party comes to the question of the welfare of the country. If the public feeling in favor of an amnesty is so strong that it threatens to make the Democracy more menacing, then it is desirable to consider that feeling, because to risk Republican power for the purpose of securing it from those who will be enfranchised by a Republican defeat would be unspeakable folly. Permanent disfranchisement is not contemplated, because in the end country it would be a permanent peril. All punishment of great classes of political offenders, including, it perilous, but it is a question that must sometimes be encountered. The time comes, however, when the peril is greater than the evils, and the punishment must cease.

There is little doubt that the disfranchised class in the Southern States includes many influential persons, and that they are naturally hostile to the government. The true policy toward such persons would seem to be one of reasonable conciliation. And this not so much for themselves as for others. The power for mischief of a man who is made to suffer for what others believe to be honest convictions is much greater than that of the same man without his crown of martyrdom. But when, as Mr. WADE HAMPTON against a government which he sought to destroy, yet which forgave him, JEFFERSON DAVIS, wandering foil powerless. RICHARD T. LEE, ostentatiously mourned, are proofs of a clemency of the government as admirable as its power is indisputable. Indeed, it is only a truly powerful government that can wisely be clement.

The Democrats, of course, favor a general amnesty because they know that Democracy bred rebels, and that the more an ex-rebel hates the government and disputes its validity the surer he is to vote the Democratic ticket. But the Democrats should be a little wary in their choice of arguments. They are very defying to hear the late lackeys of slavery urging the principles of Christianity. And certainly nothing would so effectually serve to double the wisdom of amnesty as to hear the resolutary legates of "the sum of human villainies" quoting the Lord's prayer as an argument for enfranchisement.

GERMANY IN FRANCE.

It was lately untruly stated that M. GAMBETTA had relinquished hope of relief from Paris has failed. The army of the Loire has been divided. General DE PALADINES has been driven northward and routed in abandonment. It is to be regretted that the report of M. GAMBETTA's feeling was not correct, and that he still clung to hope to feed France upon lies if the situation has long been hopeless, and all was neither patriotism nor wisdom to refuse to see it. Nevertheless, if the worst was not yet what it is, it would always be too soon for the Frenchman to despair. If it were a contest of resistance to opinion, if it were a struggle for independence against a cruel power, it were a fight for the defense of human rights and conduct, or of a true national existence, then every Frenchman would justly welcome the worst, knowing that the worst of war is not so bad as the basis of slavery.

But that is not the situation, and it never has been. The appeal of France to the moral sympathy and the generosity of the world implored, because it had no reason. It could not invoke enthusiasm for the republic, because there is no republic and the very first principles that proclaim it have plainly shrunk from permitting the people to express themselves. It could not appeal against aggression, because France had picked a foolish quarrel for the purpose of involving Prussia and making peace in Berlin. It could not plead that the Emperor began the war and it had repudiated the Emperor, because it had adopted his war. When the nation has nothing but the sentiment duty of France, if it did not mean war, was to say that the war was the crime of the Emperor, which it disowned, and to sue for a speedy and equal peace. Then if Germany had offered impossible or evidently dishonorable terms, the appeal would continued, and the moral sympathy of the world might have fallen to France. But, instead of this, the first declaration of M. GAMBETTA and his friends was that France would become a republic, which was an appeal for sympathy under false pretenses. Then they declared that not an inch of territory or a stone of a fortress should be yielded, which was mere defiance of a victorious enemy. From that moment there has been nothing but a war for the truth enveloping the authorities. Brave men there are in France, indeed, and noble women. But there is a canker of corruption behind. And now, when the last hope seems to vanish, when the future of France, in case of the fall of Paris, absolutely inconceivable, the Committee of Defense insist upon prolonging the misfortune and deepening the humiliation of France.

Had the report of M. GAMBETTA's request of an armistice to allow an election been correct, that it was not has been, and that the election been accepted, what an extraordinary spectacle it would have been! And so still will be unless the Parisians are suffered to starve into victorious. If the war continues to what now seems its probable issue, Germany will occupy France, and by German permission the elections will be held to determine whether Germany shall be asked for peace, and upon what terms it can be obtained. Meanwhile the moral situation of France is inexpressibly sad to imagine. What untold suffering of every kind and what hopeless desolation of misery! And it seems the completion of the old revolution, the revolution "in permanence" since 1789. The Germans must help it, and if not they are to be new things. It is to be hoped that there are men in France who understand that the only hope of salvation for the nation now is through, not back. We have yet to see whether there will be a reaction which will utterly prolong the agony of the country, or a resolution which will at last regenerate it.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

We are much gratified to hear of the kind reception which the American astronomers have met in London, on their way to Spain and Sicily to observe the eclipse of the sun during the present month. Nothing could be more cordial than the welcome that has been extended to them, the astronomer royal and engineer in charge of the government telegraphs having offered them every facility, while the Athenæum Club, and the clubs of the Royal and Royal Astronomical societies, have made them their guests. They have visited many of the observatories of England for the purpose of making themselves familiar with the general plans and arrangement of the establishments. Professor NEWCOMB, who represents in part the National Observatory expedition, sailed for Gibraltar on the 5th of December with the English eclipse expedition, having been kindly tendered a passage by the government authorities.

Professor NEWCOMB, of the Washington Observatory, visits Europe at the present time not only for the purpose of observing the eclipse, but also to collect from the different observatories and or unpublished records of the position of the moon, which is used in a discussion of the whole subject of the moon's movements, and the improvement of the lunar tables. Furthermore, astronomy not long since completed an exhaustive discussion of the planet Neptune (published by the Smithsonian Institution in 1866), the results of which have been used to test the precision of the different nautical almanacs, he is now engaged on a similar investigation of Uranus, one object of which is to ascertain whether the perturbations produced by Neptune are sufficient to expaun all the irregularities of Uranus, or whether there are still residuary phenomena which may indicate the existence of a yet undiscovered planet of the first order, and exterior to Uranus. The Washington Observatory possesses not data for the investigation in question, as well as for that relating to the moon.

The latest report of the British eclipse expedition is to the effect that the governmens has, at last, come forward promptly to the interest of the occasion, and will render the utmost assistance in its power, especially carrying out unreservedly the wishes of the public. As at present arranged there are to be four parties—one to Cadiz, and another to Gibraltar; another, in the charge of Mr. LOCKYER, accompanies the American expedition; another to Sardis, under the charge of Mr. HUGGINS, proceeds to Orno, in Algeria.

It is stated in Nature that the British government has granted twenty thousand pounds for observations on the coming transit of Venus.

Mr. HEINE, well known in the United States as the artist who accompanied Commodore PERRY on the Japan expedition, and as connected with other geographical enterprises, lately presented a communication before the British Association in regard to the lines for ship canals across the Isthmus of Panama. After discussing the routes proposed across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, Honduras, Nicaragua, and the line of the valley of the river of Darien, he came to the conclusion that only two lines were of a kind to be seriously considered. These lines, according to his statement, are—1. From Aspinwall to Panama, by the railway to Panama, having an extreme elevation of 269 feet, a length of 47½ miles, and requiring the excavation of very basalt, and with but middling sorts of entry. 2. From Limon Bay, Caribbean through the rivers Atrato, Caceres, Paris, and Tuqres, to the Gulf of San Miguel, in the Pacific, a distance of 180 feet, length fifty-two miles, through a soil composed of alluvium, clay, and, with some little interval, of grayish sandstone or schist, and with very good ports of entry.

Mr. HEINE says the first line was very perfect, that of the second line less so, and a more exact survey was desirable. Of the unimportance of the undertaken, twelve were of American origin, four were natives of Great Britain, one of Native Colombian, and only two by Englishmen.

Mr. R. M'ANDREW, a well-known English conchologist, has recently occupied for a considerable length of time in dredging in the Gulf of Suez, and has obtained no less than fifty species of shells, of which three-fourths have been determined. These specimens show a remarkable affinity with the forms belonging to the Mediterranean, and the existence is inferred of a subterranean channel by the sea from a very remote epoch although it is thought that the two were united in the early part of the present century.

Among the numerous engineering projects of the present day, few promise to be of more importance in a commercial point of view than the ship canal, which, when its length, by which it is proposed to connect the head of Buzzard's Bay with Cape Cod Harbor, Cape Cod. It is believed that when this is completed a very large proportion of the shipping that now sails down round the outside of Cape Cod, encountering the perils of its lee shore, and the fogs and other impediments to safe navigation, will make a direct course through Buzzard's Bay and Cape Cod Bay, while greatly shortening the time necessary for the passage, and avoiding in a much less risk of loss or detention, as well as at a reduced rate of insurance.

The feasibility of this project has been demonstrated, it is said, by careful surveys of the approaches to the proposed canal, while the nature of the ground to be traversed is also favorable for its construction. A company has been organized for the purpose in question, and it is expected that the canal can be excavated to a depth of twenty-seven feet, and of sufficient width to admit vessels of 2,000 tons burden. A bill has just been introduced into Congress to provide for the construction, by the general government, of a breakwater and harbor of refuge across Buzzard's Bay, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000. The bill provides for the reimbursement to the government by the company of all the expenditures thereof should any failure occur in the completion of the canal itself.

In this connection we may also refer to the renewal of the project, proposed by TELFORD many years ago, for a ship canal across the counties of Devon and Somersetshire, England, to shorten the sea passage between the British and English channels. The proposed canal is to be seventy-two miles in length, and fifty-nine feet long, and will cost about $17,000,000. The freights on this canal, when finished, will probably consist principally of coal.

A memorial has lately been presented by the Royal Irish Academy to Earl Granville, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, calling his attention to the irreparable loss which would be sustained by the whole civilized world should the invaluable scientific, literary, and historical collection of the Royal Irish Academy ously injured during the siege. As the city contains galleries stored with treasures of art, rich libraries, and scientific museums of the first rank, representing the accumulated labors of many generations, they are to be considered as the property not merely of France, but of the whole world, many of the articles contained in them being irreplaceable should they be once destroyed. The fate of the library of Strasburg shows that there is real danger to the Paris collections from the military operations; and in view of the facts stated in the petitioners, the members of a scientific body, protest against the destruction of these collections, and appeal to and upon her Majesty's government to use the utmost efforts for their preservation by impressing upon the belligerents the duty of taking every possible precaution for their protection from the dangers to which they are likely to be exposed.

Allusions have lately been made in the public papers to the discovery of a silver mine on an island in Lake Superior, which is being worked under the protection of a coffer-dam. Accordingly, we are informed by Mr. CHARLES MOTT, that ore becomes richer with the increasing depth, and is now yielding at the rate of $15,000 a ton.

The contractor for the cable to extend along the west side of South America writes encouragingly of the success of the enterprise, and states that a rival line, which was expected to interfere with his plans, has agreed to yield the route from Payta to Pisco for the European telegraph, so that it will be practically only one line between Valparaiso and Panama.

The Panama Railroad Company, in view of the increase of its trade with the Central American ports, has recently increased its steamship service on the west coast from two to three vessels monthly. The new steamer will leave on the 25th; and returning on the 10th, 15th, and 30th.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 12.—In the Senate, a resolution was offered by Senator SUMNER in favor of the removal of political disabilities. Its consideration was postponed. Mr. SUMNER introduced a resolution for the purchase of the site for the erection of the grades of admiral and vice-admiral in the navy. After a very brief discussion it was passed. A resolution was agreed to that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, authorizing the appointment of a committee to visit Europe for the purpose of investigating for the acquisition of San Domingo. A resolution was offered for the abolition of the pardoning system as soon as consistent with the credit of the government, and referred to the Judiciary. In the House, a joint resolution looking to the removal of the Union dead from Arlington Heights to the National Cemetery at the battle-ground of the late General Lee. He delivered a glowing eulogy on the life and character of the deceased. Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan, introduced a resolution for the repeal of the income tax after the 1st of January, 1872.—In the House, the bill for the relief of the widow of the late General Lee was taken up. A debate continued on the amendment abolishing the franking privilege. An amendment to this, making the free exchange of newspapers and periodicals, was adopted, and the original amendment rejected. The bill was ordered instituting searching investigations into the cost of the public buildings, and after some discussion, in which several members participated, and after much wrangling as to details the whole bill passed without a division.

December 13.—In the Senate, the greater part of the time was taken up in the consideration of the bill for the completion of the Capitol building by attaching to American engineering skill and labor. Mr. SUMNER introduced a bill to provide for the appointment of a commissioner of education, with a salary of $5,000 per annum, and a supporter of the administration, and expressed the belief that the Republican party would perform the duty of the future.—In the House, the debate on the Income Bill was resumed. Mr. SCHENCK opposed the speeches being mainly in opposition.

December 14.—In the Senate, the completion of General Sedgwick's bill was taken up, and Mr. SUMNER made a long and interesting speech in opposition. In the House, a bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce, to provide for the completion of the ship-building by admitting to American registry and enrollment, for the purpose of foreign trade, the ships, free of duty, of ship-building and engineering materials, of over 2000 tons, the latter to be admitted to the coasting trade of the United States.

GENERAL DOMESTIC ITEMS.

The British minister in Washington has received from the British subscribers to the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the Chicago fire the sum of £2,000, contributed by English subscribers.

Governor Geary's message to the Pennsylvania Legislature, by the State House of Representatives, and will be put into effect at once.

C. C. Rowell, representative in Congress from South Carolina, has left Columbia, South Carolina, for Kansas. An Indian divorce is to be produced in his defense.

The Indian Council of Medicine Lodge, Kansas, was organized on the 11th inst. The chief subject of the council was to organize a Republican government embracing all the tribes. The plan is in contemplation with the Indians, and the Indian agent contemplates the production of the scheme at the next meeting, and is sure it can be executed with the consent of all.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The reports from the army of the Loire are conflicting. From French sources we have positive statements of victories, and from Prussian sources equally positive statements that the army of Prince Frederick Charles is steadily advancing in the direction of the entire line.

The left branch of the French government has established itself at Tours.

It is announced that the delay in the opening of the bombardment of Paris is occasioned by a lack of ammunition, and that the roads are so wet and heavy that more can be brought forward at present.

Montmedy and Pinckney, in the northeast of France, have been surrendered to the Prussians. The latter was occupied on the 12th inst.

Rudow has ratified the treaty of annexation to the German Confederation.

The Prussian troops are concentrating on the Turkish frontier, and Servia has announced the death of Prince Couza, and appointed a new embassador in Constantinople. Great Britain is said to be preparing against a surprise.

THE ENTENTE CORDIALE.—THE PRUSSIAN BUGBEAR IN THE PARK OF VERSAILLES.

SELLING FISH AT AUCTION IN PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 859.]

ALEXANDRE DAVY DUMAS.

THIS celebrated French dramatist and novelist, who died recently at Dieppe, was the son of General ALEXANDRE DAVY DUMAS, a soldier of distinction under the empire. He was born in Villers-Cotterets, July 24, 1803. His grandmother, on the father's side, was an African negro girl, and the characteristic features of the mulatto were presented in his thick lips and crisp, curly hair, though not in his complexion, which was white. He lost his father when about three years old, and was left very much to his own guidance in growing up. His education was consequently defective, and at the age of eighteen he seems to have learned little except to ride, fence, play billiards, and write a good hand. To the last accomplishment he owed his first position, that of copying clerk in the office of the secretary of the Duke of Orleans, afterward LOUIS PHILIPPE. This was the first stepping-stone in a long and successful career.

As an author, the popularity of DUMAS rivaled that of EUGENE SUE, and was not confined to France. He not only wrote with extraordinary facility, but employed a corps of assistants to fill up the details of plots which he furnished in outline. It is said he could dash off a play faster than three expert penmen could copy it. Previous to 1848 his pen procured him an income of 60,000 francs a year. In skillfulness of arrangement, vivacity of narrative and style, and fertility of invention, his novels surpass those of most of his contemporaries; but their moral effect is not elevating. The translations of his principal works have attained a wide circulation in this country, the most popular being the "Count of Monte Cristo," the "Three Guardsmen," "Twenty Years After," "Margaret of Anjou," and the "Memoirs of a Physician."

GURNEY & CO. AT HOME.

CHRISTMAS-EVE.

In Two Parts.—Part I.

JOHN GURNEY MUSING.

GURNEY PLACE.

It is twenty miles from the city, and three miles inland on the north side of the old road running from river to river. It is shut off from the road by a stone wall, surmounted in the olden time by iron spikes, which have long since rusted away. In the middle of this wall there is a large gate which opens on a circular drive, cut into ruts and littered with leaves. This drive is bordered by a hedge, which, no longer trimmed, thrusts its ragged limbs whither it will, greatly to the peril of flounces and long skirts, whenever such frivolities are at Gurney Place, which is not often. Thirty years ago the grounds were famous, and not without reason, for whatever money could do to make them beautiful it had done. The situation was perfect, and the taste which had embellished it was faultless. Wherever a grove should have been, there was the grove; and wherever a walk should have been, there was the walk. But the glory of Gurney Place, to my mind, is the great avenue of pines on the east of the house. It is carpeted with red needles, which slip, slip under the feet, and emit a faint fragrance, half of the balsamic branches from which they have fallen, and half of the rich earth into which they are mouldering. At the end of this stately avenue there is a rustic summer-house, perched on the edge of a slope leading to a lake, around which is a gravel path, edged, on the water side, with long rushes. Moored to a mimic pier is the remnant of a tiny pleasure-boat, in which young people once rowed about and gathered lilies. The sun has blistered and bleached it, and a turtle, built in it years ago, has reared her progeny on its leaky bottom. It is a lonesome place, this dreary little sheet of water, which scarcely ripples in the wind, and which drinks the light, as some men do wine, growing gloomier every moment. Every thing is gloomy at Gurney Place—every thing but the avenue of pines, which is grand, and the conservatory, which is beautiful the year through with rare flowers and plants. These are the only portions of the grounds which John Gurney loves, and, happen what may, these are always cared for. Of Gurney House he thinks but little, though others find it comfortable enough. It is an old-looking mansion, the general effect of which is ugly, though it is not without redeeming points. It is large, to begin with, and solidly built—a brick structure, with stone corners and facings at each end, projecting upon the curves of the drive. The sun shines into the windows of three wings all day—through the right wing in the forenoon, and through the left wing in the afternoon—but the rest of the house sleeps in a half light, the shadows of a row of elms and the shadow of the long colonnade in front. There are small doors in the ends of the wings, and a large, double door in the middle of the colonnade, opening, when it opens, on a broad hall paved with lozenge-shaped tiles. Each side of the hall there is a dark parlor, with windows reaching to the floor, and a high ceiling painted in fresco. The chimneys are large and deep, set in frames of carved oak under high narrow mantels, on the ends of which are silver candlesticks and pairs of silver snuffers on silver trays. For the furniture (if you have a taste that way), it would make the fortune of Marley, it is so massive and unique. There is no such mahogany now as John Gurney's, which is dark with age—transparently dark in its old polish, and as perfect as if it had just been sent home by its maker, who has been dead a hundred years. There are heavy sofas of it, ruffled with black horsehair, and chairs of the same with harp-backs, and more card-tables with claw legs than would be considered reputable now in a well-regulated country seat. Upon large buffets are decanters of noble size, sacred of yore to the generous juices of Spain and Portugal, with silver chains round their necks labeled "Madeira" and "Port." The floors are covered with Turkey carpets, costly in their time, and ugly at any time—disagreeable to the eye, but as soft to the foot as beds of forest moss.

THE LATE ALEXANDRE DAVY DUMAS.

The parlors of Gurney House are like most parlors in the country—cold, forbidding, inhospitable. It is enough to be shown into their eternal twilight; to live there would be intolerable.

The wings are more habitable, especially the left wing, which John Gurney has fitted up as a library, and in which he spends most of his time when at home. It is a cozy, comfortable room, with a bay-window facing the western sea, and a bright carpet, whose green and red berries are suggestive of endless summer. Around the walls are dwarf book-cases, and here are ranged specimens of old china, curious vases of fantastic patterns, bottles with long necks around which lizards are creeping, cups and saucers thin as egg-shells, puzzles in ivory, and boxes in jade-stone; and the effigies of squat little men, with prominent bellies and stiff pig-tails—peculiar in the leaves, and a threat of rain speedily—an afternoon which could only be brightened by a wood-fire and the light of happy memories. John Gurney had the blaze of the wood-fire as he leaned back in his easy-chair, but he had not the happy memories. He had been thinking, and was not satisfied with himself. Happy the man who is! But no such man exists, who can remember and feel. John Gurney could do both, and he was a hard man. So the world said, and he did not contradict it. It was a fact to him, but a fact of which he was no longer proud. He had been thinking, you see—thinking of his father and mother, who were dead, of his sisters, who were living, he supposed, and of himself—a cold, stern, implacable, disappointed man.

"YOU REFUSE TO RECEIVE YOUR DAUGHTER."

His father had died thirty years before, and left him the master of Gurney Place and the head of the house of Gurney & Co. It was an old firm and a wealthy, with connections the world over, but more largely than elsewhere in China and India. What merchandise passed through its hands I am not clerkly enough to state, but I suppose pagodas and rupees—I mean teas, silks, and muslins. The elder Gurney was a man of business, the younger Gurney was a merchant. He loved money, not for what it is—dross, but for what it can be—power. He was fond of power, and never steeled to use it; his enemies said to abuse it, I venture to think, wrongly. If he was strict in his dealings, he was just. He meant to be just always. That he had been so he began to doubt. It was certain, he admitted, that he had not been generous. Wherein had he failed?

He had two sisters, as I have hinted, of whom he was left the guardian by his father, who left them nothing in his will except his last blessing and what their brother might bestow upon them out of his love and regard. The elder, Judith, was an elderly lady of fourteen, the younger, Ann, was a little girl of nine. He educated them as if they had been his daughters, this stalwart bachelor of thirty, taking, so far as he could, their dead father's place, and demanding respect and obedience. They were well brought up, at least Judith was, for Ann neglected her books, her music, and her dancing. She was like her mother, a wee woman, with appealing black eyes that could be evasive when they would; and, like her mother, she was obstinate and demonstrated in a quiet way. Judith was an out-and-out Gurney, a tall blonde, with flaxen hair, pallid blue eyes, and the cunning of a veteran diplomatist. John Gurney made up his mind that they should marry well. He married Judith to money, as he supposed, and the match turned out badly. Ann married herself to nothing, as she knew, and the match turned out worse. One was now Mrs. Hugh Trevor, of Burlington Row; the other was Mrs. Ann Gaisnett, of Heaven knows where. Ten years had passed since brother John had seen sister Ann, and he had not seen sister Ann since her marriage, over twenty years ago. Was it well for relatives to be so estranged?

He woke that morning, earlier than usual, from a restless sleep and confused dreams. He was in a strange house, in a strange place, a boy in a nankeen suit trying in vain to amuse himself. He clambered up a chair and stared at the picture on the wall, which was divided into panels wherein huntsmen, with horns slung about their mouths, were leaping over hedges in chase of a fox always the same distance ahead. A low face-place was set round with painted tiles, wherein were men with long beards, and wonderful curious robes. A damsel was standing at a well, holding a pitcher on the lip of a rickety trestle, who had journeyed thither on a camel, and who held a bracelet concealed behind his back. A man was entangled in a thicket, near which an old man with a long knife stooped above a kneeling lad. Another lad crouched in a pit, on the edge of which was a hand of men, one holding a coat of many colors. Who were these people, and what were they doing? The boy soon tired of them, and crept up stairs, where he saw a lady walking to and fro with a sick baby. It cried, and cried, and was still. Standing with others in a church-and beside a grave, into which a little coffin was being lowered, he woke suddenly in the act of tearing away from his father's hand.

It was late when John Gurney made his appearance at the breakfast-table, and he was haggard and pale. He sat down mechanically, while the old housekeeper, Martha, poured out a cup of coffee for him. Would he have an egg? No, he thanked her. So she left him to himself.

The coffee was weak, the toast was cold; he had no appetite. He leaned his head on his hand, and thought of the many mornings he had breakfasted there at the same solitary, dismal fashion; and this morning, many mornings he had breakfasted there with his family. He shut his eyes and saw them as of old—his father seated where he was sitting, a cheerful, bounty man; his mother opposite, smiling over the coffee-urn and the teapot; his sisters on her right and left—Judith with flaxen ringlets, and Ann with wavy black hair; and last, himself, young John Gurney, handsome, vigorous, alert. They chatted together, he and his father, of the weather, the crops, the new horses, while his mother prattled in her light way, telling Judith that she was looking pretty, which she was, and Ann that she was a little fright, which she wasn't at all. This was thirty-five years ago, and what a dream to John Gurney, as he opened his eyes, and found himself alone, an oldish man, with a bad liver, and a worse heart! Bah! He rang the bell and Martha reappearing, he asked her to tell Tom to harness up, for he was going to the city.

He must get away from Gurney Place, or from himself.

The carry-all was led up to the door, and he stepped in beside his man, Tom Watkins, whose business it was to drive him to and from the dépôt and the pier.

"Which way this morning, Sir?"

"To the pier."

He spoke so impatiently that Tom gave the horse a sharp cut with the whip, and cast a furtive glance in his master's face. "Something has gone wrong," he thought; "maybe his breakfast; any how, I won't mind him. How old he looks!" And then, aloud,

"'As rone the glass
Mark life doth pass.'"

"And you're an ass" (he spoke testily), "with your Catechism, and your 'Poor Richard.' I hate proverbs."

"I love 'em" (defiantly); "they are the sayings of the wise."

"Of fools; for the wise are not always sneering."

"Ain't they, though? What do you make of King Solomon?"

But John Gurney made nothing of King Solomon; for, if he heard, he did not answer. He was in a brown study. "How ill he looks!" thought Tom. And he added, this time to himself,

"'Here to-day and gone to-morrow;'
This is the end of human sorrow."

What was John Gurney thinking of? I doubt whether he could have told, he was thinking of so many people, among others of a woman, Ruth and Gurney, who once united as a mate for Gurney & Co., and who stole away the heart of sister Ann while she was a mere child. A young fellow of twenty-four, or thereabout, he was invited to Gurney Place to dinner—was expected for any one to whom employ of Gurney & Co. He was a little awed at first by the splendor of the dinner—a circumstance which existed him in the estimation of John Gurney; but the conversation turning on the sea, he was soon at home. He was a good sailor, and he showed it in a modest, manly fashion, which John Gurney thought well of, and which Ann Gurney thought better of. They walked, after dinner, in the twilight, John and Judith to the conservatory, and herself and Mr. Garnett to the summer-house in the garden. When they parted at the door at dusk—he to return to the city, and she to save a child's candle-light—she was in love with the young mate. If he was in love with her, he kept it to himself, as was proper for a person in his condition of life. This drifted through John Gurney's mind as he was driven to the pier, and it made him somewhat unfortable. He had liked Richard Garnett as a mate, but when, two years later, Captain Garnett married his sister without his consent, he hated him. He would not see him, and he would not see his wife, who in four years was a widow with two children. "She has made her bed, and must lie in it."

He spoke aloud, to his own surprise.

"There is but one bed where we lie quietly, and that is in the marriage bed," he said, very low, to himself, gravely, and gave the horse another cut with the whip. They came in sight of the pier just in time to see the boat moving away.

"Turn round and drive back; I shall not go to the city to-day."

"Looks like it," Tom muttered.

"But who can tell, when the arrow is shot, Whether 'twill hit the mark or not."

John Gurney alighted from the carry-all at the door, and, summoning Martha to have a fire built in the library, wandered up and down the grounds, noting this and that absently. The morrow was crumbling out of the wall; the box was heaped with leaves; the currant-bushes were dead. Cones were beginning to ripen on the pine walk; he must see Tom Watkins about that; and, stooping stiffly, he picked one up and tossed it into the lake. The sun sparkled coldly from the white sky; the air was chill and damp, like the air of a vault. Dead leaves rattled under him; dead leaves rustled around him:

"And when a leaf fa's I may lip,
I'll tell a word true thou."

Was John Gurney in his dotage that he should hum an old song? or was he recalling a fair young girl who sang it to him one moonlight night, how many years ago? She shall look, perhaps, into some of the darkened rooms in heart, but there is one into which we must not look. Every man has his secret, and this is John Gurney's. He shuttered up his each room with a shiver, and hurried into the house.

He left it no more that day, but shut himself up in the library, where a chop was sent to him at noon, where he smoked cigars and drank brandy, and where he persuaded himself that he was reading and writing. He commenced a letter, but, dropping his pen a moment to look out of the window, he forgot all about it. He ran the pages of a review as far as the contents; they were not attractive. He took up a book at noon threw it down as "stuff." Then he went to his bookshelves, and returned with another, never guess with what—an armful of the English poets. That he loved poetry, as he did, is a fact for which I can give more account than any of Kitty Weiss in the Alps, and the presence in its frozen neighborhood of swarms of tourists testifies. He was in him, as love, I suppose, was in him once, and as self-accusation was in him now. What he sought in the poets was not their happy inspirations; not such divine little songs as stud the old dramatists, nor such gleams of spring and summer as light the pages of Chaucer and Spenser; but grave and solemn pieces, like Milton's "Lycedas," Bishop King's "Exequy," and Gray's "Elegy." The death of lovers, the parting of friends, the shadow that will never be lifted from mortality.

He smoked, and read:

"Alas! they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth;
And constancy dwells in realms above;
And life is thorny; and youth is vain:
And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain.
And thus it chanced, as I divine,
With Roland and Sir Leoline.
Each spoke words of high disdain
And insult to his friend's brother:
They parted—never to meet again,
But never either found another
To free the hollow heart from pairing;
They stood aloof, scared as by fear
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder:
A dreary sea now flows between;
But neither heat nor frost nor thunder
Shall wholly do away, I ween,
The marks of that which once hath been."

Surely this was and enough for John Gurney. He seemed to think so, for he shut the book hastily, and read no more, but walked to the couch, put on fresh wood, and, drawing the decanter of brandy toward him, sat down again. It was not his habit to drink brandy, but there are days when it does one good. So he thought, or he would not have drunk it. It did him no good, however, to-day; and no ghost which haunted him, lulled him into no happy reverie. It did not warm his blood, even, as he nodded over the fire with his feet on the fender. He watched the blaze as it flickered up the chimney, listening to the gusty arms that were blustering, flicking on the andirons and the hearth-rug; and out of the light and the shadow a picture was shaped in his mind, distant and vague as a dream, but too near and painful not to be a reality. He saw a room furnished as he knew in his own morning-room, a trim brig, with sails all a-taut, and a man in the cabin kissing his hand to a woman on the wharf, who was crying and waving her handkerchief. Northward sped the brig, with a favoring wind; but, though he watched it, the sea rose before it—the wild, dark sea, where the billow never ceases to sing. Here the sun shone fitfully, where the moon glimmered, where danger and death waited. He, on, day and night, in his cabin dashing against the bow; on, on, night after night, with a light on the stern to show the wave in the storm, the window of the captain's cabin. He is on deck one night—the captain is—one dark and furior night. There is a crashing sound, a thick rigging, the sails strain, the sky grows color and colder. What are they driving on so fast—a steep, mountainous coast? The brig is driving so fast on them? An iceberg! It topples suddenly, and crushes her; and a wild cry goes through the sea;

some very sharp ones. But, forgive me, Judith"—he paused gravely—"forgive me if I do not trust entirely to appearances. A plain business man, I doubt the substantiality of these sudden fortunes. This house, for instance—I fear it is mortgaged."

He seemed to expect her to answer, and it was evident to her that she should answer—but how? If she said the house was mortgaged, their prosperity would not appear so real as she wished; and if she said it was not mortgaged, it would appear too real. She was in a dilemma.

"There was a small mortgage on it at first, but I believe it has been taken up. I'll learn, since you wish to know. You are very, very kind. But tell me now of yourself; for, selfish woman that I am, I have babbled all this while of my own poor affairs. You are looking happier, better even than you look, and as busy, of course, as of old. The firm of 'Gurney & Co.' Percy says, is the synonym of success. And Percy, I forgot to mention that Percy, who has not seen you since his was seven, remembers you more distinctly than John. Percy is the only one in the family who will never bear a word against 'Uncle John.' We abuse you, that is, of course we do, and roundly; for, if we can't abuse our relations, whom can we abuse, pray? But Percy won't allow it. 'Uncle John was kind to us once,' he says, 'and if he has dropped us now, is in our own hands.' You must like Percy, Cousin."

Mrs. Trevor! Mrs. Trevor! you know that Percy never said any thing of the kind. You know he did any was. "He was useful to us once, and may be again." How can you fib so?

"Gurney & Co.," Judith, pray on quietly. Never a fast firm, we are growing slow as we grow old. The house, I suppose, will be with you, Mrs. Trevor?"

"My head? Why not take a partner?"

"We are not rich enough to tempt a young man, and as for old men, one is surely enough."

"It is telling the truth when he says he is not rich?" she ordered; "or does he think I was about to recommend Hugh to him again?" She paused for a reply from her. "If your remark about old men had any reference to Trevor, you are right; but he was not in my mind when I spoke. I assure you. It seemed to me a pity that such a house as ours should go down. But so it is, so it is. We must all, John, do your nephews more seriously? Of the grave, I mean, and hereafter. Do you remember the hymn mother taught us when we were children?

"'The day is past and gone,
The evening shades appear;
Oh, may we all remember well
The night of death draws near.'"

"Yes, Judith; and, strange to say, it came into my head the last thing last night. I had been thinking of mother and father, and you and John."

So that was what had sent him to her!

"Dear mother!" she sighed.

"Yes, sister," he resumed, "I have begun to think of these things, and shall put my affairs in order."

"Make your peace first, and attend to your affairs afterward. But excuse me for a few minutes; I hear the door-bell ring. You know I am 'at home.'" And she withdrew.

It was only Judith in a new dress, a brunette study, occasionally stopping to look at the pictures and objects of vertu.

"I don't think Judith is as mercenary as she was. Her last advice was good—from her point of view. I would not have thought she could be so disinterested. We shall get on well together, I hope. I don't know what to do for her, though. If his house is really Trevor's, and in no need of help from me, and, even if he were, I could not give it to him outright; for, first and last, he has muddled away a hundred thousand of mine. He's always muddling away something or other. If he would go into the army now I would settle it, and as much more, on Judith. It would be a set-off against the money of which I have been juggled. I wonder if she wouldn't like a set of diamonds?"

Whether Mrs. Trevor heard the bell, as she said, or whether it was her fancy, is of no great consequence. It is enough for us to know that no person was at the front parlor when she entered it, which rather pleased her than otherwise, since it gave her an opportunity to see what had just occurred between herself and her brother. "How unfortunate it is," she said, "that I couldn't know that he was coming; and how unfortunate that we are prosperous! He would have done something handsome for me, for it is certain that he isn't satisfied with the way he has used me. He must be very much changed, or he wouldn't have said that he no longer cared for money. When a Gurney feels like that, his end is near! He hasn't made his will, it seems, he is deceiving me, and I don't believe he is. He may remember the children. He must; I mean to bring it about. But how—how? I can't ask him to leave Elizabeth any thing; he'll think Percy can make sure of himself, and I won't give him the excuse for saying so. Stupid of me! I could cry my eyes out with rage." But she thought better of it; for, reaching the window of her robe, she rejoined her brother with a sweet, and, smiling face.

Drawing an easy-chair up to the fire she made him sit down, and placed herself on his left, where she could see him best. "Is it well, now, you to come!" she exclaimed; "and how sorry I am that none of the children are at home!

"You are fond of your children, Judith?"

"Fond is not the word, John. But I can not expect a man to understand the feelings of a mother. No man can—least of all a hard-headed bachelor like you. I wonder—no, I do not, either, for you never liked women, I remember."

"Perhaps I am cured of that—who knows?"

"What did he mean? Was he— But no, it could not be.

"By-the-way, John, how did you know I was 'at home' to-day?"

"How does any body know any thing now, except from the newspapers, which tell us every thing that happens, and a great many things that do not happen. I read it in The Tickler and Tattler. But your speaking of being 'at home' reminds me that we shall be 'at home' ourselves soon. I will send you a card to-morrow or next day."

"John Gurney, you have not been getting married?"

A queer smile flitted across his face: he enjoyed her mistake.

"Why not? I am old enough, I suppose."

"Too old—to make such a fool of yourself."

At this moment the bell rang, and so loudly that both heard it: a sudden, hurried peal.

She was on her feet at once.

"Some one will let me tell you about it. Last summer, when I was ill—and I was very ill, Judith—I think I shall never recover the shock of old Wyman's death."

"Where's mamma?" cried a voice without.

"In the back parlor, my lady," the servant was heard to answer.

A rush of steps to the door, which was thrown open violently. "Mamma! mamma!"

"Lady Onslow! Elizabeth," said Mrs. Trevor, starting to her feet, "how you have frightened me, child!"

John Gurney arose, somewhat startled, and was presented to the new-comer.

"I didn't know you had company."

"It's only your uncle John. You remember Uncle John?"

"No—do I?"

"So this is little Lizzy that was," he said, coming forward: "the bud has indeed ripened. I hope you are well, Lady Onslow."

She looked at him, and at her mother, and burst into tears—wild, passionate tears, that could not be suppressed.

"For God's sake, Elizabeth, what is the matter? Why are you here? Where is Lord Onslow?"

"Tell me, tell you what has happened, Judith," interposed John Gurney. "You have married your daughter to an adventurer. Am I not right, Lizzy?"

She bowed sadly. "Worse, Sir—a villain. Set here, mother." And drying her eyes, she pointed to black and blue spots on her arm, which were evidently the grip of strong fingers. "He struck me, and I forgave him. I—I—he was drunk."

"The more fool you," remarked her mother.

"I loved him, and I forgave him." She paused, and put her hand to her head as if she had been stunned by something. "We were staying in Washington this week, quietly and happily, planning what we should do when we returned home. I was, that is, and he agreed to it. Night before last I retired early, while he was playing billiards with some of the officers. When I awoke in the morning he had not returned. He had abandoned me."

"Have you finished, fool?" demanded her mother.

"Judith!"

"No; he robbed me of my jewels, and all the money he could find. He would have taken my purse, I suppose, but it was under my pillow. There was enough in it to bring me home.

"Is the story without a text or a title. She was the calmest person there—so calm that she seemed to have been relating the wrongs of some other, not her own. Mrs. Trevor, your woman, was in a furious passion, enraged with her daughter, her brother, Judith herself, with the whole body and every thing. Speechless with fury and shame, she appeared to have grown old suddenly; the bloom had withered from her cheeks, the lustre was gone from her eyes. They had become gray and faded.

"So," she whispered, when she found a voice, "this is the reward of all my motherly care, the object of all my ambition! This is what you have done? You have ruined me. I shall never dare to hold up my head again. We shall have to leave the neighborhood—to shun all our acquaintances. I shall die with shame."

"And I, mother?" asked the poor girl.

"Mother me no more; you are no child of mine."

"Judith!"

"What brought you here? Do you think I will have you here, Lady Onslow?"

"Judith, Judith—you are brutal."

"Mind your business, John Gurney—this is mine.

"Where shall I go, mother?"

"Where you will. You shall not remain here."

"You refuse to receive your daughter, then, Judith?" said John Gurney, looking his sister sternly in the face.

"I do."

"You are a wicked woman."

He turned toward his niece in his stately way, looking like what he was—the soul of chivalry and kindness.

"My child, I am a lonesome old man. Will you not share and brighten my solitude? Say 'yes'—I wish it so much." He opened his arms, and she rushed toward him with a cry. He smoothed the ripples of her hair with one hand, and brushed a tear from his eye with the other.

"Come," he said at last.

"Good-by, mother."

"Good-morning, Mrs. Trevor."

Where was Mrs. Trevor's heart? where was Mrs. Trevor's conscience? where was Mrs. Trevor's worldliness, even—that day? Percy out "at home."

VENICE.

UNLIKE other celebrated towns of Italy—such as Padua, Mantua, Naples, and Rome itself—Venice is not an old classical city. According to the best historians it dates from the 25th day of March, in the year of our Lord 421, when Simon de Gloucestshire, Antonius Calvus, and other lovers of liberty, who sought a refuge from oppression among the islands and lagoons of the coast, laid the foundations of the new commonwealth on the Rialto, the nearest island to the embouchure of the Brenta. The state of which they were the founders had a long and for many centuries a very prosperous existence. Under a nominal subjection to Padua and other cities of old Venetia it passed its first two hundred and seventy-six years. For the following six hundred years, during which it made great additions to its power and wealth, Venice was governed by her doges—a sort of monarchs whom the people elected, and whose power they limited. After that, and during the last five hundred years of her existence, she was really and practically governed by her nobles. Then came the end. France, ever ready to seize on other territories, had, by the new-born law of Lynch-down, deposed the last doge by the hands of her great general, Napoleon Bonaparte, and, while lifting his sceptre, was in their gain most likely to spread and lofty bearing of other days, not less than one-fourth part of her inhabitants are so poor as to be more or less dependent on public charity. What a fall is there from the days of Dandolo, Zeno, Foscarini, about the middle of the fifteenth century, composed these immortal lines touching Venice:

"Neptune saw Venice on the Adria stand
Prize as a rock, and all the sea command.
'Thanks, Thanks, O Jove,' he cried, 'Rome's walls extend Not half so far.'

Or that proud cliff whence false Tarpeia fell?
Great Tiber hears, view how the Rialto swells!
That men did those, gods these foundations lay."

These verses give us a good idea of the ancient glory of Venice, and that of the wealth and magnificence of her citizens, that the poet received—the reigning critical literature, in the form of poetry or prose, ever won—for these six lines six thousand golden crowns. But low as she has fallen, Venice can no have passed the lowest ebb-tide of her fortunes. Since the Austrian was driven from Italy forever, since she has united in the new-born liberties of Italy, since the Gospel, banished in the days of her degeneracy, is now taught and preached and practised there, and her people are learning that "whom the truth shall make free they shall be free indeed," good reason to hope that this city will yet be the subject and the scene of a great, glorious, and most beautiful resurrection.

With graceful towers, domes, campaniles, and palaces standing in rich contrast with the low shoreless waters, and now with the tide on every door-step, and, carrying boats and gondolas in place of coaches and carriages, for its four-fifths and almost its only streets, the city might have owed its name—though it had a different origin—to the old Roman legend that represents Venus, the goddess of love and beauty, as born of the ocean. Venice looks like a city torn by some great convulsion from the shore, and, with all its churches, palaces, manufactories, and business establishments erect and entire, floated to sea, and securely anchored to its sandy bed. Save dogs and cats, there is no four-footed animal in all the town—no horses, nor cows, nor even a donkey. Wheels are unknown; their grinding, rattling noise never heard where sheets of water, along which gondolas, in place of cabs and omnibuses, are shooting with their passengers, separate opposite neighbors, the houses on one side of the street from those on the other. A very pretty city, indeed! since, with the houses built on piles that have been driven into the bed of the sea, there, as has been said, we stood on the top of trees.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SAID a loving wife to her husband: "Will you never learn to see the difference between real and exchangeable value?" "The husband, tired of political economy, replied, "Ah yes, my dear, I know your great learning and many virtues. That's your real value; but I have also that none of my friends would change wives with me. That's your exchangeable value."

A gentleman, speaking of the happiness of the married state before his daughter, disparagingly said, "She who marries will rue it," but she who does not marry, does better." "Well, then," said the young lady, "I will do so!; let those who choose do better."

The man whose feet were so enormously large that he had to pull his pantaloons on over his head has recently joined the woman's rights party, and is very determined to wear a sheath.

A traveler in Georgia, down among the rice swamps, observing the sallow, sunken-eyed, emaciated appearance of the inhabitants, asked one of them what the matter was unhealthy. "Wa'al, no," replied the sickly looking fellow; "ain't nothin' pertickler, only we have the fever and ague all the time in these parts; but then we've got a powerful sight of medicine for health, which beats the ague all to nothing!"

Hide-plus are now called switch-tenders.

WEATHER RHYMES.

February fill dyke,
Be it black or be it white;
But if it is white,
It is better to like.

March winde and April showres
Bring out the May flowres.

He who sees his wheat on a weeping May
Will himself go weeping away;
But he who sees it on a weeping June
Will go weep to another tune.

When the sand doth feed the clay,
Laughing sun will soon be gay;
But when the clay doth feed the sand,
Then 'tis well with Argyle Land.

A swarm of bees in May
Is worth a load of hay;
A swarm of bees in June
Is worth a silver spoon;
But a swarm of bees in July
Is not worth a fly.

After St. Bartlemew
Come long evenings and cold dew.

At a wedding the other day one of the guests, who had partaken rather freely of champagne, gravely remarked that he have often remarked that there have been more wet men than wet days this year."

A Low Fee—Cabelle.

A Dutchman, in describing a span of horses which he had lost, said: "Dey wash very much alike, specially de off one. One looks as much like both, I could not tell todder from which; when I went after de one I always took de todder; an I whipped de one most dead because de oder kicked at me."

A Hive to Millidge—Enough on that bend.

An exchange says: "Marriage makes a man and woman happy." So, but the bachelor can't be blind to them in the one.

Stammering, says Coleridge, is sometimes the cause of wit, the struggle to say something, in laughs producing the happiness of the Duke of Cumberland, and causing the Duchess from rushing up to embrace her, when she had not seen her for a considerable time, and insisted on her receiving him in state. "How dreadful, my dear," said the Duchess, "you've got Lamb, in his stuttering way; "but you know he is the best Cumberland."

A man in a crowd found elbow-room quickly by telling a neighbor that he was sitting on his revolver.

An exchange says: "The competitors in San Francisco are many ladies." The competitors in San Francisco ought to be ashamed of themselves.

An English writer thinks the American sixty pounder is too large to go and see long, for as each new vacation is planned the season shows itself earlier than any other, the time between planting and digging will soon be cut up.

There is a man in Dorchih, Iowa, so penurious that when shelling corn, and a kernel flew into a woodhole, he immediately went down after it. So did his neighbor, standing near, dropped a kernel near his, and so speedier was looking. He stood and watched it he said: "You can't fool me with that small kernel; the next I lost was a large one."

Why is a butcher's cart like his boots?—Because he carries his calves there.

MANAGER A. (to actress)—"How do you manage your hair, Miss Crocker?" Such a job as I have of it, honestly, Mr. Manager." "Indeed! then why don't you have it switch backward when you want him to go forward. For instance, you see, to-day I had a load of rake to make. Well, do you suppose because my daddy is in for nasty—cuss that my scold need be there, too? Not a bit of it. I am thinking of all sorts of things all the time I am raking, and I never say a single cussed word at my heels, and bringing me plump down, in a heap, on the ground. Now you see, it's the price of the sugar I'm using."

Mr. Jones was trying to write up his morning, and saw the furious stye, when I know I had him on my knee, and wondered I managed right; so I told him that I hoped he would get out to catch his death soon; whether that if he wasn't capable of taking care of himself, I should do it for him; that it was very lonesome rainy days, and that I wanted him to stay at home and talk with me; at my rate he mustn't go out; and I hid his umbrella and India rubbers. Well, he was quite right and up I got as I expected, and in less than ten minutes was streaking down street in the rain of two heads of hair. Now you see nothing like understanding human nature; my woman should be married life she is thoroughly posted up in this branch of her education."

A FRIEND IN NEED.

A REVERIE.

THE CHILDREN'S STOCKINGS.

(ON CHRISTMAS-EVE.)

HE will see sweet stockings cramming and now,
Warm in scarlet and dainty in white—
Stockings that never have crept in a shoe—
Waiting his morning's enchanted light.

And other glad stockings, that he should know,
Grown larger, perhaps, than they were last year!
In many a pretty, half-shoppy way
They wonder, no doubt, if he is near.

This Saint of the Children, who loves them so,
Faintly filling each colored store,
Will touch clear dreams with his kiss—and go
With them, I think, in his heart before.

Ah! spite of his fare, he will shiver, I fear,
At the thought of stockings, bright and small,
Whose curious looks are no longer left,
Awake for him by the lonesome wall!

Oh! you whose little hands reach no more
Toward his gray, kind beard in the mingled play,
Whose little feet passed through the great dim Door,
With never a step nor a sound, away!

Have you found Another who lights with love
His Birthday Tree for your charmed eyes?
Do you sit in its branches the snow-white Dove?
Is it fair with the flowering and fruit of the skies?
MRS. G. M. B. PIATT.

BRED IN THE BONE.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Owen-dale's Harvest," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XLVI.

CURTIUS.

RICHARD had many subjects for thought to beguile his lonely way to Gretna, but one so paramount, and absorbed the rest, though he strove to dismiss it all he could.

He endeavored to think of his dead mother. His heart was full of her patient love and weary, childless life: but her portrait faded from his mind like a dissolving view, and in its place stood that of Solomon Cox, hugged, emaciated, hideous. Still less could he think of Harry and his future, whose schemes and himself this spectre of the unburied man rose up at once, annihilated by the thought of them, as by a spell. It did not occur to Richard even now that he had had no right to kill him; but he shuddered to think, if he had really done so, how this late opening flower of love which he had just unfolded would blossom into fear and loathing. In that case his heart would have been poisoned at the root as he pierced. His mother's death, the knowledge of Harry's fidelity, and of the existence of his son, to whom his affection had been estranged at his delay. It was his hope, for a certain reason, that he would NR arrive until the body was stiff and cold.

He saw Richard first, of course. The case was very serious; so much so that he thought it right to mention the fact, in order that his patient might settle his worldly affairs if they needed settlement.

"There is no immediate danger, my good lad; but it is always well in such cases to have the mind free from anxiety."

"I understand; it is quite right," said Richard, gravely. "Moreover, since the opportunity may not occur again, let me now state how it all happened."

"Nay, you must not talk. We know it all, or at least enough of it for the present."

"What do you know?" asked Richard, with his eyes half shut, but with eager ears.

"That in your benevolent attempt to seek after Mr. Coe you met with the same accident—though I trust it will not have the same endings as that unfortunate gentleman himself. He pitched upon his head and broke his neck, which you fell upon your side."

"That is so," murmured Richard. "He and I were partners, you see—"

"There, there; not a word more," insisted the doctor; "your deposition can wait."

And leaving those what he could for his patient, he left him, in order to examine the unfortunate Solomon. His investigation corroborated all that he had already learnt of the circumstances of his death, with which also Richard's evidence accorded. An observation made by one of the men who had found the body, to the effect that it was yet warm when they had come upon it, excited the surgeon's curiosity.

"It is now Tuesday morning, my friend," said he, "and this poor fellow met with his death on Saturday night for certain. He must have died before, have been much warmer when you found him than he is now."

"Well, me and my mate here we both fancied—"

"I dare say you did, my man," interrupted the doctor; "and fancy is a very proper word to apply to such an impression. If you had any evidence, however, you will not repeat such a piece of evidence when put upon your oath, for the thing is utterly impossible."

"Then I suppose we be in the wrong," said Dick to Jack; and on that supposition they left it.

In this way self-confident Science, whose mission it is to explode fallacies, occasionally assists in the confirmation or sufficiency of facts. Solomon Coe had not been dead half an hour when his body was found.

When Richard came on his errand of mercy, was approaching the brink of the third level, he could hear Solomon calling lustily for help. "Help it was not only "Help!" but "Murder!" that he cried out: and notwithstanding the menace that that word implied toward himself, Richard, stupified, on, well pleased to hear it; the vigor of the cry assured him that his enemy was yet alive living, but unhurt. As the light he carried grew more distinct to him, indeed, these shouts redoubled; but when it came quite near and disclosed the features of its bearer, there was a dead silence. The man was stood confronting him or other—the one in light, distinctly seen, looking down upon the other in shade, just as they had parted only eight-and-forty hours ago. The face of them, as we know, this space had been eventful; but to the other it had seemed a lifetime—an age of hopes and fears, and latterly of cold despair, which had now been warmed once more to hope only to freeze again. How was not this man, to whom he had looked for aid, his cruel foe come back to taunt him?—to behold him already half-way toward death, and to watch his slow approach more bitter. But great as was his agony Solomon held his peace, reserved to this monarch of his fate the tribute of a groan.

"I am come to rescue you," said Richard, in low but distinct tones; "so much do I feel that I have already done, although it was no less than you deserved, the sin of overpowering the kindness you. In return you will doubtless denounce me as having meant to murder you."

No answer. If Richard had not heard his cries, it would have seemed that this poor wretch had lost the power of speech. His face, which had drooped upon his shoulder, and he leaned against the rocky wall as though his limbs could not have otherwise supported themselves. "I am afraid indeed—but was it with weakness or with hate?—as though he had the palsy.

"What you will have reason to do so," continued Richard, calmly, "for I did mean to murder you. In two minutes hence you will find yourself among your neighbors, free to act as you please. I shall make no appeal to your mercy; I ask, I know, no act of kindness so was yours to mine the other day; but if you abstain from molesting me, this mine, with all its buried treasure, shall be your own. I have nothing more to say."

Solomon answered nothing. "Perhaps," thought Richard, "he still doubts me.—Well, here is the ladder"; and he raised the article in question. Solomon's great hand flew out from his side, and clutched a rung as a dog's teeth close upon a bone; a dog's growl, too, half suppressed half threat, came from his deep chest; then he began slowly to ascend, keeping his eyes fixed on his rival. The latter drew back a little to give him space, and watched him with folded arms.

"Now," said Solomon, stepping off the ladder with the prolonged "Ha!" of one who breathes freely after long oppression, "it is my turn!"

"What are you about to do?" asked Richard, calmly.

"What you think we are quits. Richard Yorke, do you? or at least that when I had seen you hung it would seem so to me? You don't know what it is to die here slowly in the dark; you are about to learn that."

"Indeed."

"Yes. You complained the other day of my having used the law against you. Well, you shall not have to reproach me with that a second time. We are about to change places, you and I, that's all. You shall keep sentry down yonder till Death comes to relieve you, and unbeknown to you to venture here alone to dictate terms, my friend."

Solomon's voice was grating and terrible; it had grown hoarse with calling. His face was gaunt and pinched with hunger; his eyes flashed like those of a ravening beast of prey.

"I swear to you I came here to rescue you, and with no treacherous intent," said Richard, earnestly. "I was not afraid of you when you were hale and strong, and much less now that you are weakened and helpless; but I do not wish to have your blood upon my hands. I came here to help you."

"Is it help?" interrupted the other, eagerly. "I did not know that it was right; how should I, in this place, where there is no law? Well, that was still more indiscreet of you, for I shall get away unseen, while you lie here unsought."

"Your scheme is futile. There are fifty men about the pit's mouth now. I have told them—"

"Lies!" interrupted Solomon, with a shriek, and, throwing away the torch, as though disdaining to use any advantage in the way of weapon, grappled with him at once. At the touch of his foe his scruples vanished, and his hate returned with tenfold force. But he was no match for a giant. Privation had doubtless weakened Solomon's limbs, but it had not touched his iron sinews; and his rage supplied him for the time with all that he had lost. They clung to one another like two wild beasts, without uttering a word of defiance. Whichever fell underfoot was a dead man; but neither fell. For a few seconds the flickering torch still showed them each other's hot, vindictive faces; then they battled in the dark, with blowing breath and straining limbs, which only knew Not whither. At last the huge weight of Solomon overbore his lesser antagonist. He fell, and his hands were beneath him; and as he fell, but fell through space; for in their gyrations they had approached the unfenced edge of the top of the ladder. His foe, fast clutched, fell with him, but, pitching on his head, was killed, and the body of Solomon Coe fell alone.

This was the true history of what had occurred in the mine, as Richard, on his pallet in pain, recalled it step by step, and strove to shape it to his ends.

FISH AT AUCTION.

LIKE every other article of food in Paris, fresh-water fish has become scarce, and brings exorbitant prices. The practice is to dispose of it by auction, as shown in the illustration on page 852; and the excitement, says a letter from Paris, that will be given to the sale, and the bids of the dozen gudgeons—which will be eventually knocked down, the one at five-and-twenty francs and the other at seven-and-twenty—are positively tremendous: the screaming and shouting and struggling among rival buyers, the excitement at the commencement of the siege, when a cargo of Dutch cheeses, the owner of which was unknown, had been handed over by order of the government to the Halles factors for sale by auction, and such a disturbance ensued that the police were obliged to suspend the sale, and to call in armed National Guards to clear the market-place.

THE KING OF SPAIN.

WHEN, by the "bloodless revolution," PRIM and his colleagues upset the old BOURBON rule, there was great chatter of spirit among the republicans, and their language filled the air with fire; but the thing was not against the system, but against the dynasty. The country was swept clear of the old rulers with startling suddenness, and PRIM, instead of trying new forms and making a new system in the place of the old, took up the old. The thing was to get a king. The General undertook to make him, and he has done so, and has been trying desperately ever since, but "for some time" "couldn't quite succeed." His failures were many. He tried Spain, Portugal, to Germany, to Italy; he tried schoolboys and old men; those with and those without the power. Princes who were popular were not willing, and all the time there were the republicans and Carlists and Montpensierists ready to be at his throat—trying it now and then—the BOURBONS mildly intriguing in Paris, and the Emperor of the French watching his every move intensely, but quietly hinting objections which were always decided to success.

At last, however, General PRIM has justified his title of "king-maker," and the king whom he has produced is one who will be a BOURBON no longer; but there were difficulties in the way then as there are now, and considerable risk. The DUKE OF AOSTA, whose portrait we give on page 861, the second son of the King of Italy, was not the first candidate on the list after the throne, and he doubtless felt some reluctance to pronouncing his election. The Cortes, in spite of a desperate republican resistance, accepted the candidate by what, in the divided state of the country, must be considered a large majority, and the house of Savoy reigns in Spain as well as in Italy.

King AMADEUS was born on the 30th of May, 1845, and was married in 1867 to FERDINANDE MARIE, daughter of PRINCE CHARLES EMANUEL DEL POZZO DELLA CISTERNA, by whom he has several children, one a son, born since the vote of the Cortes. He is very popular in his own country, having the virtues of his house, bravery and frankness, and without those faults which are said to have at times somewhat dimmed his father's popularity. The house of Savoy is essentially representative of constitutional government. The present king's position, then, is assured, so far as such a thing can be. The new king, if not a man of brilliant parts, is honest, and will be loyal to all that is needed, and we may therefore hope that under the new dynasty Spain may recover some of her former grandeur and prosperity, emulating Italy in her task of regeneration.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

In no country, perhaps, is Christmas so universally observed and so much enjoyed as in Germany. In the "old country" it is a family festival, to which young and old, and poor, look forward with intense delight. For weeks before preparations are made for its coming, and when at last the eventful morning has arrived grown folks and children are all ready to begin the enjoyments with which they are accustomed to observe the day. Every house has its Christmas-tree, which is the object of the most attentive regard, and we forgotten in the distribution of gifts; the servants are as sure to share in the general hilarity as the children of the household. It is a mistake with the Germans that every body must be happy on this day. The poor are not overlooked, and in every district of the public schools receive a gift from the public authorities. The day is observed with religious punctuality. From one end of Germany to the other it is a welcome interruption to the routine of scattered families, and the strengthening of social and domestic ties. We can, then, imagine what bitter disappointment awaits in Germany when home-ties, now that Christmas is just at hand, and future, brothers, husbands, and sons are far away, and exposed to the vicissitudes of war. Nay, more; with what sorrow and heart-sinking sensations of widows and fatherless children remember, on the coming Christmas-eve, how vacant places will be left, and how many cannot be filled by the beloved ones! The thought of the great increase of suffering caused by the European war will tempt many prominent incidents to Christmas, and incline the hearts of all to charity.

Certain classes in England are becoming very restless under their present political disabilities. The "Reform League" recently held a large meeting in London, at which bitter speeches were made, contrasting the position of the country—there being 127,860 paupers in London alone—to the wealth of the Queen, who "owns 400,000 a year, besides a million more from the royal family." An appeal is made to the entire people, because not only the "working men" are disfranchised, but they should supersede "the present cumbersome and ruinous system of government by the establishment of a republic."

The Prussians caught a Parisian balloon the other day. One which had been successfully used in the siege was provided with a new car. The passengers—mostly wealthy foreigners—had assembled, the purse money was paid, when, by some misunderstanding, the balloon was overturned by a gust of wind, and, dropping down the boulevard, it ascended by Berlin, and was totally lost to Paris, as it eventually fell into the hands of the enemy.

Maine promises to harvest a much larger crop of ice this year than ever before, having been estimated that the Kennebec alone will yield no less than 250,000 tons. Maine generally has her promises kept, but the ice is by no means thick enough to cut yet!

An important experiment was recently successfully tried in the North River—that of blowing up a wrecked vessel. All ice can, each holding about ten pounds of powder, were lowered into the wreck, and fired by a galvanic battery. The shock was terrific; but the wreck was thoroughly broken up, and then completely removed by dredging—showing the feasibility of removing sunken vessels from the harbor.

It is said that Esther celebrated Christmas-eve in his family according to a German custom. In an article published in Leipsic the great author of Faust is quoted as surrounded by children, and playing upon a pianoforte—a composition not unlike the modern guitar.

Typhoid fever and diphtheria often follow a summer drought, because wells and cisterns are not cleansed when the hot water and sediment which have accumulated in them.

The devotion of Napoleon III. at Sedan was certainly far removed from sentimentality, if reports are true. It is stated of him that in the midst of the scene of confusion which ensued upon the surrender of the palace-carriage, French line-boats, while riding slowly through a wide street swept by the German artillery and crowded by the French army, he paused for a moment to address a question to a colonel of his staff. At the moment a shell exploded a few feet before him, leaving him unharmed. The Emperor continued on his way without flinching, and was received with cheers by the enthusiastic roots of the city, who, with setting at a window inside, recognized him for the hero of the Crimea, a shell struck the wall just outside, and burst only a few feet from the Emperor's chair, again leaving him unscathed and unmoved.

The Mercantile Library of New York city now numbers over 40,000 members. The circulation of books delivered to members is 800; some days as many as 1800 are delivered. The library now touches many as 1800 are delivered. The library now touches Brooklyn, Jersey City, Hoboken, Yonkers, Jersey City, and Elizabeth, N. J., receiving books from the metropolitan depots. The reading-room, which has the reputation of being the largest and best furnished in America, contains over 400 newspapers and periodicals.

A giant Christmas pie is described in an English newspaper, the Newcastle Chronicle, of January 8, 1770, as containing two bushels of flour, twenty pounds of butter, four geese, two turkeys, six ralpies, four pea-wide-fowls, two pheasants, six snipes, four partridges, two moles' tongues, two curlews, one hare, a hen, and six pigeons. This enormous curiosity was made for a baronet—Sir Henry Grey—and measured four feet each way in circumference, weighed about twelve stone, and was neatly fitted with a case and four small nests, to facilitate the use to every guest that inclined to partake of its contents at table.

The ladies of Washington have been much annoyed in past seasons by the large number of uninvited guests who attend private receptions. Often the uninvited guests have been as numerous as those to whom cards were issued. Some are even so uncivil as to enter private houses on special occasions. At a certain entertainment a year ago one of these guests was a man with whom the bride and her family were totally unacquainted. He was present at the ceremonies and left without guests. The President's receptions and those of the Speaker of the House of Representatives are the only ones in the evening for which no cards are issued, and to which every body is privileged to go.

The annual report of the Fire Marshal of this city contains some items of general interest and value to the public. During the year ending October 31 there have been 886 fires. Twenty buildings have been totally destroyed, sixty-nine badly damaged, and seven slightly damaged—eighty damaged. More than half the fires originated from carelessness, the use of inflammable and explosive materials, or were incendiary. No less than two hundred and six fires occurred from carelessness in the use of candles, matches, pipes, and cigars; and thirty were caused by children playing with matches.

The number of fires in one house last year, and in one cause being the introduction of the biographic alarm system below Fourteenth Street.

The circulation of our prominent newspapers has increased to such a point as extent that even a short time ago considered fast, and which could easily print ten thousand copies per hour, is now one hour, now deemed old-fogyish, and are insufficient for the purposes of a single day's issue. To meet the wants of these ever increasing trade, Mr. George W. Childs, proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, has ordered three new presses of the Messrs. Hoe a new printing-machine for his newspaper, which, when completed, will enable the establishment to turn out eighty-six thousand copies of the Ledger per hour. The new press will cost, we are informed, upward of forty thousand dollars, and will be ready for use in two or three months.

We had thought to give our readers a little idea of the holiday books of 1870. But when we looked at the enormous size of the principal book-stores convinces us of the impossibility of so doing in our brief space. Even a mere catalogue of the titles of publications would fill columns. A special feature of the season is the multiplication of "juveniles," which not only charm the eyes of expectant young folks, and very valuably benefit them, but those who write books for them. Without making invidious distinction—for we are rather bewildered by the rich embarrassment of riches passing before our eyes—we mention a few of the many which interest us, on behalf of the children. The "Wonderland Stories," among which "Letters Everywhere" contains a most curious and ingenious combination of the alphabet to natural objects, amusing to young and old; "Mother Goose in her New Dress;" "The Rescue of Sea Fairy;" "The Children's Party;" "The Adventures of a Young Naturalist," with 131 elegant illustrations; Dickens's "Children of a Larger Growth;" My Agingil Kingdom," written by the boys' friend, Du Chaillu; "Black Peter," containing exhibitions by Paul Bedford; "Stories of Old Rhymes for Boys;" "Popular Fairy Tales," illustrated by Doré; "Prose and Verse for Boys and Girls;" "Tom Brown's Schooldays," and the end is yet far off. Nor have we even mentioned the numerous sets of children's books which, beautifully bound and illustrated, come in neat boxes. A visit to our bookstores are now in full tide of interest to the young people as well as their parents.

Miss Nightingale never ceases to retain the most lively interest in all those who are called to suffer from the subjection of war. In sending a contribution to the fund for relieving the suffering peasantry of Montenegro she says:

"I wish it was ten times as much; for in this most terrible of all the wars—it is the continuous horrors of this most horrible of mankind's histories—I believe the sufferings of the wounded, struggling, and burnt-out peasantry are the greatest horrors of all."

Five great cartridge factories in Paris give constant employment to about 1,500 workmen, under the immediate direction of the artillery officers. The total daily production is 800,000 cartridges.

An excitement is being aroused concerning the diamond fields of South Africa, each extending over a space of six hundred miles, from Hall County, Georgia, to Virginia. This may prove a counter-irritant to the South African diamond fever.

The following incident is related of General Kearney: A private on guard duty at Malden was ordered by the General to pass him without the countersign. His orders, strictly adhered to, were disobeyed, and he was ordered, by artillery from General Kearney, to be shot. The whole army was drawn up to witness the execution. The drums rolled the death notes. The culprit received the last consolations of religion, and the firing party was ready awaiting the signal, when at the very last moment the General developed to the front, and said he had determined to save the man's life, but that his commander-in-chief was to be interpreted, and that in future discipline would be strictly observed. The soldier returned to the ranks a Frenchman should never go down on his knees."

A New Bedford captain, who has spent the most four years in whaling voyages in the Pacific and Arctic Seas, says that on his opinion that the purchase of Alaska was a good bargain for the United States. The climate of Alaska is not too severe for Americans, and not so trying to the constitution as tropical countries. The soil is adapted to grains, and numerous vegetables are raised in abundance, making it a good recruiting-ground for ships. The sea-fisheries on the coast and islands are very extensive and valuable. San Francisco gets her fish, codfish, salmon, etc., there. The timber of the Territory is something like the Oregon pine. The mercantile fields of Kodiac Island now are the fortunate, are immense, and the berries I ever ate in any country. Gold mines have recently been discovered in Alaska, and California miners have gone there in considerable numbers. The true value, of course, is well known to be valuable.

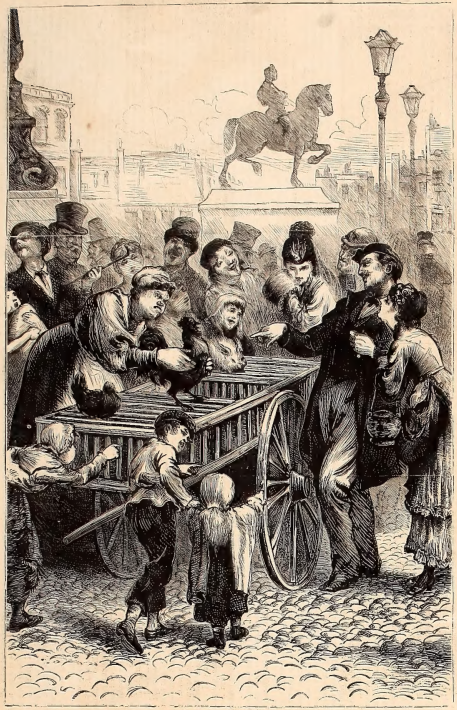
THE PARIS FOOD MARKETS.

A ROMAN emperor is reported to have once offered a handsome reward to any one who would invent for him a new dish. Could but this imperial gourmand now visit Paris he might revel in dainties as novel as they are reported to be delicious. Have not besieged correspondents been amusing their readers for some weeks past by relating the many experiments the once so fastidious Parisians have been trying as to the edibility of various animals hitherto considered to be exclusively confined to the table of a luxurious Chinaman or a Cremorne Zouave? One resident reports cat-flesh exquisite; while another falls into ecstasies over the delicacy and flavor of a salmis des rats, which, however, he adds, was put down in his bill under the now comprehensive title of gibier. Ass-flesh is reported to be superior to veal; horse roasted and then pickled for some days is capital beef; dog is by no means unpalatable; and a roast mouse is matchless eating.

Not only, however, have the beleaguered Parisians been testing the flavor and digestibility of these familiar animals, but the Zoological Gardens have also furnished them with still stranger meats. Those hungry orgiasts which you were expressly forbidden to feed, and which, consequently, were stuffed to suffocation by the more youthful of the habitues, have themselves been slaughtered, while the reverend missionary of Fontbuctoumou memory, so hastily devoured by a cassowary, has been simply revenged by the fate of his antagonist's representatives at the Jardin des Plantes. Yak, kangaroo, and monkey have been procurable; the hams of the bear, so superbly advised by M. Dumas in his "Impressions de Voyage," have been speculated on with great gusto; while buffalo-steak has been discussed at a select party of besieged epicureans, and pronounced most excellent eating.

Beef and mutton have long been rationed by the government at a very reasonable tariff, though in infinitesimal portions; but poultry, scarcely indeed obtainable, has sold for enormous prices. Thus the sketch on the left represents a scene witnessed on the Pont Neuf. An old lady, bent on making the most of the last of her poultry-yard, proclaimed the lot, estimated by a by-stander to be a veteran of at least eight years' standing, to be "the last cock in Paris," and, though admitting him to be no chicken, declared him not so old as represented, and stated his price to be 25 francs. A rabbit and two hens were also in her basket, the whole being valued at 50 francs. The lot was easily sold at the old lady's own price.

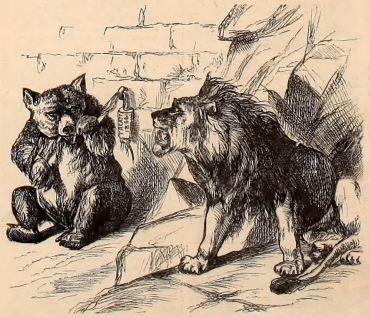
Milk also has been rare during the siege, and though it is stated that there are 6000 milch cows in Paris, this beverage is by no means easy to procure. Thus, as the second sketch depicts, no sooner do the milk-carts arrive from the Bois de Boulogne, or from some other oasis outside the ramparts where large herds of cattle are kept, than crowds of thirsty souls surround them, struggling to obtain, at any price, a small basin of this grateful liquid, made still more simple by the addition of considerable quantities of aqua pura. Rarely does the peasant escape till all his milk be gone, and a correspondent writes that "this scrambling frequently ends in half the milk being upset in the road. Those who have regular customers," he adds, "are obliged to change their itinerary every two or three days, or their cans would be dry before they arrived at the first house. We shall soon be without milk, as all cows are to be killed unless the proprietors can prove they have fodder enough to keep them for a month."



"THE LAST LOT"—SALE OF POULTRY IN PARIS.

SELLING MILK IN THE STREETS OF PARIS.

THE NEW KING OF SPAIN.



NOT LOOSE YET.

LOOSE!

MESSRS. PRANG & CO. have issued very delicate water-color paintings, very beautifully and very cheap; and a very handsome steel engraving by HOLLIS, called "The Flower of Heaven." PRANG's pictures make excellent Christmas presents.—[Boston Journal.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan,
THE PERFECT MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists. Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

Pimples on the Face.
For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Disfigured disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedo-ne and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

A GOOD THING.—THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL and Life Illustrated, for 1871. Devoted to Ethnology, Physiology, Physiognomy, Psychology, Education, Art, Science, Literature, and all measures calculated to reform, improve, and elevate mankind, physically, mentally, and spiritually. A first-class magazine at $3 a year. With either of Harper's, $5 50; or any $3 Paper or Magazine, $5. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS for PIANO and PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete scores, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 100 to 250 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & SONS, 24 Beech St., and W. A. PEASE & CO., 37 Broadway, N.Y.

Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 15.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

with a NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS, the best press ever made for the price. Any one can do handsome printing with the Several Job Printers. They are most conveniently adapted for Business Printing for Church, Sabbath School, and Society work, and also for Manufacturers and editorial purposes, or for a Village Newspaper and Job Office. Incomparably the best Printed for a boy or girl.

Price of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $50.

Send for Catalogue, with testimonials and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press. BENJ. O. WOODS, MF., 321 Federal St., Boston, Mass.; C. C. THOMPSON, 14 College Place, New York; KELLY, HUSSEY, & LEWIS, 917 Market St., Phila.; F. A. CRAIGIN, 99 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS.

WONDERFUL—Sure to Please.
CURIOUS—Only Try them.
AMUSING—Send for Some.

A wonderful discovery in Photography, by which a picture can be made by any person on an apparently blank piece of paper. By applying the prepared paper a beautiful and perfect Photograph will appear. Plain and simple directions will be placed in each Album of Photographs. Price 10 cents per Album, or Five Assorted Photographs for One Dollar. Send by postage paid, on receipt of the price, by

W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, New York.

TO THE LADIES

WHO DESIRE TO USE THE

BEST SIX-CORD

SPOOL COTTON,

FOR

Hand or Machine

SEWING,

BUY

CLARK'S

O.N.T.,

and you will find it

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER.

CURTAINS.

Selling off for 30 days, to reduce stock previous to removal. Curtains, Curtains, and Curtains. Materials of every description; also, Piano and Table Covers retailing at wholesale prices.

G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
447 Broadway, near Howard St.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, with recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens of printing, cards, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

DYSPEPSIA and CONSTIPATION cured permanently without the use of cathartic or purgative bitters, medicines, and pills full of the treatment averse does. Send One Dollar for directions, or stamp for circular. GEORGE F. LANSING,
P. O. Box 4581, N. Y. City.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL and Life Illustrated of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $3, by
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

STEINWAY & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
Piano-Fortes,
Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Preëminent Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Cross and Ribbon from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Sciences and Arts of Berlin and Stockholm; also, the Great Gold Medal of the Vienna Exposition, 1873, awarded in London, 1862, together with twenty-five first prize Premiums from 1850 to 1866, inclusive, since which time Steinway & Sons have also entered their Piano-fortes at any local fair in the United States.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory
Is now conceded to be not only the most perfectly arranged, but at the same time the most extensive establishment of its kind in the world, the official Inventory and Appraisement, as part of the assets of the living revealing the startling fact that the number of Pianos made by them, and the amount of their sales, are Nearly One-Third of the Entire Manufacture of Pianos in America, and exceed those of the twelve largest Piano makers of New York combined.

STEINWAY & SONS
beg to announce A GENERAL REDUCTION in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Piano-fortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long felt and frequently expressed want by persons of moderate means, have recently added to their manufacture a new progression for the manufacture of an entirely new style of Instrument, as follows:

The "School" Piano,
a thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, material and quality of workmanship as the highest-priced 7-octave Pianos; the only difference being in the style of case, not so strongly constructed as the more elegant ones, and consequently not so costly. These new instruments will be known to the public as "Steinway School Pianos," and are limited in price to EXCEEDINGLY MODERATE FIGURES.

Steinway & Sons also desire to call special attention to their new

Patent Upright Pianos,
with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are unrivaled in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of touch, while standing longer in tune and having more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano is Warranted for Five Years.

PRICE-LISTS and ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed free on application.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,
Nos. 1 and 3 11 East Fourteenth Street,
(Between 4th Ave. and Irving Place), NEW YORK.

BURNETT'S
THE BEST
Flavoring Extracts.
"Your superior Flavoring Extracts are widely "Standard," uniform in quality, and give entire satisfaction to our customers."
PARK & TILFORD,
Hist Street and Broadway.
"Growing in favor."
ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT,
Chambers Street.
2, 5, and 10 oz. Bottles. Retail sizes for sale by all first-class Grocers in the United States and Canada.
JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Sole Proprietors,
BOSTON, MASS.

A very charming and surprising Novelette, THE CHRIST-LOCKET, or, a Holiday Number of "Old Curiosity," containing a beautiful Christmas Story with the Puzzle by Mendelssohn, and bright Stories and Poems for Children. Price 25 cents. Mailed post-paid. For sale by all Book and News dealers.
Address all orders to G. A. CODDINGTON, Agent, care of ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, 143 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

HUNTER'S GUIDE and TRAPPER'S COMPANION.—37,000 sold last year. It tells how to hunt, trap, and cure all kinds of animals to bear and deer; has full directions for tanning and dressing hides and furs, and is worth to the Farmer, or Woodsman. The only cheap work on the subject. Price 25 cents; or 5 for $1. This is a large book nearly 96 pages. If all do not use one desire to know. Price only 25 cents; 6 for $1. Sent by mail to any address by HUNTER & CO., Publishers,
Hinsdale, N.H.

$10 $ 15
$ 20
$ 25

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" Hunting Cased Watches. These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and the imitation of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-Jewelled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and for time to any $100 Watch in the market. Three of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jewelled, for railroad men, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. For these inscribed watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, patent key and lever. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $5. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at corresponding low prices.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.

All persons holding Patrons' Tickets in Fourth Series are hereby notified that the fund is being distributed. Send for Circulars and Samples. Address Washington Medallion Pen Co., N. Y., Jersey City, Boston.

UNRIVALED HOLIDAY NOVELTIES.

House Coats, Dressing Robes, "Our Fritz," "Chancellor," "Monarch" Scarfs,
Stylish and Fashionable,
With an Immense Variety of
HOSIERY,
Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin
GLOVES,
LINED AND UNLINED.
SILK SUSPENDERS,
INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.

Union Adams & Co.,
637 Broadway.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

A Useful Holiday Gift.
PRINCE'S IMPROVED PROTEAN
FOUNTAIN PEN
The Handle contains the Ink. Writes 12 hours with one filling. For sale at Thomas Groom & Co.'s, 82 Nassau St., New York; C. M. Lowne, 793 Broad St., Newark. Send for Circular. M'f'd only by JOHN S. PRINCE, 21 Broadway, N. Y., Manufacturer of Gold Pens and Holders. Agents wanted.

"AS YOU LIKE IT."
PARCHEESI: the great Backgammon Board Game of India. The most fascinating and exciting game ever published in this country. Sent by mail, postpaid,
Popular Edition, $1 00; Medium Edition, $3 00;
Fine Edition, $5 00.
GAMES A SPECIALTY.
E. G. SELCHOW & CO., Publishers,
37 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

THE FOUNDLING,

A group of statuary by John Rogers, just completed from COMING TO THE PARSON. Price $10 each.
Parties desiring these or other groups, or wishing to send them as presents to their friends, can inclose the price, and they will be delivered at any point east of the Mississippi with all express charges prepaid; or will be sent west of there by freight, and a discount allowed in quantities.
Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List to
JOHN ROGERS,
212 Fifth Ave., New York.

A GENTS WANTED.—$100 to $500 monthly easily made by selling our new and valuable article. Circulars free. NILES & CO., 32 Pearl St., Hartford, Conn.

Christmas Presents.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
have opened Two Cases
LONG AND SQUARE
Real India Camel's-Hair Shawls, comprising
AN UNUSUAL VARIETY OF DESIGNS, COLORS, &c.;
TWO CASES REAL BRUSSELS
POINT-LACE SHAWLS,
DRESSES, COLLARS,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
TRIMMING LACES, &c.,
which, having been purchased in Europe at greatly reduced prices,
will be sold at a small advance on cost.
OFFERING EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS TO PURCHASE.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME.
A Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, elegantly printed from large type on toned paper, $2 50.

This book offers great inducements to CONVASSERS, as those for whom it is especially designed—THE AGED and AFFLICTED—are generally well known in any community, of easy access, and a class for whose interests little provision is made.

The work is also valuable as furnishing religious teaching for the family.

It is especially appropriate as a gift-book for the Holidays.

For particulars, address
AVERY HILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

STEEL PENS.
AMERICAN BRANCH OF HOUSE,
91 JOHN ST., New York.
JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS.
HENRY OWEN, Sold Agent.

FOGGANS IMITATION GOLD WATCHES, DIAMOND POWER SPECTACLES, NEWSPAPERS, &c. Send for Circular. 189 Nassau St., N. Y.

1871.
Now is the Time to Subscribe.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every CLUB of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. The Postage must be prepaid by the publishers. The postage is consequently included in the subscription of the MAGAZINE, or 70 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order.

Postage to Canada is 12 cents additional. Postage to Europe 24 cents additional.

Remittances should be made by Postal Money Order or Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300: Half Page, $150: Quarter Page, $75—each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$290.

We have entered the field, as manufacturers, on a basis entirely different from all others. We have manufactures but one style. Our reason for this is simply to prevent confusion. We sold everything in our Piano that can possibly get out of order, and warrant it for five years. We have no second class Pianos to sell, and no one can buy a poor instrument or refer to us as having one in use. We believe it to be fully equal to any Piano now in the market, and known world as any price. It has no gambling or wonderful attachments. It has seven octaves, and possesses every quality of tone and touch requisite to the highest class of Pianos. Its case is of the most elegant design, and is made of the best seasoned and the figured, but we have abandoned it, from the fact that there is always a fashion—that must be observed with a screwed all over—the rim, both inside and out, to prevent injury from unequal contraction and expansion from the atmosphere. The foundation upon which we venture is safe. The logs are of whitewood, the inner or all, Protection Carved legs are screwed on to the corners, and the Instrument is screwed securely—not on the envelope be screwed. We use the French grand action with top dampers, and the hammers are very thick and covered with the finest imported leather. Our keys are of the best ivory, with ebony sharps. The Piano is full seven octaves, and has the most brilliant, fine toned and the widest Concert Grand Scale ever put in a Piano. It has been tested seven months before sale, and the entire instrument is accurately adjusted to pitch, and will stand in any climate. Every Piano is warranted for five years, and we refer to the Security Bank, of the City of New York, for our responsibility. We have adopted the business on the principle that pianos are a luxury, and that the best are always cheapest for core-generous. If a piano is not found to be bad at a reasonable price. We have already made a considerable number of Pianos, and have them in stock. We will not Pianos for $290. No extra charge for boxing and shipping. We will forward a Piano to any part of the country, for his trial. We have also a number of Pianos of very responsible business firm in the United States who will sell our Pianos on commission. Any Piano proves satisfactory after the trial of one month, we have no claim on the money, if the Piano is returned to us with the freight paid both ways. We refer to the Hon. Wm. Kent, Ex-Governor of this State; to Messrs. Tiffany & Co., Publishers of the Dickens County directories, at Medina, Ontario, Orleans co.

Medals, Prizes, &c. 1862, 1870.
United States Piano Co.—Dear Sirs: The Piano recently received, and has been in use about two weeks, gives us entire satisfaction. The tone is full and equable throughout the scale, and the touch is light and elastic. In respect to comparison with other pianos, $290 looks very low in this town. The same Piano would be cheap at $400. Yours truly, Rev. Dr. Vermeule, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Dr. Vermeule, with, after the first of the year, with to purchase one. Yours truly, Rev. J. COOPER.

United States Piano Co.—Gents: The Piano you sent came, and I am pleased with it. It is a good instrument, and I think will give satisfaction. Yours truly, Rev. J. COOPER, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia

United States Piano Co.—Dear Sirs: The Piano you sent me is a good instrument, and I think will give satisfaction. Yours truly, Rev. A. RAMEY, Rector of St. John's, Philadelphia

Martinez, Penna., Oct. 17, 1870.
United States Piano Co.—Dear Sirs: The Piano you sent me is a good instrument, and I think will give satisfaction. Yours truly, Rev. A. RAMEY, Rector of St. John's, Philadelphia

Pianos will be sent to any part of the country, for trial, at my expense, and if not found satisfactory, may be returned at my expense. Pianos also sold by the rate of 6 per cent. Enclosed please find $290. Yours truly, Rev. A. RAMEY, Rector of St. John's, Philadelphia

J. F. SCHUMACHER, Esq., Montreal, Pa.
F. G. GRIMM, Esq., Hartford, Conn.
Rev. A. RAMEY, Rector of St. John's, Philadelphia, Pa.
Rev. ANDREW CRAIGIE, Pittsburgh, Pa.
RUSSELL WELLS, Esq., 47 Albany Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y., Cashier of the Manufacturers' and Builders' Fire Insurance Co., New York.
Rev. JOHN S. STONE, Rector of St. Ann's, Brooklyn, N. Y.
CARL FERDINAND, Esq., Attorney-at-law, Hoosentville, Va.
Rev. JOHN S. STONE, Rector of St. Ann's, Brooklyn, N. Y. (Dept. Alfred Bible Soc., N. Y. City).
Rev. J. COOPER, Rector of St. Peter's, Philadelphia, Pa.
Mons. M. B. WYMAN, Cartersville, N. J.
Rev. A. D. CAMPBELL, Rector of Trinity Church, Co., 939, 120 and 52 Wall Street, N. Y. City, and Residence, 231 Pacific St., Brooklyn.
Rev. DAVID MERRIMAN, Orleans, Mass., Sec. N. Y. Agt. Ass'n.
Rev. ANDREW CRAIGIE, Allegheny, Pittsburgh, Central America.
Letters on this Keystone or Pyramid, Baltimore, Md.
Rev. ANDREW CRAIGIE, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Many of these letters have been received of our Pianos. There are eight of our instruments in the little village of Tunkhannock, Pa.—We respectfully refer to any responsible to all who are using our Pianos: we will not allow any but the certificates of all th' press Purchaser, but here we will say that we have sold more Pianos in the last six months than any other manufacturer in the United States, and that our sales are increasing every day. Our struggle is upon the people. We only wish upon the tend virtues of our Pianos. Every one who purchases one of our Pianos will be a missionary for us, and will assist in selling others when we have no paid Mission, and nothing to sustain us but the sterling worth of our Pianos in the hearts of the people. We have no Wholesale Agents, and do not intend to have. We prohibit Agents who receive enormous commissions on all the Pianos they sell, from selling our Pianos. We have no Agents who are making $50 a week and more on our Pianos. We have a Piano returned to us; and now we must close our contracts.—We repeat, we have nothing to support us but the merits of our Pianos, and the people are our friends. We will, in future, be unable to make the same number of reference and payment responsibility; and, if the instrument to any request it should be returned to us, the freight both ways must be paid by the purchaser. We will never buy back the Pianos we have sold. Any one who wishes to order a Piano sent, we have one request to make, and that is, that he will send the money before when an advertisement is seen in the Address or apply to the UNITED STATES PIANO CO., 645 Broadway, N. Y.

The Sun.

CHARLES A. DANA, Editor.

The Dollar Weekly Sun.

A Newspaper of the Present Time.

Intended for People Now on Earth.

Including Farmers, Mechanics, Merchants, Professional Men, Workers, Thinkers, and All Manner of Good Folks, and the Wives, Sons, and Daughters of all such.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR !

ONE HUNDRED COPIES FOR $30,

Or less than One Cent a Copy. Let there be a $50 Club at every Post Office.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY SUN, $2 A YEAR,

of the same size and general character as the THE WEEKLY, but with a greater variety of miscellaneous matter, and furnishing the purest and freshest news by the quickest practicable conveyance. It comes twice a week instead of once only.

THE DAILY SUN, $6 A YEAR.

...is preeminently readable newspaper, with the largest circulation in the world. Free, independent, and terribly in politics. All the news from everywhere. Two cents a copy. By mail, $9 cents a month, or $6 a year.

For Terms to Clubs, and Specimens, address

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, Sun office, New York.

Burnett's Cocoaine

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

HAIR DRESSING in the World.

PURE, RICH, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or COMPLAINT, Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rock Pad Holders, Trusses. Lots patterns, industrious for great country, cheaply, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Supporters, &c. Reliable. 1547 Chestnut St., Philada., and 3 Ann St., N.Y. Send for Pamphlet.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Editor of Harper's, $4 00; the Independent, $3 00; Scribner, $3 00; the Christian Union, $2 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00. Total worth of 12 00 for $12 50, send to W. WELLS, 599 Broadway, N. Y.

Soldiers sending a Stamped Envelope with their full address to Box 3696, New York City, will receive in return valuable information.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

ONE DIME will secure by return mail copies most attractive, and of the greatest value to the buyer, ever in the world. Packages sent by mail or express the money. Splendid premiums and large cash commissions to agents. Order at once of

JOHN B. ALDEN & CO., Publishers,

Chicago, Ill.

YOUNG FOLKS' RURAL, largest and handsomest of young folks' paper. Greatest success! Best stories and pictures. Splendid Cash Pay to Agents or whole amount returned in watches, musical instruments, books, &c. Send for your outfit now. Address H. N. F. LEWIS, Pub. Western Rural, Chicago.

$250 Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. Spencer, Brattleboro, Vt.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is the custom to publish frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY SIZE FROM THE SMALLEST TO THE LARGEST, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, the same as the Paper Patterns of Dress Waists and Skirts heretofore published in Harper's Bazar. Full directions for using the Patterns, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ... No. 22
TRIMMED CARRIAGE DRESS ... " 23
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ... " 26
POMPADOUR-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ... " 27
TRIMMED HOUSE DRESS ... " 28
TRIMMED WALKING DRESS ... " 29
WATTEAU-BASQUE WALKING SUIT ... " 32
TRIMMED EVENING DRESS ... " 33
TRIMMED DRESS OF SILK ... " 34
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT ... " 43
POMPADOUR WALKING SUIT ... " 44
HIGH-WAIST TRIMMED SUIT ... " 46
WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ... " 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT ... " 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT ... " 50

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS ... " 1

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and DUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents by mail in Paris. Back Numbers of the Bazar can be sent for $7 00. No patterns separated or exchanged. In ordering, state number of pattern wanted, and inclosing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Wanted — Agents

$75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $500 to any person who will execute better work, more beautiful work, more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

MONEY EASILY MADE

With our Stencil and Key-Check Outfit.

CHICAGO STENCIL WORKS.

Make Money,

Woman's to act as Local Agent for Hayes Wade Beaman's Great Religious Weekly. Eight numbers, with Hayes' Great Sermon Sowed in new Style, and a pert's 25 Steel Engraving Given Away. Many are now making $30 a week per day in cash. Address

J. B. FORD & CO., 39 Park Row, N. Y.

UNIVERSAL COMBINATION.—Fourteen useful instruments in one: Button-Hole Cutter, Work Holder, Tape Measure, Cuffs, Scissors, and Pencil Sharpener, Ruler, Emery, Gauge, Hem Marker, Thimble, Thimble Pocket, and Spool Case. Sells like Agents Wanted. Sample, with particulars guaranteed, Sample instrument to Agents, $1 50; by Mail, prepaid, $1 80. Circulars and testimonials sent free. Address

Address all letters to R. MARTIN, Hartford, New York.

"SUNLIGHT."—Agents wanted every where, with 75 very small capital, to sell "Danforth's Sunlight Burning Fluid." The cheapest and best illuminator of the age. 100 per cent. cheaper than Kerosene, and absolutely safe. Burns in any lamp. Will not explode, or take like wild-fire. Send $1 (money order), and get sample in return mail. Address Universal S. M. Co., 85 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS a salary of $150 per Week and expenses, to follow a large commission, to sell our old-established Invisible Gum Tints. Address H. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

WANTED AGENTS, at $60 per month, to sell the best and fastest selling Apple-Parer without apples or color. It cuts only seven cents a quart, and will do more work in 10 minutes. Send 10 cents for sample, particulars, and to insure employment. L. C. GRIER, Shermansdale, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED for the Illustrated Life of Gen. GRANT. Over 500 pages, 8vo. Fully illustrated. Sells at sight. Agents are making from $75 to $200 per month. Send for circulars and extra terms. Address HUBBARD BROS., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEWS-BOY. "Here 's'er, Boss! Extray! Great French Victory!"
SMOKER. "Vat! Anoder? Oh, my poor Countree!"

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

offer a large assortment of

SEAL SACQUES,

at $85, $95, $110;

Astrakhan Sacques,

at $40, $50, $60.

All of their Best Manufacture, of the Newest Patterns and Finish.

502 & 504 BROADWAY, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,

UNION SQUARE, N. Y.,

DIAMOND MERCHANTS.

Extra large Single Stones. Fine Matched Stones. Diamond and Gem Jewelry—a larger stock than ever before offered.

DIAMONDS BOUGHT.

Musical Boxes

Just received, a splendid assortment of Beautiful Swiss Music Boxes, including every style,

At prices to suit the resources of all.

FANCY SURPRISE MUSICAL BOXES,

In various styles, at the Musical Box Headquarters,

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

No. 680 Broadway.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO.'S PURE CALIFORNIA BRANDY.

I have great satisfaction in being able to recommend this Brandy to my medical brethren as a Pure Wine Brandy, free from all adulterations and subsidiary liens of other spirits or flavorings.—CHARLES T. JACKSON, State Assayer for Massachusetts.

F. SCHLEIFER & CO., San Francisco.

HENRY C. SCHMIDT & CO., 38 Beaver Street, New York, Sole Eastern Agents.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

TARGET AIR PISTOL,

WHOLESALE and RETAIL.

Improved Style just ready for the Holidays. Send for Illustrated Circular. Sent by Express, C.O.D., $8.50; by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $8.00. Darts, $1.00 per doz.

E. H. SMITH, 313 Howard St., New Haven, Conn.

No 705 CHESTNUT PHILADELPHIA

C. BENKERT & SON

No 705 CHESTNUT BROADWAY, N.Y.

BOOTS & SHOES

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 26 East 14th St., Corner University Place.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For description, address Simpson & Co., Box 3076, N. Y.

N.

Robes de Chambre AND House Coats,

FOR

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Large assortment, superior style, very low prices.

E. A. NEWELL,

727 Broadway, cor. Waverley Place.

BALL, BLACK, & CO.,

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS.

No. 565 BROADWAY.

WE OFFER A FULL LINE OF

Waltham Watches,

IN NEW STYLE CASES, SPECIALLY SELECTED FOR OUR HOLIDAY TRADE.

DOOLEY'S THE YEAST BEST POWDER TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

Other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N.Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

$7 Knight H W $50

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most favorable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to

EMPIRE S. M. CO.,

224 Bowery, N. Y.

1871. THE NURSERY. The famous Picture-Paper will maintain its reputation as the best and most HIGHLY ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1.50 a Year. Sample Number, with rich rules, &c., 10 cents.

12TH SUBSCRIBE NOW, and get the last two numbers of 1870 free. Address

JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield St., Boston.

POLLAK & SON,

Manufacturers of

Genuine MEERSCHAUM GOODS,

Amber, Rose Wood and Rubber Goods, Pipes, &c., 27 John St., middle of the block.

Send for Circular.

HORSE CLIPPING. Adie's Patent Machine, by mail, post paid, $6, for sale by JOHN McCLURE, 151 Broadway. Agents wanted.

HARVEY FISK. A. S. HATCH.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,

No. 5 Nassau St., New York, Dec. 14, 1870.

FUNDING FIVE-TWENTY BONDS.

Within the past three months a very large amount of Five-Twenty Bonds have been funded through our office into the FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS of the CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, besides large sales of the same securities for new investments.

We deal in Central Pacific Bonds the same as in Government Securities, and regard them as affording the desired medium for funding Five-Twenty Bonds, without reduction of interest and with unimpaired security.

The EARNINGS of the Road for 1870 will reach Eight Million Dollars, and the increase is shown in the following figures

Earnings from Jan. 1 to Dec. 1, 1870	$7,417,317
Earnings from Jan. 1 to Dec. 1, 1869	5,598,889
Increase in 1870	$2,150,428

We keep a supply of these securities on hand, and furnish them at current market prices, which to-day is 92½.

We continue, as heretofore, to buy and sell Government Bonds, make Collections, receive Deposits, subject to check at sight without notice, and allow interest on balances, and do a general Banking business.

FISK & HATCH.

138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York. | FREEMAN & BURR. | 138 & 140 FULTON ST., New York.

OVERCOATS, $6.
OVERCOATS, $10.
OVERCOATS, $15.
OVERCOATS, $20.
OVERCOATS, $25.
OVERCOATS, $30.
OVERCOATS, $35.
OVERCOATS, $40.
OVERCOATS, $50.

CLOTHING WAREHOUSES.

FREEMAN & BURR'S stock is of unparalleled extent and variety. It embraces Suits Overcoats, and Clothing of every description, for all ages, and all classes and occasions.

Orders by Letter.—The easy and accurate system for SELF-MEASURE introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables parties in any part of the country to order Clothing direct from them with the certainty of receiving the most perfect FIT attainable.

Rules for Self-Measure, Samples of Goods, Price-List, and Fashion Plate Sent Free on application by letter.

WINTER SUITS, $12.
WINTER SUITS, $15.
WINTER SUITS, $20.
WINTER SUITS, $30.
WINTER SUITS, $40.
WINTER SUITS, $50.
BOYS' SUITS, $6.
BOYS' SUITS, $10.
BOYS' SUITS, $15.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,

and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. P. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

'SNAVEVANS'

EVANS' Prices FOR THE EVANS' Best-Made Winter Clothing IN NEW YORK.

OVERCOATS.

$10, $12, $15, $18, $20, $25, $30, $35, $37, $38, $40.

REEFING JACKETS.

$8 00. $10 00. $15 00. $18 00. $22 00.

WINTER SUITS.

$14 00. $16 50. $18 00. $22 00. $25 00. $28. $37. $40.

PANTS.

Fashionable Stripes, $5. $6 50. $7. $7 50. $8. $8 50. $9.

In Fancy Cassimeres, Doeskins, Beavers, &c., to GREAT VARIETY.

PRICES that BEAT THE MARKET, at EVANS' CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 66 and 68 Fulton St., New York.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs and Plans.

$1 50 . . . . . Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

Non-Priest Catalogue of all books on Architecture, Agriculture, and Field Sports, mailed free.

YOSEMITE! YOSEMITE!

The finest Stereoscopic Views of the wonderful Yosemite Valley and the Big Trees, Photographed by E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 501 Broadway. Also, Stereoscopes Metropolitan, Chromos and Frames, Albums and Stereoscopic Graphoscopes, Megalethoscopes.

WILL WIND AND WIND AND LAST A LIFETIME.

Ask any watchmaker for it. Sample sent by mail for 50 cts. J. S. BIRCH & CO., 8 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

contains in every number one complete story worth $100. Forty pieces of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. WOOD, Newburgh, N. Y.

MEDIKONES.—What are they? A new and remarkable discovery of vast importance to all! Book sent free. Address or call on Dr. WELLS & STELL, 37 West 21st St., N. Y. City.

HATTER AND FURRIER.

Seal Sacques, $75, $90, $100.

Astrakhan Sacques, $35, $45, $50.

Importer of English Hats for Gentlemen Wear

HARD-WOOD BOARDS AND SPANISH CEDAR

FOR CIGAR BOXES,

And a large and magnificent assortment of

VENEERS,

Comprising every thing in their line, both Foreign and Domestic, to which they invite the special attention of all dealers. Send for Catalogue and Price-List.

GEO. W. READ & CO.,

Factory { 491 Canal St., 138 Madison St. } 168, 170, & 172 Center Street.

THE WATCHES MADE BY THE

NEW YORK WATCH CO.

ARE THE BEST & CHEAPEST.

ASK TO SEE THEM. Factory, Springfield, Mass.

F. J. KALTENBORN, Manufacturer of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, Amber, Rose Wood, Rubber and Bulbul. Repairing done in all its branches. Circulars sent free. Salesroom, 44 Fulton St. Stores: 6 John St., next Bowery; 71 Nassau St., cor. John. Paris Exposition Prize Medal 1867.

SAMPLE COPIES GRATIS

of THE LADY'S FRIEND and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST—the best Ladies' Magazine and Weekly Paper going. Address DEACON & PETERSON, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. How the machine sells, makes the ladies happy. Sells on both sides of cloth. Fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

AGENTS WANTED ($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., PORTLAND, Maine, or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

Rail Road Bonds. Whether you wish to Buy or Sell, write to CHARLES W. HASSLER, No. 24 BROAD ST., New York.

CHRISTMAS
SUPPLEMENT
HARPER'S
WEEKLY
BLUE BEARD
RED RIDING HOOD
TOM THUMB
SANTA CLAUS
THOMAS NAST
1870
PUSS IN BOOTS
PEACE ON EARTH AND GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN
CINDERELLA

A HYMN FOR CHRISTMAS-EVE.

The following is a very old Christmas carol, once extensively known in England, and still a great favorite in many parts of that country:

As Joseph was a-walking
He heard an angel sing—
This night shall be the birth-time
Of Christ the heavenly King.
He neither shall be born
In honour nor in hall,
Nor in the place of paradise,
But in no ox's stall:

He neither shall be clothed
In purple nor in pall,
But in the linen white and fair
That men bebies all:
He neither shall be rocked
In silver nor in gold,
But in a wooden manger rude
That resteth on the mould:

He neither shall be washen
With white wine nor with red,
But with the water from the spring
That on you shall be shed.
As Joseph was a-walking
Thus did the angel sing,
And Mary's son at midnight hour
Was born to be our King.

Then be ye glad, good people,
This night of all the year,
And light ye up your candles, for
His star it shineth clear;
And all in earth and heaven
A joyous carol sing.
For lo! to us a child is born,
And all the bells do ring!

APPLES OF SODOM.

A Christmas Story.

All night long the snow had been falling steadily, and when the sun arose on Christmas morning it seemed almost inclined to go back again, the air was so crisp and frosty. If the sun had any such half-formed intention, however, the idea was not executed, for the round red ball rolled slowly the heavens, and the snow, which was all around upon the white surface spread before it as if sighest at the amount of work it had to do to warm such a cold earth. An early bird, if any had been stirring, would have seen the long line that marked out Broadway, extending, in appearance like a piece of white tape, through the length of New York. Broadway was very quiet that Christmas morning; even the milkmen had not started on their noisy trips, and the overnight lounger had all apparently found resting places of repose, and had not ventured out of them yet. No stores were open, no pedestrians were abroad—every body was asleep.

Meanwhile the red ball rose higher and higher, and gradually its influence began to be felt, for the white roofs that lined the white streets, and little drops of water began to perspire from their edges, and over on the east side particularly by the frosty windows, and they became gradually more transparent, by the life of the sun, and gradually it began to stir. First a window went up, a night-capped head peered out, and then popped in again; then a door opened, and a great coat and muffler issued forth; then the tinkling of bells was heard, and a horse appeared, panting and sneezing, while the discordant voice of a milkman startled the silence—and New York was awake.

In a narrow lane, between two narrow streets on the east side of the city, stood a tall, thin structure, which seemed as if it had been wedged in between the two fat houses on either side of it to separate them, and had been forgotten there. It was a cosy old house—one of those that grow up in the heart of every great city, and, living a neglected and forsaken life, are not missed when they decay. It was full of windows, and every window seemed stuffed with old hats and coats and bits of cloth; and the blinds had all been wrenched off, and the doors hung loosely from their hinges; and altogether it presented a most miserable and dilapidated appearance. But there was one comparatively bright feature even about this forlorn old relic. Away up in the top story the early bird could have seen one window that was not stuffed with old clothes and rags, albeit it was as shattered as any of the rest. Every broken pane in this window had a thin piece of wood tacked neatly over it, and though this pan excluded some of the light, it kept the cold out also, and looked less shatterly, and that was a great deal where every thing was dirty and slovenly and wretched. But there were a few pieces of glass carefully preserved in the window, and through these the first rays of this Christmas sun poured with their full glory. There was nothing remarkable about the room into which these rays carried a share of the Christmas sun—which shines alike in broken-down old tenement houses and rich mansions—but its neatness. The furniture was old and common, but whole and clean. A plain table, dresser, bedstead, and a few chairs, that was all—all except a little, cold, cheerless stove, which, as it is destined to play an important part in this story, deserves and shall receive special description.

It was a funny little stove, made of sheet-iron, and having a little pipe with a matter-of-fact kind of elbow that twisted up into the chimney as if it only did so on compulsion and under protest. There was no fire in it, and it stood there looking cold and black, yet with a cheerful expression as the sun glistened on its smooth sides, while, the cover being off, it stared straight up to the ceiling through its large round eye, like a little square, black, inanimate Cyclops.

On the iron bedstead lay the figure of an old man. He was asleep, and the sun, shining full upon him, lined out his shape upon the coarse counterpane with marvelous distinctness. From the soft, thin, gray hair down to the very boots he wore it was all sharp; not the sharpness of acuteness; not the sharpness of meanness; but the stinging, biting sharpness of extreme poverty. He was a very old man. He did not seem as if he had grown sharp by years of suffering and pinching, but rather as though he had been suddenly clutched in a corner by distress, and had all the blood and flesh and marrow crushed out of him at once, and so had fallen asleep in misfortune and lain there until Christmas. For he lay on the bed with his clothes on, and his arms and his fingers looked as if all the cold weather since October had been at work lluing him. After all, however, he had only lain there a few hours, as we shall see by-and-by.

There was a thump and stamping up the ricketty stairs presently the door flew open with a bang to admit the form of a jolly, red-headed Irishman, whose hair bristled and seemed to counteract the chill of the cold blast that blew in through the open door. He made noise enough in his entrance to have awakened the Sleeping Beauty; but though the old man stirred slightly, he did not wake. The new-comer was a mass of humanity in the Boston rocker rolled on the floor, neither seemed say the less asleep by these changes of position. "Hallo, Old Christmas! Wake up, Boot-black!" shouted the new-comer, and he presented his foot to the fire on the floor, and his fist to the old man, with one and the same movement. Slowly the two took upright positions, and, stretching and yawning, awakened. The figure rising from the floor seemed the younger man of the two, though he might have been of any age from twenty to fifty, as far as his face was an index of his years, but was probably not more than thirty. Carter, his mess of humanity in the Boston rocker rolled on the floor, neither seemed say the less asleep by these changes of position. "Hallo, Old Christmas! Wake up, Boot-black!" shouted the new-comer, and he presented his foot to the fire on the floor, and his fist to the old man, with one and the same movement. Slowly the two took upright positions, and, stretching and yawning, awakened. The figure rising from the floor seemed the younger man of the two, though he might have been of any age from twenty to fifty, as far as his face was an index of his years, but was probably not more than thirty. Carter, his name was Barty Brady, and he was a native of the Emerald Island, whose blood was evidently quickened by the cold, for he was all life and fun, and he was the very soul of mischief. The other was a man of a totally different stamp. He was a native of Yankee land, and was a Down-East Yankee, too, as his nasal twang and his every movement betrayed. He was a man of about forty years of age, and was a tall, thin, sharp-looking man, with a face that looked as if it had been whittled out of a piece of pine wood with a jack-knife, and had never been finished. He was a man who looked as if he had been born in a hurry, and had been left to grow up in his own way; so he grew like a tree in the forest, and not like a tree in a garden. He was a man who looked as if he had been born in a hurry, and had been left to grow up in his own way; so he grew like a tree in the forest, and not like a tree in a garden. He was a man who looked as if he had been born in a hurry, and had been left to grow up in his own way; so he grew like a tree in the forest, and not like a tree in a garden.

"Merry Christmas, old boy!" said Barty, in the surprise and consternation of Cheney, the proceeds of his father's daily truffle gradually became diminished. Had the demand for them lasts ceased? Other dealers appeared to flourish, and the old man's stock seemed always to be on hand. He gave us an explanation once in a rolling-off of his returns sometimes one reason and sometimes another. He had sold off at a low price, for fear of having his stock remain on his hands; he had lost the money; some rude boy had broken a window. He never drank, and he showed no signs of having exposited the mustache in any way; so poor Cheney, I fear, I suspect his father, or even to question him, only worked the harder, and waited for the future to make up for the past. Sometimes he tried to reduce the old man to change his business; suggested apple stalls or coal yards; but the old man had but one idea on this subject, and that was constancy, and to chestnuts he stuck, like their own jackets. There is a remarkable fact in our social history that the American chestnut is only thoroughly appreciated and eaten in the streets. Blandy's national prejudices would not admit of his dealing in foreign wares, the result was that during the autumn months his kiln-fires were more apparent than real, and this period was usually devoted to the development of his second original idea, namely, that he was a revolutionist of 1812.

Though Barty was old enough to have belonged to that interesting and warlike corps, yet for various reasons he could not legitimately claim the honour. The chief of these reasons was the fact that he had always been of so peaceful a turn of disposition that nothing short of invasion could have ever induced him to adopt a soldier's life. Further, at the period celebrated by the pompous orators and toasts who grace annually Broadway on Evacuation-day in all their glory, Barty was a mere infant in arms, and the period where rumors of wars never reached him. However, it is a lamentable fact that one of Cheney's principal sources of his success was the oppressing of the old man's anxious desire to provide around the veterans, or, in default of that, independently. Cheney occasionally laboured in situation in a store; but perhaps, after he had been in it for a day, he would be suddenly called to from his duties to behold the awful spectacle of his father marching stiffly into the store with a broomstick for a musket, and drilling sternly up to "Patchin!" This would never answer in a business household of a peaceful turn of mind, and after a few such experiences Cheney would lose his situation.

But the poor can almost always live in the midst of misfortune. It is when the cruel winter comes on that they suffer most.

Of late summer days Ike had not confined themselves to the summer, and once or twice Cheney had been obliged to extricate his father from the consequences of a fight he had been pummeling for a vagrant—a disgrace very hard for the poor lad to bear.

This winter they had suffered much. Cheney had shoveled snow, put in coal, blacked boots, and, in fact, done every thing possible to keep from starving; but the old man was evidently failing. Andy, the Irishman, was a generous old soul, and had occasionally helped them to the extent of his means; and so it had gone on until Christmas-eve. Barty had been celebrating his nativity all day, and late into the night. Cheney had made the crisp air ring with his shouts of "Oysters! Fine oysters!" until his voice at last was cracked. He had wandered into Broadway, and as he came down it he could see that his little pail he saw the richly dressed and comfortable-looking gentlemen and ladies, and young girls and boys, merry, ruling and waving, laughing and shouting. He saw the bright windows filled with toys and toys and all the delightful things, and the brilliant lights glancing through the frost on the glass; and so he had wandered on, with his pail in one hand and his eyes full, for he was only a boy, in spite of his twenty years—and he had sunk down in his weariness in the white flakes, and then he turned about and hurried after the old man. Barty was cold and queerish, but he was not the only very little child who, and for a wonder much of his stock was left: so Cheney got a fire in the little stove, and ordered his heavy load, and plodded on, wearied and miserable.

It was now very late; the snow fell silently and heavily; the few persons out passed rapidly along with muffled footsteps; and when father and son reached their little room it was midnight, for the bell of a neighboring church sounded the hour with a heavy clang, and afar off could be heard the sweet chimes of Trinity awakening the echoes in memory of the birthday of the Saviour.

They were so tired when they got in that they dropped down exhausted, and could not speak to have seen, Andy found them on Christmas morning; and so we return to the group we left in the little tenement-room. Cheney was making the fire with his last remaining bundle of wood, and as it brightened up the room assumed a more comfortable appearance. But the old man sat upon the side of the bed, humming a fragmentary little ditty, and looking straight out of the window, without seeing, however, even the snow that by banked up so heavily on the roofs of the opposite houses.

"An' what have ye got for breakfass?" said Andy. "It's little I receave, my way." Cheney reddened, and, going to the dresser, opened it, and took therefrom a loaf of bread and a piece of cold meat. These he laid on the table, and helping his father to a chair, seated himself, and was preparing to eat, when Andy broke in: "What's this? Why, ye be'r't to get a Christmas present for ye, bedad!" And he clumped out of the room and down the narrow staircase without further words.

In a few moments he returned, bringing with him a little jug of coffee, a heavy the Blandys had not tasted for many a long day. With this addition to his bill of fare Cheney made a comfortable breakfast, but the old man would taste nothing. Andy went away to his own establishment, and Cheney, after seeing his father as well disposed of as was possible under the circumstances—for he seemed too ill to go out—started off to shovel away the snow. Before he had breakfasted, it was yet but an hour or two after sunrise. The old man took his seat on the bedstead, and remained silent as he had awaken to before.

Hours went by, and there was no movement in the little room; then, suddenly rising, the old man moved unsteadily toward the dresser, and seemed to search for something. Presently he found an old school-book, and tearing from it a blank leaf, took a lead-pencil from the shelf, and slowly scrawled something on it, folded it up, and laid it on the table; then, taking his pocket-book in the hand, he sat as before, with his head bowed upon his breast, his hands clasped over his knees, and his eyes completely hidden. Meanwhile the fire in the little stove went out. Colder and colder grew the air: far below could be heard the sound of the bells of Christmas, and the glad shouts of children. Again the poor bent figure roused itself, but a sad change had gone over it. The head was raised, the hands clasped, the eyes, sunk deep under the wrinkled brows, could hardly be seen; they were motionless—some fearful thought, dimly struggling toward the light, had startled him. Slowly dropping on the floor, he was very long in getting back to the little stove; he paused there a moment; then the wizened it as if he were about to speak, but with his trembling, emaciated hands drew out a clumsily made yet quite hidden slide from one corner of the stove. Something was in that, he took from the cavity a small tin box, which he gently tapped: it contained a few coins, and a few bits of coarsest paper. With a bound the old man was on his feet: his eyes dilated; he grasped at a broom, and struggled for breath. He sunken fall—not very heavy—and the old chestnutseller was dead.

Hours passed by; all was still in the little room, save that at regular intervals there could have been heard a gentle tap, tapping upon the floor, and right below the old man's head, as it rested on his knee, there grew to be a round spot of dark and dull blood.

It was long past noon when a slow step ascended the staircase; the door opened, and Cheney entered.

He saw it all! He dead old father, for whom he had been so many long and weary years; the little stove, as it lay overturned by his side; the little pool of blood; and last, the folded paper on the table. He mechanically stepped forward and opened it. This is what it contained:

"For seven long years, I have walked as with a vice for you. My time is up. Pull out the left-hand lower corner of the stove, and you will find enough to bury me. Bless you heart! your poor old father to drop on you."

The little box by with its blackened contents on the floor, and the old man's mystery was solved at last.

Slowly the lad sank down beside his father—and the room was still. Still through the long afternoon—still in the twilight—still in Christmas night; and when the round red sun arose the next morning it was yet still, for there was no life there. Two of the apples of Sodom had fallen and the dead son, and the little stove with the dead fire.

THE HOUSE OF BOURBON.

In length of descent is a thing to be proud of, there ought to be no family more proud of Europe than that of Bourbon. Not only can they trace their line unbroken to Hugh Capet, the strongminded patriarch of the Capetian dynasty, but it leads through thirty generations of kings, princes, dukes, and lords, and, when a stream breaks off, to run through banks studded with castles of honor only just short of royal. Hugh Capet is the first name in the list, and we unhesitatingly tell we come to Louis the Ninth, the saint. Then we have the two great and warrior kings, which terminated in the children of Philip the Fair, and gave place to the house of Valois, which, in the person of Henry, the Bourbons came in. Robert, sixth son of Louis the Ninth, married Beatrix, heiress of that noble fief of Bourbon which lay in the centre of France, north of Auvergne and Guienne. From him sprung eight dukes of Bourbon—an unbroken, hard-fisted race, who were ever to the fore when fighting was going on, and always loyal to the house of which they were a part.

Antoine de Bourbon—a poor, irresolute creature—had "the grand game," when Henry IV. knew which side he was fighting for, nor which reliion he belonged to; dying, indeed, in a grievous perplexity whether he ought to call himself Catholic or Protestant—had the great grand luck to marry Jeanne d'Albret, daughter to the King of Navarre and his wife, Margaret of Valois, the author of the "Heptameron, and protector of all the speculators and free-thinkers of her free-thinking age. By greater luck still, he had for an only son the jolliest, if not greatest, of French kings—their fourth Henry—whose succession put the Bourbon family, for the first time, on the throne of France. His claims were threefold. Through his father, from Antoine de Bourbon, the Ninth; through his mother, from Charles the Fifth; and through his maternal great-grandfather from Louis the Tenth. In the next generation but one, the race splits up again. The brother of Louis the Fourteenth, the Duke of Orleans, was the first of the Orleans branch, which now survives in the children and grandchildren of Louis Philippe.

The Count de Chambord, the last surviving descendant in the direct line, is now in his sixty-of age, has been long married, without children. He is supported by a very small following in France, who cling to him from principle, and who will transfer their allegiance to the Orleans family as soon as he is out of the way. From time to time he puts his name to a document, which is drawn up and published to let people know he is still alive, and their duty to divine right; but it may very reasonably be supposed that he has long since given up all hope of succeeding to the throne. He seems to have inherited that character which is occasionally reproduced in the Bourbon family, of which the type is the indecisive and vacillating Antoine de Bourbon, father of Henry the Fourth. Such was Louis the Eighteenth, and such was the Dauphin, such Louis the Sixteenth. Their energy and bravery are dashed by a fatal hesitation; they dare, but they think too long about daring; they resolve, but too late; they act, when the time for action is past.

The Orleans branch has been in exile for twenty-two years, and has shown how adversity may be borne without loss of dignity. They have spent their time in travel, in study, in writing, and they have shown that, in intellect at least, there is one branch of the grand old house which is still ready to go to the front.

A TALE OF TWO CHRISTMASES.

I.

"So you've determined not to come and spend the Christmas vac. with us?"

"My dear old boy, if I do, it's good-by to my chance of a degree, and therefore a heavy blow to my hope of a fellowship."

The first speaker was Walter Cavey, heir to one of the richest brauxiteries in wealthy Beershire, and gentleman commoner of St. Cuthbert College, Oxford, on which fine old foundation his friend Charlie Brandreth was a scholar.

"Well, then, at all events you'll come and stay somewhere handy, so that you can spend your Christmas and New-Year's Day with us?"

"I say, you cannot cherry me off my work every day?" said Brandreth.

"No; pon honor, I won't. There's a farm of the governor's, Bishop's Climstoke, within ten miles from the nearest station, and that's an hour and a half from us. They're excellent people, and I will put you up capitally, and for a moderate screw. Say yes, and I'll write to old Dinsdale about it by this evening's post."

"It is a tempting idea. Are you sure there is nothing about the locality to keep a fellow from reading?"

"Not more than any other place on this jolly sphere. You know I'm no judge, as my old coach used to say, the only place where I should be likely to stick to reading would be Edinburgh. Lights blaze there, and I should have to promise not to fish."

"Well, I confess, with all my anxiety for a class, I don't quite like the notion of Christmas-day in Oxford and solitude; so I'll say yes."

The upshot of this conversation was that the beginning of the Christmas vac. found Brandreth comfortably established at Thornhay Farm, the retired little village of Bishop's Climstoke. He found the Dinsdales very agreeable people, and under supposed to his honor of their guest. The family consisted of old Dinsdale, an honest and energetic man, his wife, a very honest and easy-going body, and Rose, their daughter, a girl of about eighteen, and pretty enough to deserve to be, what Brandreth once suspected that she was, the belle of Bishop's Climstoke.

Brandreth had been drawn on by this and one orphan at an early age, with no kith or kin save an old bachelor uncle, who was his guardian until he came of age—an event which will hereafter place a couple of years before the date of this story. He had, therefore, never known what family kindness or attention; and the care and thought which Rose bestowed on him as their visitor came upon him with no less novelty than enjoyment. She, on the other hand, having been all her life accustomed only to the awkward homage of rustic admirers, was charmed with the refined and respectful attention which Brandreth unstudgingly paid to a woman.

It was hardly likely that such a state of feeling should remain at a fixed point, and it was scarcely probable that it would settle into satisfaction. It naturally deepened and strengthened. Brandreth, with a man's instinct of rivalry, could not bear to see a girl like Rose surrounded by such clowns as her village suitors; and taking advantage of his position as a visitor at her father's house, he contrived on all occasions to monopolize her, much to the chagrin of her rustic swains, but greatly to her satisfaction.

Poor Rose! her guileless and unsophisticated heart was no wrong, no danger, no inequality in their love. How could she fail to believe and return what she supposed to be an honest and honorable passion? What else could his attentions mean?

And now it was Christmas-eve, and he was about to start for Sir Ranulph Curew's, to spend his Christmas. Poor girl! though the separation would only be for a day, it seemed as if it was to be for ages. It was her first experience of the bitters of love.

She stood in the hall, waiting to see him off, with a sad heart, which sorely hindered her in her appointed task—the decoration of the old farm-house with evergreens.

At last Brandreth came down stairs equipped for his journey, which was to be only a cold one, as the winter had begun to set in severely.

"Good-by, Rosie! A merry Christmas to you," said he, kissing her.

"And to you too," said she, but in no very merry tone.

"So you're doing the decorations, eh? I shall take the privilege of the season."

He caught a bit of mistletoe, and holding it over her head bent down and kissed her.

It was the first time he had ever kissed her, and it should have been pleasant therefore. But it was not. As he drove away toward the station he reflected again and again on his folly in such an uncomfortable feeling, a self-reproachful dread.

Shall I tell you why? Because, when he stooped down to kiss her, she had not turned her head away or tried to escape. She had raised her face calmly and unconsciously to meet his lips with hers. It was so simply and trustfully done that there was nothing unmanly in the act, nothing which he should repent as a mean elation—in that kiss she had given him her heart. He felt he was a villain. He had won the poor child's affection by false pretense. He had blighted her happiness merely to gratify his vanity; for, of course, he had no intention, honorable, there could be nothing between them, their stations in life were so very different.

The line between the station at which he entered the train and that near Sir Ranulph's seat was one of the village of Bishop's Climstoke, and as he was whirled rapidly by it, and recognized many a familiar object, he could not help thinking what evil he had wrought in that quiet hamlet, and to the poor trusting girl who had given him her heart.

Before long, however, he found himself at Sir Ranulph's hospitable mansion, where, in the pleasure of meeting Walter, and in the jollity of the season, he soon forgot his remorse, and dismissed the subject of his conduct from his mind.

It was a thoroughly old-fashioned Christmas, kept up in the regular old-fashioned style. There was a side-big dinner, there was a party of mummers was held on the capacious hearth, and games to blind-man's-buff and hot cockles indulged. There were big flakes of snow coming down the while chimney, and they sputtered and hissed in the huge fire on the hearth.

A week passed pleasantly enough, and perhaps only a week. Brandreth had formed a strong resolution to make up his mind to tear himself away and get back to his books. His difficulty in doing so was the apprehension of the fact that his friend's only sister, Edith, showed a decided preference for the visitor, and that he was not at all delighted to foster, and upon which Brandreth could not help fancying neither her father nor mother looked with favorable eyes.

However, by a strong effort he resisted the spell, and on the day after Boxing Day, he announced to the tutor on the return journey to Bishop's Climstoke. As he passed the village inn-door, he saw a cart had just stopped when he left it came back to him again vividly. He could not help reproaching himself for his folly in not Edith's kind reason to Rose. And yet, after all, how could that be? Rose and he had simply indulged in a passing whim, and neither of any thing serious between them!

But when he arrived at the farm he found the Dinsdales in sore distress and consternation. Rose had gone that morning early to visit her grandmother, who lived about half a mile on the other side across the moor. At mid-day—though Brandreth had been too much occupied with his thoughts to heed—Rose had not returned. Search was made, and

CHRISTMAS IN THE SOUTH.—EGG-NOG PARTY.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

CHRISTMAS IN THE SOUTH—YOUNG FOLKS CELEBRATING THE DAY.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

CHRISTMAS MORN.

"GOOD-WILL to all!" See, the gold rays fall
Of the rising sun on the caves,
And the holly shakes as the glad day breaks,
And he rustles his shining leaves;

The thick berries red on his spike-crowned head
Nod welcome out to the morn
Of the day of days when, mid pæans of praise,
The Saviour of man was born.

The eyes bend low o'er the drifted snow
And their green anna creak and sway,
As the look-out freeze stirs the grand old trees,
And they chant the hymn of the day:

"Good-will to all!" in the cottage small,
Where the brown-cheeked children shout;
"Good-will to all!" in the palace hall,
Where the greetings of kings ring out.

What though no more bare for the dead gone year
Be mixed with our smiles to-night?
It is ever so on our earth below—
After shadows comes light!

"Good-will to all!" And a guerdon small,
A silver fee for my song;
Oh, on this glad day let us turn away
Not one, not one, from our door!

Your hands, dear sisters! Thou too, my brother!
Let our petty discords cease.
The old year dies out 'mid our parting shout,
Let it go, let it go in peace!

CAPTAIN DENISON'S AFFINITY.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

CAPTAIN HUGH CRAIGLIE DENISON was a gentleman Britain. He was a young man of good heart, good abilities, more than average culture, and very ample and formal manners. After the close of the American civil war he came out to the United States, following a stream of his countrymen, who, as they do, for the first time, some actual and genuine knowledge about the extraordinary expanse which had so strangely distended one of the British Philistine's cherished articles of faith by refusing to burst up according to all sound predictions and intuitive perception of British Philistinism. Now our captain was not by nature or training a Philistine; but he had some of the Philistine's prejudices about him, and he was especially settled in his mind as to the inferiority of the citizen of woman. Captain Hugh Denison hated the very mention of woman's rights. His idea of a well-bred and lady-like woman was that of a graceful and elegant doll person who rarely spoke, and when she did speak, uttered only some becoming commonplace, to which no investigation could detect an idea, and with which reference itself could not desire to quarrel.

In fact, the properest thing a woman could do was to do nothing—or as little as possible—and to do nothing out of the way in common. A woman of conversational talent, displaying honestly her capacity, our captain would have set down in such a case category as a bullet-girl displaying her legs. In fact, no matter how useful or charming a woman's talents might be, they were, in Captain Denison's estimation, like her lower limbs, to be kept always from the public observation.

Of course Captain Denison knew that, when visiting the United States, he would be likely, some time or other, to meet some of the fair advocates of the rights of women. Indeed, he had something like a timid and doubtful curiosity about them, as one has about seeing a ghost or a muzzled bear. He dreaded yet wished to meet a few of the creatures. He took it for granted that they all were trowsers, and—well, let us say nothing more.

Captain Denison saw a little of the outer and inner life of two or three of the largest cities, and was, like most Englishmen of any observation, a little disappointed on finding how very like the interior, at least, was to that of Anglo-Saxon cities across the water. His letters of introduction brought him into the society of steady-going, respectable, mildly fashionable people, who were in the habit of visiting England pretty often themselves, and had English friends about them. Captain Denison sat at many dinner-tables in New York which were splendid and quiet and formal and stupid enough even for London. On general subjects the opinions he heard expressed quite coincided with his own; and as he thought he clearly understood why the Northern States were great in war—"they are just like ourselves," Denison said to himself, with satisfaction and pride.

Sometimes the question of woman's rights was broached, and Captain Denison found that on this subject, too, his own views were exactly those of the people with whom he exactly mixed. Women who talked of their rights were incessantly coarse, vulgar, hard, unfeminine, unsexed creatures. None of his friends had ever met any of them, and knew something about them in the newspapers. In fact, though he once seemed to have a clear and decided opinion about the appearance and habits of the creatures, yet the women did not seem to be visible in any place on which the sunshine of society ever shone, and Captain Denison began to set them down as a race of beings who led a subterranean existence, or only came out at night, and in dark, mysterious places.

Please don't set down Captain Denison as a fool or a pig. He was neither: had not a spark of the nature of either in his composition. He was only an able and well-read man who had had but limited means of observation, and had easy prejudices and national prejudices. He had many long and interesting conversations with some Americans well qualified to instruct him, and he was quite open to instruction on most subjects. One of the men he liked best and met oftener of late was Julius Wynter, a retired merchant, who had a pleasant place far away in the country, whither he always fled when New York became hot and dull. Denison much liked both Mr. and Mrs. Wynter, and found pleasure and profit in their society. So when it came to be "the month of roses," Captain Denison cordially accepted a pressing invitation to spend a few days with the Wynters at their country place somewhere among the mountains. A day was fixed, and the visitor received an elaborate carte du pays. He was to go a certain distance by steamer, then a certain distance by railway, and then a carriage was to meet him and convey him on to Wynterwood, the residence of his host and hostess.

By some mischance Captain Denison failed to get the steamer at the right hour, and so had to take an evening boat instead of one starting at noon. Therefore, of course, the whole programme of his arrival was deranged. When the Wynters' carriage came for him he was not there; when it came out of the station a rare carriage awaited him. The Wynters assumed that he were not coming by that train, waited stood, portmantuas in hand, at a low, half-finished railway station; there was no one to receive him; the day was hot, and Palewood was six miles off.

There was only one vehicle of any kind near the station when Denison got out, and that was a pretty pony carriage. Denison at first had some hope that it might prove to be the carriage of his friends, and to be waiting for him, but it was not so. A young lady got out of the pony trap into the carriage. She took the reins into her own hands from those of the driver, and off went the sweet little animal. A man of Captain Denison's age never fails, in whatever perplexity, to look at a young woman. Denison saw that she was petite, pretty, bright-eyed creature with delicately formed features and fair hair.

Denison looked at the pony, but only looked at him. He was evidently a stranger, and in some sort of a fix. He was not relieved giving the word of departure to her ponies.

Our captain began to ask about the way to Fedville, about the possibility of getting a carriage to go there, over which progress the functionary in charge of the station shook doubtfully. The lady in the pony carriage heard the conversation, and called out, in a clear, ringing voice, not high-pitched, but with a little strain in it:

"Are you going to Palewood, Sir? A friend of Mr. Wynter's? If so, I am going there, and shall be delighted to take you."

Denison took off his hat, thanked her, expressed his pleasure and his gratitude, and then of course only too happy to accept her offer. Girls in the old land don't invite strangers to drive with them, even when they are well known. Denison, grateful and glad though he was, could not help thinking that in this case, however, the difference of manners was so entirely to his advantage that he almost approved of it.

"Get right in, Sir," the young lady encouraged gaily, said. Captain Denison accepted the invitation, and got in. He was not sure whether it was the "right in" and the "Sir," which are unfamiliar words under such circumstances in England. He got right in, and sat near the pretty girl. Really she was very pretty, and even a stolid Englishman could not help thinking of the sort—must have been glad to sit by her side.

He offered, of course, to relieve her of the trouble of driving. She declined politely, but he didn't know the way; next that the road was very steep, and he thought somewhat unmanageable for a stranger; finally, that he could take the reins from the black servant because she spoiled like to drive. So she took the reins, and they rattled away; and our Briton began to think his position at least as pleasant as it was decided odd.

The young lady had plenty of talk; and her talk was animated, and even interesting, and Captain Denison, despite his recorded admiration of silence in women, found himself much delighted with the conversation of this young woman; and, more than that, he began to be quite pleased with the book that was opening nice in himself conversational resources the existence whereof he had never before suspected. Delicious was the day, delicious the drive, delicious the road lay through a beautiful country, through woodland groves of lofty trees, by streamlets through the foliage of cedar and tulip-tree and hickory and oak. His companion pointed his attention to one thing and was especially anxious that he had something interesting to say about this glade and that brook and another beyond among the trees, and had questions to ask of him about England's trees and landscape and social life, which also had their use, and the conversation never flagged. In England Captain Denison was always found a it a bevy ordeal to have to talk to girls.

Something or other brought up an allusion to woman's rights. The young lady seemed anxious to express his profound and proper contempt for all such unfeminine pursuits.

"Have you met any of our leading women—those who advocate women's rights, I mean?" asked the young lady, very curiously of him, with an odd expression in her bright eyes.

"And you?" he asked, meets them, I believe. They are all dreadful creatures." He would not quite eloquent in denouncing them.

"And you?" she said, "have you met any of our leading women?" he answered, "I have not had the pleasure of meeting any of them, and I am not sorry for it. I should not like to see one of the wrongs of her suffering sisters—I think that is the correct phrase—yes, of her suffering sisters?"

"Didn't know, I'm sure. I hope she is not any thing of the kind."

"Past hope, Sir; she is. I should not wonder if she had several distinguished representative women to meet you."

"Oh, pray don't."

"Yes, I think it quite likely. I fancy I heard something about a convention in the village yonder, but I don't quite recollect the date. This is Mr. Wynter's. It is not a charming place?"

The servant had got down and flung open the gate, and the carriage drove up a beautiful avenue and on to a lawn. The house, which stood upon the lawn, and from the "stoop" of which one had glimpses of a lovely river, and of blue, distant hills, was a large, handsome, irregular, picturesque structure, all windows, verandas, gables, porticoes, and trellises, flaming with bright creeping plants.

Mr. and Mrs. Wynter had come forth, with the genial and hospitable ways of the country to receive their visitors at the door.

"I have found your friend," said the young lady, "and now pray do make us acquainted, for I have not yet the pleasure of knowing his name."

"You are always doing good of some kind, Julia Eeslyn," said Mrs. Wynter, as she cordially kissed the girl; and then the regular presentations were gone through; and soon after the party broke up, to meet again at dinner-time. Captain Denison found that his pretty friend, Miss Julia Eeslyn, was to be a guest in the house for some days, at which he was greatly pleased. She was not to him at dinner, and they renewed their conversation after dinner, especially.

Suddenly Miss Eeslyn, now addressing her careless, who was at the other side of Captain Denison, said:

"I am sorry to tell you, Mrs. Wynter, that Captain Denison has a worse than even British prejudice against the advocates of women's rights. He poured out a mine of vituperation against them, against the whole movement and its champions as we came along to-day."

"I have not, then converted," said Mrs. Wynter, graciously. "He comes here at a very favorable moment. I am happy to say. Captain Denison, that I expect the honor of a visit from some of the most distinguished advocates of women's suffrage in the state now here. I thought you would be glad to meet them."

Captain Denison looked miserable out, "very happy, I'm sure," and shuddered, and broke down.

He forgot his alarm, however, in the enjoyment of a delicious walk in the shrubbery, just at the close of dinner, and evening, with Miss Eeslyn. Frank and fearless, the well educated American girls of her class, she was easy, happy, and unconstrained in the society of this English stranger; and the English stranger liked her society amazingly.

Mr. Wynter joined them after a while, and Miss Eeslyn returned to the house. Wynter and his guest walked and smoked through the grounds until it was quite dark, and then returned to the drawing-room.

Miss Eeslyn was gone; and Captain Denison on entering saw, as he thought, a small, slight, female figure, dressed in white, sitting back to the fire-place. There was no one else but Mrs. Wynter in the room. When our hero entered she rose, and said:

"I am so glad you have come, Captain Denison, I really do, and at once to give girl. Really she was very pretty, and even a stolid Englishman could not help thinking of the sort—must have been glad to sit by her side.

He offered, of course, to relieve her of the trouble of driving. She declined politely, but he didn't know the way; next that the road was very steep, and he thought somewhat unmanageable for a stranger; finally, that he could take the reins from the black servant because she spoiled like to drive. So she took the reins, and they rattled away; and our Briton began to think his position at least as pleasant as it was decided odd.

The young lady had plenty of talk; and her talk was animated, and even interesting, and Captain Denison, despite his recorded admiration of silence in women, found himself much delighted with the conversation of this young woman; and, more than that, he began to be quite pleased with the book that was opening nice in himself conversational resources the existence whereof he had never before suspected. Delicious was the day, delicious the drive, delicious the road lay through a beautiful country, through woodland groves of lofty trees, by streamlets through the foliage of cedar and tulip-tree and hickory and oak. His companion pointed his attention to one thing and was especially anxious that he had something interesting to say about this glade and that brook and another beyond among the trees, and had questions to ask of him about England's trees and landscape and social life, which also had their use, and the conversation never flagged. In England Captain Denison was always found it a bevy ordeal to have to talk to girls.

Something or other brought up an allusion to woman's rights. The young lady seemed anxious to express his profound and proper contempt for all such unfeminine pursuits.

"Have you met any of our leading women—those who advocate women's rights, I mean?" asked the young lady, very curiously of him, with an odd expression in her bright eyes.

"And you?" he answered, "I have not had the pleasure of meeting any of them, and I am not sorry for it. I should not like to see one of the wrongs of her suffering sisters—I think that is the correct phrase—yes, of her suffering sisters?"

"Didn't know, I'm sure. I hope she is not any thing of the kind."

"Past hope, Sir; she is. I should not wonder if she had several distinguished representative women to meet you."

"Oh, pray don't."

"Yes, I think it quite likely. I fancy I heard something about a convention in the village yonder, but I don't quite recollect the date. This is Mr. Wynter's. It is not a charming place?"

The servant had got down and flung open the gate, and the carriage drove up a beautiful avenue and on to a lawn. The house, which stood upon the lawn, and from the "stoop" of which one had glimpses of a lovely river, and of blue, distant hills, was a large, handsome, irregular, picturesque structure, all windows, verandas, gables, porticoes, and trellises, flaming with bright creeping plants.

Mr. and Mrs. Wynter had come forth, with the genial and hospitable ways of the country to receive their visitors at the door.

"I have found your friend," said the young lady, "and now pray do make us acquainted, for I have not yet the pleasure of knowing his name."

"You are always doing good of some kind, Julia Eeslyn," said Mrs. Wynter, as she cordially kissed the girl; and then the regular presentations were gone through; and soon after the party broke up, to meet again at dinner-time. Captain Denison found that his pretty friend, Miss Julia Eeslyn, was to be a guest in the house for some days, at which he was greatly pleased. She was not to him at dinner, and they renewed their conversation after dinner, especially.

Suddenly Miss Eeslyn, now addressing her careless, who was at the other side of Captain Denison, said:

"I am sorry to tell you, Mrs. Wynter, that Captain Denison has a worse than even British prejudice against the advocates of women's rights. He poured out a mine of vituperation against them, against the whole movement and its champions as we came along to-day."

"I have not, then converted," said Mrs. Wynter, graciously. "He comes here at a very favorable moment. I am happy to say. Captain Denison, that I expect the honor of a visit from some of the most distinguished advocates of women's suffrage now here. I thought you would be glad to meet them."

Captain Denison looked miserable out, "very happy, I'm sure," and shuddered, and broke down.

He forgot his alarm, however, in the enjoyment of a delicious walk in the shrubbery, just at the close of dinner, and evening, with Miss Eeslyn. Frank and fearless, the well educated American girls of her class, she was easy, happy, and unconstrained in the society of this English stranger; and the English stranger liked her society amazingly.

Mr. Wynter joined them after a while, and Miss Eeslyn returned to the house. Wynter and his guest walked and smoked through the grounds until it was quite dark, and then returned to the drawing-room.

Miss Eeslyn was gone; and Captain Denison on entering saw, as he thought, a small, slight, female figure, dressed in white, sitting back to the fire-place. There was no one else but Mrs. Wynter in the room. When our hero entered she rose, and said:

"I am so glad you have come, Captain Denison, I really do, and at once to give girl. A distinguished country woman of mine, one of the most celebrated advocates of justice to a trampled sex! Mrs. Carnifex Mango, who is about to endeavor to you Captain Denison, of the British army."

Captain Denison bowed and trembled. He had calmly and with unshaking hand lighted a fresh cigar just before taking his place at the head of the dinner-table to nourish the Britain; his cool composure never once failed him through all the terrors of the Cawspence; but he looked at Mrs. Carnifex Mango, and his eyes swam and his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth.

Mrs. Carnifex Mango was a stout woman, with great mass of row-like hair falling over her shoulders. She wore spectacles and a black coat, something like a trunwear's sailing. "I look down toward his feet," says Othello, "but that's a fable." No; beneath the skirts of the long gabardine flowed a pair of unmistakable, the article of dress which an Englishwoman is only allowed to wear in connection with her husband's boots. Mrs. Carnifex Mango stood before our hero in trowsers!

A Britisher!" exclaimed Mrs. Mango, in a loud, harsh voice, and with a dash of pity and contempt in her tone. "And pray, Sir, how does the present progress in Britain? How is your J. S. Mill?"

Captain Denison stammered out a modest admission that he had not any personal acquaintance with that illustrious man, and that he did not know much of the progress of the movement—in fact, what movement?

"What movement!" exclaimed Mrs. Mango looking for a moment upward and then up toward heaven. "What movement, the prejudiced ask for a proof of despotism asks of free citizens." The movement, Sir, is the emancipation of the nobler sex from the iron grasp of a debasing tyranny! The movement, Sir, which is to restore woman to herself, which is to enable her to fulfil the glorious mission for which God and nature destined her!" The movement, Sir, which is to raise up oppressed and injured woman and place her by the side of man—her—"

Perceiving that the contrast passed for a word, Captain Denison good-naturedly but feebly suggested "her husband," but Mrs. Carnifex Mango waved away the unhappy suggestion, and went on:

"Place her firmly on her true pedestal! You, Sir, you, I perceive, one of those who are prejudiced against women—"

"Oh dear, no, I do assure you," Denison faintly interposed.

"Your own desperation, Sir, has perverted and destroyed your moral nature. Say, Sir, by what right you claim to dominate over the suffering sex?"

"Never did any thing of the kind! Won't upon my honor," pleaded the luckless British officer.

"I perceive, Sir, that you are not acquainted with the bearings of this great question. It is, then, my duty, as one who has taken a conspicuous part in its promulgation, to endeavor to enlighten an ignorant stranger. It is my duty, Sir, and, difficult as the task may be, ungrateful as the task may be, I will endeavor, Sir, to enlighten you."

So she did. She endeavored to enlighten him. She addressed him at great length, and with immense volubility of words and vehemence of nature. The captain was crushed. By the time she had closed he felt quite broken and spiritless.

"Wonderful woman," said Mrs. Wynter, after the eloquent Mango had taken her departure.

"Splendid intellect," said Mr. Wynter.

"I've seen a good deal of her, you know," said Miss Eeslyn, who just now entered the room. "Why do people have headaches at wrong times? Were you not struck after, Captain Denison?"

"Very much indeed," replied the captain.

"Then, her manners are very graceful and gentle! Nothing unladylike or prononce about her." None of our lady reformers are, perhaps, a little marked and uncommon in manner, but Mrs. Carnifex Mango is perfection."

"And yet," said Mrs. Wynter, thoughtfully, "I doubt if Miss Athene Puffin will not impress Mrs. Carnifex Mango more deeply."

"Impossible, I think," murmured Captain Denison.

He had some conversation that night with Miss Eeslyn, and grew more and more charmed with her green, her animation, her culture, and refinement. "In the name of all the Philistines of mouse," he asked of his own soul, "how can this charming and intellectual creature endure such a hideous monstrosity as Mrs. Carnifex Mango?"

It was about the talk of the following evening that our hero had the happiness of being presented to Miss Athene Puffin. Bad as Mrs. Carnifex Mango was, Miss Athene Puffin showed even more appalling in the captain's perplexed and distressed eyes. She had not, indeed, moustached petticoats; but she wore those garments so hideously lank and long that they were rather suggestive of feminine grace than aught else. Mango's pantaloons. Her hair was screwed up in an extraordinary mass, or mop, under an immense hat; and the not only revealed her eyes under spectacles, but concealed them under green spectacles. She bowed a solemn bow when Captain Denison was presented to her, and heaved a sigh. Then she began:

"You are from England, Sir, and seeking, I hope, for the truth?"

"Well—not at least I hope so, madam."

"Where have you sought it, Sir?"

A puzzling question, truly! Captain Denison began to talk himself, in hurried mental examination, where he had been seeking for the truth. Well, he had been reading the daily papers; he had been talking with no end of people; he had been—

Athene Puffin lofty waved away his attempted explanations with a grand gesture of the hand.

"Truth, Sir, must be sought of woman. Of woman, Sir! In the Sierras! The new gospel comes from woman. She is nature's lost and misunderstood child. She is nature's gift effort. With her the divine intuition supplies the place of the inadequate, played-out reason which man boasts of. Sir, has reason been found? Of course, Sir, you admit the natural and destined supremacy of woman?"

"Oh yes! He was prepared to take his oath of that.

"Have you considered, Sir, the eternal relations of woman with the infinite?"

Captain Denison, exactly considered them, stammered the wretched Britton, but he began to go to work at considering them at once.

Miss Eeslyn came near and smiled with an air of sadness and superiority.

Captain Denison could not inform those relationships. His grosser nature is strangers to that sublime task. Woman must aid him and guide him upward. Let her, then willing, Sir, to be guided upward?

"I not very high," the captain tried to say.

"I am sure Captain Denison will be only too happy to receive guidance," interposed Mrs. Wynter, very kind. She and her husband were hanging on the words which fell from Athene's inspired lips.

"Good Heavens!" thought Denison, "how much I have been mistaken in these people! I thought them so intellectual and refined, and they are content with this hideous creature and her mad jargon!" In his agony he looked wildly around for Julia Eeslyn, but she was nowhere to be seen.

"Because, then," said Athene, rising majestically from her seat—" choose a spiritual guide of the superior sex to enlighten and instruct you during your stay in this place. She will, if she be true to her mission—and any woman under this hallowed roof must be true—she will arouse your sleeping intuitions, and open for you your spiritual eyes. Think of the noble women you are privileged to meet here. Think of the deep insight of Rachel Wynter, the sublime affinities of Carnifex Mango, the—"

"The sanctified aspirations of Athene Puffin," interposed Mrs. Wynter. And she added in an undertone, meant for our hero, "Nonsense, Athene Puffin! Don't lose such a chance! Let her be your guide."

A bright idea lit up Denison's distracted mind. "No, thanks!" he exclaimed, hurriedly; "I fear I am not quite up to the mark of these gifted women. Their intellect would rather appall me. I should prefer one of a—I know I shouldn't. But if I must choose, I think I should like for my guide and elevator—is that the word?—or my affinity, or whatever it is, the young lady who was here just now—Miss Evelyn."

A burst of laughter from both host and hostess saluted this sudden and rash proposal, and Athene shrank back as if overwhelmed with confusion. Indeed, she turned round, and seemed as if about to hurry from the room. But to Denison's horror, Mr. Wynter sprang from his seat, ran to place himself between her and the door, and actually seized the divine Athene's hat—nay, and her hair also, and pulled both from her sublime head. And behold there was no Athene Puffin any longer visible; and there stood in her place, with flowing cheeks, head thrown back, and hair falling over her shoulders, the graceful, vivacious Miss Evelyn herself.

"Please, Captain Denison, do forgive me!" she pleaded when she had a little recovered her composure. "It was a dreadful piece of work of mine, concocted in concert with Mr. and Mrs. Wynter. I am a fierce champion, in my own heart, of the rights of women, and I wanted to punish you for setting all such persons down as hideous old frights. And I had some idea that you might even take the thing so completely au sérieux as to write a book on Amazons, and declare at least a whole chapter to Mrs. Carnifex Mango and Miss Athene Puffin, as types of American womanhood; and that would have been such delightful fun for us here who were in the secret."

"Have you seen Mrs. Carnifex Mango too?"

"I was. Did I do it well?"

"Need I answer? Didn't you utterly deceive and bewilder me?"

"Oh, I am so glad! But you forgive me, after all, and you won't believe our typical American women are all Mrs. Mangos and Miss Puffins any more?"

Captain Denison gave his full forgiveness, and pledged himself never again to believe in Mangos and Puffins as representatives of transatlantic womanhood in America. He has, moreover, given practical proof of his appreciation of American womanhood by falling profoundly in love with Julia Evelyn, and finally persuading her to marry him. He has, in fact, found his affinity.

KING WILLIAM AND THE SOLDIER.

A Brunswick paper gives an anecdote illustrating the King of Prussia's kind-heartedness. A soldier from Stargard, in Mecklenburg, is on outpost before Paris. Here he received a letter from home, and, as he had been a long time without news, he could not refrain from opening it immediately. In reading it he became so absorbed that he had not seen that the post had passed around him. Suddenly he heard a noise, looked up, and perceived the King and General Moltke with their retinue. Startled, he let the letter fall, and gave the customary salute. The King remarking his anxiety and confusion, stopped up to him in a friendly way, and asked, "Well, my letter from your mother-heart?" "No, your Majesty, from my father," he replied. "May I read the letter, or are there secrets in it?" asked the King. "There is nothing secret in it," said the King, who turned to his suit and read, inter alia, as follows: "In a fortnight your sister's wedding comes off; we shall all greatly miss you on that day, but your old mother is most of all vexed at not seeing you here. It does not matter, however; only go to the French in earnest, so that the insatiable mouth of these fellows may be very soon stopped." The King returned the letter and rode on. No long time elapsed before the soldier was relieved from his post. He received fourteen days' furlough, and was able, at the King's expense, to make a journey to Mecklenburg and attend the wedding.

PURGED IN THE FIRE.

A Christmas Story.

"Uncle Herbert, will you tell us a Christmas story? Please, do!" The speaker was only a little maid of six years old, and a dozen voices echoed the request.

It was Christmas, and we were gathered, according to time-honored custom, round a blazing fire under my grandfather's roof. We were a merry party, comprising some fifteen persons of all ages, with their respective parents, and a few married and unmarried uncles and aunts. Uncle Herbert, otherwise Mr. Herbert Milward, was our uncle by marriage only, as the husband of our aunt Alice; but though there was no kindness related to us, I think he was, with the younger ones at any rate, the best-beloved of all. Perhaps because he had no children of his own, he was always specially sympathetic in youthful troubles, and especially lenient to youthful misdoings.

However grave the offence, we were always sure of Uncle Herbert's intercession; and he never failed privately to admonish the offender—very gently, but so gravely and seriously that his quiet words would bring one to bow too proud to weep under the severest punishment, and cause the most rebellious spirit to submission and repentance. He could be very merry at times; but there was a gravity mingled even with his merriment, as of one to whom the more solemn aspects of life are always present. His devotion to his wife was remarkable, even to one youthful eyes. No one could say that his affection was demonstrative, and yet no one could be in the company of the two together, even for an hour, without feeling that Aunt Alice was more precious to her husband than any thing else in the world. Wherever his eyes wandered, they always seemed to come back to her as their resting-place; and however deeply, to all appearance, he might be engrossed in conversation with others, he was always able, by some magical process of intuition, to divine her wants or wishes and silently to supply them. Her fare was the warmest, her silks the softest; nothing was too costly, no trouble too great, that ministered to her pleasure. There seemed to be no such thing as forgetting, no possibility of mistake, wherever she was concerned. If she had found a footwarmer elsewhere, and had good fairies constantly attending her, she could hardly have been better cared for. Nor was Aunt Alice behindhand in returning her husband's devotion. She was many years older than she, but I fancy the difference in their ages was only to say that she spoke and pleasure in his love. She never did any thing (indeed she had no need) to test or draw attention to his devotion, but she quietly shamed herself to his tender care. She seldom thanked him in words, at least in public language, but she was thanked enough by the look of perfect love and perfect repose that was the habitual expression of her gentle gray eyes.

On the present occasion Uncle Herbert was seated in a high-backed carven chair, with Aunt Alice on a footstool beside him, and the rest of the party grouped around in a semicircle before the blazing fire. The candles were not yet lighted, but the dancing flame shed a ruddy light throughout the room, flowing into and filling the carved work of the oaken furniture, and brightening with a genial glow the red berries and dark green leaves of the Christmas evergreens. It was just the moment for a fireside story, and as Uncle Herbert was known to be learned in legends and German fairy-tales, which he was wont to narrate with much quiz humor, our little cousins were eager in their appeal. Uncle Herbert did not immediately reply, but sat contemplatively reflecting, with his eyes on the roaring fire-light, playing over his face, shewed us that he was in a serious mood. Aunt Alice glanced up at him inquiringly; but I thought to myself that I had never seen her bright young face (for she was many years younger than the rest of our aunts and uncles) look more perfectly beautiful than it did that night; and I caught myself wondering how it was possible that I ever came to pass that she should have married one so much older, and so little remarkable, as Uncle herself, as sober grey-headed Uncle Herbert.

"Well, my dears," said Uncle Herbert at last, "I will tell you a story, a true story. I don't think it is quite what you mean by a Christmas story: but the events about which I am going to tell you happened at Christmas-time, on the very night indeed, twenty-seven years ago."

We all settled down to listen, and, after a minute's pause, he went on:—

"It was Christmas-eve, or rather Christmas-day, for we had left the ball-room before the people left in the streets were getting gradually fewer and fewer, and the last stragglers had left licensen and the waits would shortly have London to themselves. It was a bitter cold night, and snow was falling fast. Not that most of the houses were dark and silent, though here and there lights were out, and the sound of music and of happy voices showed where a household was seeing Christmas in, and giving a merry welcome to the happy season. The moon, brilliantly lighted house in one of the West End streets there came a young man, who looked up and down intently with wine, and his face was contracted with a look of hopeless despair. And little was he for those whom he had just left was a noted gaming-house. He had been tempted by some companions, and had ventured more than he could afford, and had lost. Not only his money, but his character, which, when he expected to be able to restore it secretly, he had thought of as nothing. And now he was ruined, and by the basest means. He knew now that, disguise it as he might, the taint and pain of his punishment. Already he felt its imagination the office's hand upon his collar, the handcuffs on his wrists. He could see the astonished looks of those he had fancy to his crime; he could hear the voice of the judge pronouncing sentence on him. And if he dared not meet the consequences of his sin, and in his mad despair, fearing to face offended man, he had dared to sin against God, and the presence of an offended God. He was now hurrying home to his father's house, not daring to the drought that brings the awful sleep whose waking is eternity. With his hands clenched, and his head bared to the cold, he hurried on. He was rushing madly on, when he heard a sound of shouting, and suddenly he found himself stopped. He looked up, and saw that the sky above him was red with a lurid glare; and then a moment's sound like a distant rumble, and then a shout was on fire in one of the streets through which he had just passed. He was seized with a fit of reprieve, he turned aside—turned aside from the road to his death—to see the sight. He ran through the streets, through the crowd, which gave way right and left at the pressure of his muscular arms. Then he came to the burning house, had been somehow got out, and now stood half naked and shivering in the street. All, it was thought, were safe; but just as he reached the group there was a fearful shriek, for it was found that there was one, the youngest, missing. The poor mother sobbed and screamed, and was only held back by force from re-entering the burning house, and perishing with her little one. The father, wringing his hands like one distracted, offered a thousand pounds to the firemen, if they would but rescue his child.

"It can't be done, Sir," said one of them; 'not if you said a hundred thousand, it couldn't be done. The floors will fall in in five minutes, and it's certain death to enter that house again.'

"The red flame was already shining through the first-floor windows, and through the open door could be heard the roaring of the fire, which was fast gaining hold upon the staircase. A thought flashed across the young man's mind. His minutes were numbered, his life was worthless; its last act should be a worthy one, and if he perished in the flames, he would be guilty of one sin the less. With quick eager questions he ascertained where the child was. The fireman guessed his intention, and held him back.

"'Don't go, Sir, for God's sake! it's waiting two lives instead of one. We're not cowards, Sir, but this is certain death. If you attempt it, the Lord have mercy on your soul!'

"'Amen!' said the young man; and throwing off the hands that held him back, he rushed into the house and disappeared.

"The fire was raging on the first-floor, the child was on the second. The first-floor landing was already in flames, but the young man, with a firm step, sprang past the burning spot, and in another second was in the room where the child lay. The room was already filled with the flames and here and there the flames were darting through the crevices of the flooring. He could see the door, but a little flame frightened voice, sobbing 'Papa, dear papa, do come, papa!' guided him to the spot where the child lay. 'Don't be frightened,' he said, 'don't be frightened, dear.' He did not, he thought, he would not tell the little one in the blanket, and began to retrace his perilous route. Quick, however, as he had been, the flames had gained upon him, and were at his feet as he stepped over the burning floor. He rushed to the window, thinking that even the fall from it he might escape that way; but pouring from the windows below him was a sheet of flame. The burning staircase was the only road. Then his handkerchief round his mouth and nose, to keep out the suffocating smoke, he appeared his way to the door. To his horror, he heard a crash—one half of the staircase had gone.

"A deadly terror seized upon him; the last hope of escape was lost. The life which a few minutes since had seemed a burden too heavy to bear, suddenly grew unutterably precious. His eyes were blinded, his throat scorched by the black smoke, and he felt that he was dying, and leaping up around him, seeking to devour him. With awful distinctness all the evil of his life, all the sins of his youth, passed in review, shone out clear as noonday before his eyes. Instruction wasted, good deeds neglected, good resolutions broken, rose up before him; and one and all seemed to sing him down—lost, lost, lost for ever! And he was lost, lost since he had not dared to live, now he did not dare to die. Suddenly, in the midst of his despair, returned strength. Threading his way through the flames, which were now rising all around him, he crept to the back of the room, and then, grasping his broken hand-rail, swung himself over, and dropped on to the first step, a depth of some fifteen feet, into the hall below. Fearfully burned, he had just strength—still holding his burden in his left arm—to stagger into the street, and fall senseless into the fireman's arms.

"He was carried to a neighbored between life and death, in the intensest physical and mental agony. For the most part of the time he was delirious, and raved of the horrors of that awful moment when, standing on the brink of death, he had looked over into the abyss of eternity. As he regained his reason a new terror came to him, the dread of the consequences of his crime. He was awake when the first step of the officers of justice at his bedside, waiting to carry him before the judge. But this last fear had lost its keenest sting; being, as it were, swallowed up in his overwhelming thankfulness at having been saved from the jaws of death, and in the sense he knows no repentance. On his bed of pain he prayed as never before—prayed as the publican prayed, and was heard; and by the time he was able to sit upright, he was ready to endure without murmuring the shame and pain of his punishment. For some weeks the evil day was delayed; but at last, as he was beginning to regain strength, a writ was served upon him, and he employer entered the room. With a beating heart, but still resigned, he felt that his hour was come, and prepared himself to meet it. To his surprise, his master made no allusion to his misconduct, but kindly inquired after his health and the daring deed; and he thought flushed across him that his folly and sin were still unknown, and that if he did but keep his own counsel, might so remain forever. The tempter whispered, 'Be silent!' and for a moment he was inclined to yield; but his good angel triumphed. With bowed head and downcast eyes he told the story of his sin, and was ready to hear his sentence from the man he had wronged. For a few minutes the good old man (God bless him!) was silent, and then he said, with tears in his eyes:

"'My boy, I am glad that you have told me this, very glad; although I knew it before. You have committed a great sin, and you have suffered a terrible punishment. Thank God, who in his mercy has saved you from a far greater sin—a sin unrepented of, unforgiven, for ever and ever. You have been through a fiery trial; let your future life show that you have been truly "purged in the fire." For your offense against myself, God forbid that I should add to your punishment—I forgive you with all my heart, my boy, and you need have no fear about coming back to your old place in the office, for no one except myself will ever know a word of the matter. One thing, however, you must promise me—never to enter a gambling-house again, on pain of instant dismissal.'

"'That I do, Sir, upon my honor—' he began, and then stopped short, as the unfitness of the word, from one in his situation, flashed cruelly upon him.

"'Nay, lad,' said the old man, holding out his hand, 'don't take it back, that is just the way in which I want your promise. Upon your honor, mind. It is a little tarnished now; let it be the lubor of your life to make and keep it bright.'

"And, with God's help, he did. He rose from that bed, where for so many weeks he had lain in peril of his life, an altered man. His former friends wondered at the change, and declared that he had left his youth in the fire; but they knew nothing of the fierce fire through which those long weeks had raged in his bosom, and had scorched and seared the rebel heart within. Having stood so awfully near to death, he had learned to value life; and to strive so to live that death should be no longer terrible. And so striving, God prospered him. The father of the little girl he had saved was a wealthy man, and with generous kindness helped him even against his will. The kind old master stood his faithful friend, and even made opportunities for showing his confidence in him; and for many years past he has been a partner in the firm, and a much respected merchant. Very few people know his story. It is not a very merry one, but it was supremost in my mind when Effie asked for a story last month by on Christmas-eve—and therefore I have told it to you.

"Who was the young man, uncle?" said a childish voice. "Have we ever seen him?"

"Yes, my dear, you know him very well."

"But what became of the little girl that was saved, uncle? Is she alive still?"

"My dears," said Uncle Herbert, "the little girl is now your aunt Alice."

And then the fire-light, which had grown dim, flickered up into a blaze. Aunt Alice bent over Uncle Herbert's hand and kissed it, and he raised her head, we could see that there were tears in her eyes.

And we guessed the rest of the story.

A PRUSSIAN AMAZON.

A Prussian paper gives some particulars of a female volunteer in the Prussian army, whose name is Bertha Weiss. She was born at Stolzenberg, and educated as a respectable establishment required. She soon, however, evinced a singular preference for manly attire, and acted as a page when sent to a regiment of the Sixty-ninth Regiment at Treves, with whose family she had occasion to make long journeys to the south. Her good conduct induced her master to provide for her further education, so that she was competent to pass the ensign's examination. Soon after the war, provided with a good outfit, Bertha left from the captain, and without being subjected to a single drill or examination, she entered his regiment, and took part in the battle of Spicheren. Transferred to the Crown Prince's regiment, she succeeded, in the battle of Gravelotte, first alone, and afterward supported by her own staff, in recovering the lost Seventh infantry regiment, which had been seized by the French. She received in this exploit four bullet wounds, one of which, in the knee, disabled her from walking. She received from Prince Frederick Charles for her bravery the decorations of the Iron Cross, as well as an autograph certificate couched in the most flattering terms. She is likewise styled Bernard von Weiss, and is granted a furlough. The lady is twenty-four years of age, and has prepossessing features.

INTELLIGENCE OF THE PRUSSIAN SOLDIERY.

WHILE every men is a soldier, no man is a mere machine. Hints, literary and other, of the first individual responsibility to the Fatherland are strongly as the general who commands them. The Prussian soldier would make a better scout or "lodge" his sentry duty for worlds. He does his best to make himself master of the whole military machine, with a tendency to go out of order on temptation. Many a time have men been found on sentry a mile at least out of the line of any authority, and where they might have broken the rule without smoking or seeing any thing remarkable, and no untoward results. Most people know what a smoke is to a German, and it may be hardly imagined how difficult it is to mystified if he has not seen the color of tobacco smoke for a fortnight. When offered a cigar, they have accepted it, but never would any man take a light. Indeed, the office was resented with some severity. Indeed, Prussian soldiers are well-educated, and it is a truism not worth repeating that natural intelligence is developed and added to by education. They understand military operations, and delight in seeing them successfully worked out. With the new political complications, they have had to the war they are familiar, and each man speaks of it as if he had been present at the battles. Intimate benefit success will confer on his country, and not out of a mere frothy desire not to be "kicked." Marked ignorance of the Prussian troops, and the convictions and aspirations to which well-directed intelligence invariably gives rise, entirely result from among them grumbling or malingering. It rids greatly also in preserving the health of the army, for it must be remembered that the uniform sobriety of the troops, which does so much to secure their ailments to which large bodies of troops, often in unfavorable circumstances, are so liable. All men who have seen active service know how a frantic "spree" to-day is followed by dysentery to-morrow, and possibly by cholera the day following. The Prussians never indulge in a frantic "spree," and so escape the cause-agent disorders. They will bivouac beside a fat and sour cider-cellar, and keep their minds above then if they were visiting the locality merely, and had to pay for every thing.

CHRISTMAS-TIME—FEEDING THE PETS.—[DRAWN BY A. E. EISSLER.]

AUG 1968

71.2009.084.06095

71.2009.084.05095